See DAMAGES.

I. GENERALLY—PUBLICATION.

(1)
Actionable wrong—Relevancy—Averment of damage.

In an action of damages for slander the sheriff-substitute dismissed the action, inter alia, upon the ground that the pursuer on his own showing had suffered no damage. Held that the slander being relevantly averred, the question whether the pursuer had or had not sustained damage could not be disposed of without inquiry.

Trifling nature of damage—Wrongous information to police.

In an action at the instance of a dismissed employee against the manager of the employer's firm for damages on account of wrongful information given by the defender to the police, which led to the pursuer being accosted by the police in the street and ordered to move on, held that in spite of the trifling nature of the damage involved in being ordered to move on the pursuer had relevantly averred an actionable wrong—the information given to the police.

Agent and client—Letters written by law agent on instructions of client—Liability of agent—Liability of agent.

Crawford v Adams; Crawford v Dunlop, 1900, 2 F. 987; 37 S.L.R. 767; 8 S.L.T. 62, No. 413, infra.

Compensatio injuriarum—Counter issue.
Held that in an action of damages for slander the defender is not entitled to a counter issue of compensatio injuriarum.
Bertram v Pace, 1885, 12 R. 798; 22 S.L.R. 525.(5)
Husband and wife—Liability of husband for slander by wife.

Held that a husband is not liable in damages for slander uttered by his wife.

Barr v Neilson, 1868, 6 M. 651; 40 J. 337; 5 S.L.R. 391.

(6)
Slander of husband by wife.
An action by a husband against his wife to recover damages for slander is incompetent.

Young v Young, 1903, 5 F. 330; 40 S.L.R. 301; 10 S.L.T. 570.

Continued slander.
In an action of damages for slander, raised in 1898, an issue was allowed for the trial of allegations of verbal slander said to have been uttered in 1888, and the same slander being alleged to have been repeatedly uttered during the intervening ten years, issues with respect to these subsequent occasions were allowed.

Publication—Confidentiality—Letter written by client to law agent.

At a meeting of justices of the peace for the granting of licences a letter containing matter defamatory of one of the applicants was read by A, a law agent, who had been employed to oppose the application. The letter had been written to A by B, one of the clients who so employed him. Held that the letter being a confidential communication from a client to his law agent, no action lay against B in respect of the mere writing of the letter.

Williamson v Umphray, 1890, 17 R. 905; 27 S.L.R. 742.

Slander not communicated to third party.

Slandorous statements, either oral or written, concerning the person to whom they are addressed, will found an action of damages at his instance although no third party has heard or read them.

A firm made a business of supplying information to inquirers about the commercial credit of persons in business. A customer applied for information about a certain business man. By mischance the reply, which was of a defamatory nature, was sent by the firm, not to the inquirer, but to the business man himself, who brought an action of damages for slander. Held that the pursuer was entitled to an issue.
Gordon v Stubbs, Limited, (O.H.) 1895, 3 S.L.T. 10.

Innocent publication—Whether publication caused by defenders' acts.

A temperance organisation obtained requisition papers for a poll under the Temperance (Scotland) Act, 1913, canvassed electors to obtain their signatures, and, when the necessary number of signatures had been obtained, lodged the requisitions with the clerk of the local authority. These papers, after having been lodged, were available for inspection by any elector. In an action of damages against the temperance organisation the pursuer averred that these papers purported to bear her signature, that that signature was forged, that she was not aware who had forged her signature, that she was well known as holding views against the policy of "no licence," and that her acquaintances had inspected the papers and had seen her name there. Held that, although the papers might amount to a slander of the pursuer, the defenders were not responsible for its publication in that the discovery of the pursuer's name there by her acquaintances was not the necessary or inevitable consequence of the defenders' actings, and action dismissed.

Gibson v The National Citizens' Council, (O.H.) 1921, 1 S.L.T. 241.

Foreign—Lex loci delicti.

In an action of damages for slander brought by a firm in England against a firm in Scotland, the pursuers averred that the slander was contained in two letters and a telegram, sent from Scotland, by the defenders to the pursuers, and that the slander had been published in the sense of English law, in respect that the letters had been dictated to and type-written by the defenders' clerks, and that the telegram had passed through the hands of post office clerks. The names of the defenders' clerks and of the post office clerks were not given. The Court dismissed the action, in respect that there was no relevant averment of publication of defamatory matter in Scotland, and that it was admitted that by the law of England the statement to the pursuers themselves was not an actionable wrong.

Foreign—Newspaper.

Held (by Lord Kinnear, Ordinary) that neither the direct dispatch by post of an English newspaper from the publishing office in England to persons in Scotland, nor the sale of the newspaper in Scotland, is sufficient to give the Scots courts jurisdiction to entertain an action of damages for slander alleged to have been published in the newspaper.

Negligence—Newspaper—Advertisement.

A newspaper published an advertisement in the following terms:—"A criminal information for conspiracy to defraud is being prepared re the estate of "X" deceased, 74 Argyle Street. All persons having made payments at the above address since September, 1899, should send immediate information to "B. The advertisement was supplied to the newspaper by B. M., who was a trustee on X's estate, brought an action of damages for slander against B and the newspaper, averring that the advertisement was of and concerning him, and falsely represented that he had been involved in a fraudulent conspiracy with regard to the estate. The pursuer did not aver that the proprietors of the newspaper had been guilty of negligence in publishing the advertisement. Held that it was not necessary to aver negligence, although the pursuer would probably not succeed unless he could satisfy the jury that there was a certain recklessness on the part of the newspaper in publishing the advertisement.

M'Lean v Bernstein, (O.H.) 1900, 8 S.L.T. 42.

Ignorance of slander—Newspaper—False statement not ex facie slanderous—False notice of birth.

The publisher of a newspaper is not exempt from liability for damages merely because a statement of fact in regard to a private individual published by him is not ex facie defamatory, if, in the circumstances, it is defamatory. A newspaper, among the notices of births, stated that A B had given birth to a child at a certain date. A B sued the publisher for damages, on the ground that the statement was false, and was defamatory in respect that the date stated was within two months of her marriage. Held that the action was relevant, and that the pursuer was entitled to an issue.

Damages—Aggravation of damages—Proof of circumstances in which slander uttered.

In an action of damages for slander, it is competent for the pursuer as well as for the defender to prove the circumstances in which the slander was written where the defender is the writer—or published where the defender is the publisher—as affecting the amount of damages.

Aggravation of damages—Conduct of trial by counsel.

Observed (per Lord Johnston and Lord Anderson) that the fact that counsel for the defender, in an action of damages for slander, leads evidence attacking the pursuer's conduct on occasions other than that put in issue, cannot be taken into consideration by a jury as an element in increasing the amount of damage unless it be established that counsel is acting on the express instructions, or with the privity, of his client.

Mitigation of damages—Proof of circumstances in which slander uttered—Facts unknown to party publishing slander—Newspaper.

Where an action of damages is directed against the publisher of a slander, who is not the writer, he will not be allowed to prove in mitigation of damages circumstances which might have affected the writer but of which the defender was ignorant. This rule applies to the publisher of a newspaper who publishes a slander and refuses to disclose the name of the writer.

Browne v M'Farlane, 1889, 16 R. 368; 26 S.L.R. 289.

[See also DAMAGES I. 5.]

II. PROCEDURE—FORM OF ISSUES.

[See also PROCESS VIII. 2.]

(19)

Interdict—Threatened slander.

Held that the Court has power to interdict a threatened slander.

Repetition of slander.

Held competent to bring a note of suspension and interdict to prevent the repetition of a slander.

Lindsay v Hastie, 1915, 2 S.L.T. 266.

Competency of action—Two pursuers claiming separate damages in one action—Issue.

Held (1) that it is competent for two persons alleging injury by one calumnious statement to claim damages in one action, provided the damages due to each are separately concluded for; and (2) that in such an action each pursuer must take a separate issue.

Competency of two actions in respect of one slander—Agent and client—Letters written by law agent on instructions of client—Agent identifying himself with slander.

A law agent wrote slanderous letters on the instructions of his client. Held that the person slandered was entitled to bring separate actions against (1) the client, and (2) the agent, in respect that the agent had identified himself with the slander.

Crawford v Adams, Crawford v Dunlop, 1900, 2 F. 987; 37 S.L.T. 767; 8 S.L.T. 62.

Foreign language—Slander uttered in Gaelic—Issue.

In an action of damages founded on a statement alleged to have been uttered in Gaelic, the pursuer proposed an issue which set forth the Gaelic words said to have been used, and proceeded, "which words, being translated into English, bear the following or similar meaning," and then followed the English translation. The Court, having indicated that the insertion of the Gaelic words were unnecessary, counsel agreed that they should be taken out, and the issue, as adjusted, put the question whether the defender said, "in Gaelic of and concerning the pursuer," and then followed the English translation of the words used.

Slander uttered in foreign language—Innuendo—Proof.

Where the words complained of in an action of slander have been uttered in a foreign language, not only must they be set forth on record as spoken in that language, but their English equivalent must be set forth in the same way as an innuendo is set forth, and the pursuer must prove (first) that the words were actually spoken, and (second) that their English equivalent is that which he avers.

Necessity of averring innuendo on record.

Relevancy—Specification—Date and place of slander—Latitude of time.

An averment that a slander had been uttered "on various occasions between the 4th and 7th May at various places in the city of Edinburgh, in presence of" three persons named, or of one or other of them, was held to be wanting in specification, and an issue refused.

Walker v Cumming, 1868, 6 M. 318; 40 J. 175; 5 S.L.R. 220.

Latitude of time.

The pursuer in an action of damages for slander proposed issues whether the defender slandered the pursuer (1) "in the month of May, June or July, 1868"; and (2) "in the latter end of summer or beginning of harvest, 1869." The Court disallowed both issues, but allowed an issue whether the defender slandered the pursuer "in or about the month of July, 1868."

Grant v Fraser, 1870, 8 M. 1011.

Issue—Concurrence in and adoption of the slander of another.

In an action of damages for slander against A and B, the pursuer averred that the defenders called upon S to obtain his signature to a petition, and that A, in his presence, made certain false and calumnious and injurious statements regarding the pursuer; that B was then present and heard what A said, and concurred with him in said slanderous statement, which was uttered in pursuance of a malicious design. The pursuer proposed the issues—“(1) Whether A made the false and calumnious statement in presence of S and B? and (2) whether B falsely and calumniously concurred in and adopted the said statement falsely and calumniously made by A.” Held that the second issue could not be allowed, and that there should be one issue, viz., whether the defenders or either of them, and which of them, in presence and hearing of S, falsely and calumniously stated, &c.

Jack v Fleming, 1891, 19 R. 1; 29 S.L.R. 5.

General issue.

In an action of damages for slander the pursuer, who was a postmaster, proposed a general issue as to whether between 1885 and 1894 the defender had repeatedly made calumnious charges against him involving carelessness and dishonesty or untrustworthiness in his capacity as postmaster. Issue refused.

Turner v Carnachan, (O.H.) 1894, 2 S.L.T. 278.

General issue—Several slanders in reference to one controversy—Schedule of damages.

In an action of damages for slander by a minister against the proprietor of a newspaper, the pursuer averred that he had been slandered in six different issues of the paper. He averred that it was insinuated in one of the articles that the manse was an immoral house; in another that he had been guilty of wilful falsehood and was likely to commit perjury; while the other articles held him up to ridicule and contempt. The whole series of articles were written with reference to a controversy as to the introduction of an organ into the pursuer's church. On the pursuer minuting that he would not insist for damages in respect of the two special publications as separate slanders, the Court allowed a general issue whether the articles were published in pursuance of an intention to expose and did expose the pursuer to public hatred, contempt and ridicule, with one sum of damages scheduled thereto.

Cunningham v Phillips, 1868, 6 M. 926; 40 J. 533; 5 S.L.R. 602.

Verbal slander—Quotation of words of slanderous statement in issue.

Observed (per Lord Kincairney, Ordinary) that in cases of verbal slander “it is the usual practice to quote the defamatory words in the issue, but where it does not appear that the exact words could have been given, it has been held enough that the averments as to the defamatory language are sufficiently definite and precise so as to show that what is meant to be averred is what the defender said, not what the pursuer thought he intended by what he said, which is proper for the innuendo.”

Schedule of damages.

In an action for payment of a sum as damages for slander in an anonymous letter in a newspaper, two issues were allowed relating to separate slanders in the article. Held that the sum for which the pursuer sued ought not to be divided between the issues in schedules appended to each, but ought to be stated in one sum at the end of the whole issues, as the jury, if they should find only one issue to be established, would be entitled to award any sum within the limits of the sum sued for.

Newspaper article — Whole article printed in schedule.

In an action of damages for slander in respect of a statement contained in a newspaper article, the Lord Ordinary ordered the whole article to be printed in the schedule, so that the whole article should be placed before the jury.

Amendment of issue by judge at trial—Malice.

Observed (per Lord M'Laren) that a judge might amend an issue as well as a record, so as to raise the true question between the parties, and that if he were trying the case, and it appeared that circumstances raising a case of privilege had been deliberately withheld in order to get an issue without inserting “maliciously,” he should at once alter it.

M'Keand v Maxwell, 1896, 3 S.L.T. 321.

Counter issue—Plea of veritas.

[See VI., infra.]

(35)

Fair report—Counter issue unnecessary.

In an action of damages against the proprietors of a newspaper for slander alleged to be contained in a report in the newspaper of proceedings in a Court of justice, the defenders proposed as a counter issue whether the report was a fair and accurate report of the proceedings. The Court disallowed the counter issue as unnecessary.

Province of judge and of jury.

A person charged with having contravened the Weights and Measures Act, 1878, by having in his possession or using measures which were not of any Board of Trade standard, and were false or unjust, was convicted of the offence except in so far as it was charged that his measures were false or unjust. He afterwards brought an action of damages against the printer and publisher of a newspaper for slander contained in an article commenting on the case, which, upon the face of it, assumed that there had been a conviction upon both charges. There was no counter issue, and the defender admitted in the witness-box that the article charged the pursuer with dishonest conduct. The presiding judge directed the jury that it was for them to consider whether the article was false and calumnious, and no exception was taken to his charge. The jury having returned a verdict for the defender, the Court granted a new trial upon the ground that the verdict was contrary to evidence.

Proof—Similar slander uttered on two occasions—One witness only to each occasion.

An action of damages for slander was tried upon two issues. These issues respectively concerned two separate occasions, on which two occasions the defender was alleged to have spoken different words to different persons, the words in each case being innuendo to bear the same defamatory meaning. Only one witness deposed to each of the separate occasions, but each witness attributed to the words the innuendo libelled. Held that there was evidence upon which the jury might return a verdict for the pursuer, the two witnesses having mutually corroborated each other.

Verdict—Discrepancy from issue.

In an action of damages for slander the issue submitted to the jury was whether a slander was uttered in the presence and hearing of C "and others." The jury returned a verdict for the pursuer, but added a finding that it was not proved that the slander was uttered in the presence and hearing of C. The Court entered up the verdict for the defenders.

Discrepancy from issue—Latitude of time.

In an action of damages for slander the issue submitted to the jury was whether "on or about 12th March, 1912," the defender at or near a shop occupied by the pursuer and in presence and hearing of one of the pursuer's neighbours had made a slanderous statement concerning the pursuer which imported that he was a thief. The jury having found that the slander had been uttered by the defender at the place and in the circumstances set forth in the issue, but that it had been so uttered in February, 1912, Lord President Dunedin directed that the verdict should be entered for the defender.

Written slander—Production of writing complained of.

It is not necessary as a condition of an issue being allowed in an action for written slander that the writing complained of should be produced by the pursuer.

Ellis v National Free Labour Association, 1905, 7 F. 629; 42 S.L.R. 495; 13 S.L.T. 70.

Anonymous letter to newspaper—Refusal to disclose name of writer of letter—Diligence for recovery of original letter.

In an action of damages for slander against the proprietors of a newspaper founded on statements contained in an anonymous letter published in the newspaper, the pursuer, a parish minister, averred that the letter "was written or procured to be written by the defenders for publication in their newspaper in pursuance of a malicious design to injure the pursuer," and "to destroy his reputation" as a clergyman. The defenders refused to disclose the name of the writer of the letter, and the pursuer moved for a diligence for the recovery of the original letter. The Court refused the diligence.

Anonymous letter to newspaper—Diligence to recover documents relating to authorship of letter—Aggravation of damages.

A town councillor of a royal burgh raised an action of damages against the publishers of a newspaper for slander contained in an editorial article, and in a series of letters signed with various pseudonyms, published in their paper, and charging him with dishonest conduct in his office. He averred that the letters and articles were part of a systematic plan to destroy his character, and that the defenders "either wrote the said letters or procured them to be written for publication in their said newspaper." Held that the pursuer, without putting in issue whether the letters were written by the defenders, was entitled to lead evidence upon that point, with a view to aggravation of damages, and that therefore he was entitled to a diligence to recover documents relating to the authorship, composition, or publication of the letters and article, though their recovery might lead to the disclosure of the names of anonymous correspondents who were not represented in the cause.

—Anonymous letter to newspaper—
Fair comment—Diligence for recovery of writs—Recovery of communications to newspaper.

A commercial firm brought an action of damages for slander against a newspaper which had published articles reflecting on the business methods of the firm. These articles contained statements of fact in regard to the methods of the firm and also contained quotations from letters which the newspaper alleged they had received from members of the public reflecting on the methods of the firm. The defenders pleaded "fair comment." The Court granted to the pursuers a diligence for the recovery of communications which the defenders quoted as having been received by them from particular members of the public, but refused a diligence for the recovery of other correspondence passing between the newspaper and the writers of these communications. In regard to certain statements of fact made by the newspaper on its own authority, the Court refused a diligence to the pursuers for the recovery of letters showing or tending to show "(1) whether the facts stated . . . are or are not truly stated by the defenders; (2) the defenders' knowledge of the truth or falsehood of the facts so stated; or (3) whether the facts so stated were stated by the defenders bona fide and in the public interest, or for their own purposes, or from other indirect motives."

Ogston & Tennant v The "Daily Record,"
1909, 1 S.L.T. 551.

III. INNUENDO—GENERAL QUESTIONS.

(44)

What language may be innuendoed.

In an action of damages for slander founded on words not in themselves libellous but innuendoed to be so, the Court will not allow of an issue unless the words founded on will fairly bear the innuendo put on them.

Fraser v Morris, 1888, 15 R. 454; 25 S.L.R. 331.

Province of judge and jury.

Per Lord Kinnear—"Before a question of libel or slander is submitted to a jury, the Court must be satisfied that the words complained of are capable of the defamatory meaning ascribed to them. That is a matter of law for the Court. If they are so, and also of a harmless meaning, it is a question of fact for a jury which meaning they did convey in the particular case."

Russell v Stubbs, Limited, 1913 S.C. (H.L.) 14; [1913] A.C. 336; 50 S.L.R. 676; 1913, 1 S.L.T. 428.

—Per Lord President Inglis—"In cases where a non-natural meaning is not sought to be ascribed to particular words or expressions, and the pursuer merely alleges that the writing, though not free from ambiguity, is yet according to its fair construction a libel on his conduct and reputation, he is not necessarily required to state extrinsic facts from which to infer the construction for which he contends. All that is required of him in such cases is to state distinctly the libellous meaning which he attaches to the writing. In such a case the question of construction must be left to the proper tribunal; and, according to our law and practice, the question of libel or no libel belongs to the jury, in the first instance at least, subject no doubt to correction by the Court if the jury go flagrantly wrong."

(47)

—Statement not prima facie slanderous
—Facts and circumstances supporting innuendo.

In an action of damages for slander, the pursuer founded on a sentence taken from a letter written by the defender, and innuendoed it as charging him with a fraudulent attempt to obtain money. In his record he did not state any facts and circumstances to substantiate the innuendo, nor did he quote any part of the letter except the single sentence complained of. The Court refused an issue, on the ground (1) that the sentence complained of was not prima facie slanderous, and (2) that the pursuer was not entitled to an opportunity of proving facts and circumstances which would give to that sentence a slanderous meaning without specifically averring them, and without producing the rest of the letter.

—Statement not prima facie slanderous
—Averting that words understood in slanderous sense.

Circumstances in which an issue was allowed where prima facie the words complained of would not reasonably bear the innuendo proposed, but where the pursuer averred that the persons to whom the words were uttered all understood them in the sense suggested.

Williamson v McCann, 1908, 16 S.L.T. 221.

Respective duties of Court and pursuer—
Necessity of averring innuendo on record.

Observations on the duty of the Court and the pursuer respectively with regard to the framing of issues in actions of libel. In particular, observed that it is the pursuer's duty to state distinctly upon record the libellous meaning which he attaches to the writing of which he complains.

(50)

Terms of innuendo—Vagueness—Immoral conduct.

In an action of damages for slander, the Lord Ordinary allowed an issue, "whether said statement was of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumniously represented or was meant to represent that the pursuer had been guilty of immoral conduct with A B," but observed that the use of the phrase "immoral conduct" was bad, because vague.

Ewart v M'Laren, (O.H.) 1894, 2 S.L.T. 325.

 ———Vagueness—"Not worthy of being trusted in commercial dealings."

An issue containing the innuendo, "That the pursuer's character as a man of business is such that he is not worthy of being trusted by any one in commercial dealings, and, in particular, could not be trusted to repay a loan of £50 should such be made to him," disallowed, in respect that it was not sufficiently distinct and intelligible for an innuendo.

Mathieson v The Scottish Trade Protection Society, (O.H.) 1898, 5 S.L.T. 291; affirmed, 1898, 25 R. 683; 35 S.L.R. 532; 5 S.L.T. 344.

 ———"Likely to act dishonestly" in specified matter.

A, the manager of a butcher's shop, brought an action of damages against B for wrongful dispossession and slander. He averred that, although the shop had been transferred to him by B, the owner, by a verbal agreement, B had turned him out of the shop, and had inserted the following advertisement in a newspaper:—"Notice—A, of A & Co., on and after this date is not authorised by me to contract any debts on my account.—B." The pursuer proposed an issue with an innuendo that the pursuer was capable of acting dishonestly. The Lord Ordinary allowed an issue in which the alleged slanderous advertisement was innuendoed thus—"Whether the said advertisement is of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumniously represents that he was an untrustworthy person who had acted, or was likely to act, dishonestly in the matter therein referred to."

Grainger v Stirling, (O.H.) 1898, 5 S.L.T. 272.

 ———Innuendo adding nothing to statement complained of—"Bribe"—Relevancy.

Gardner v Robertson, 1921 S.C. 132; 58 S.L.R. 124; 1921, 1 S.L.T. 71, No. 190, infra.

 ———Charge of fraud in general terms—Form of issue.

Costa v Lumley, (O.H.) 1907, 15 S.L.T. 230, No. 88, infra.

(55)
 ———Purpose of innuendo—Slander in long newspaper article.

In an action of damages for slander, the pursuer complained of statements made in a long newspaper article. Observed (per Lord President Inglis,—"The purpose and use of an innuendo in such a case as this is to gather together the expressions which really are of a slanderous character, and which appear to give colour to the whole article, and so to bring before a jury in a condensed form the substance of what is complained of."

 ———Construction of newspaper article.

In an action at the instance of a town councillor against a newspaper, the pursuer innuendoed a newspaper article as representing that he was unfaithful to his public trust, and had acted corruptly for his own personal benefit. Observed that the question in such cases is not the meaning to be derived from a critical reading of the words in question, but the meaning which the words used would convey to an ordinary reader reading them as newspaper articles are usually read.

Hunter v Ferguson & Co., 1906, 8 F. 574; 43 S.L.R. 451; 13 S.L.T. 886.

 ———Actions—Slander by actions.

Opinions that there may be an actionable wrong of the nature of slander based solely upon actions, provided that an innuendo can reasonably be drawn from them.

(58)
 ———Proof—Innuendo not proved by witnesses.

The pursuer in an action of slander put in issue a private letter, which he innuendoed as accusing him of dishonesty, and which he alleged had been shown by the defender to three persons. The Court set aside a verdict of a jury for the pursuer, and ordered a new trial, on the ground that the innuendo had not been put to any of these persons, and that none of them had testified that he considered that the letter contained an accusation of dishonesty.

 ———Single witness—Similar slander uttered on two occasions—Each occasion spoken to by one witness—Each witness attributing same defamatory meaning to words used.

M'Vicar v Barbour, 1916 S.C. 567; 53 S.L.R. 381; 1916, 1 S.L.T. 233, No. 37, supra.

 ———Innuendo of words spoken while pursuer and defender alone together.

Observations on the possibility of an innuendo in a case where vague defamatory statements were made by the defender to the pursuer while they were alone together.

Hypothetical case stated to be imaginary.

A person, who conceived that his reputation had been unfairly attacked through questions put by a member of Parliament in the House of Commons, wrote to him, and sent to a newspaper a letter in which he denied the charges alleged against himself. He went on to put the case that he should induce one of the political opponents of the member addressed to put questions in the House of Commons implying that that member had had delirium tremens, and had been intoxicated in public. Such a course, the writer stated, would be as justifiable as the conduct of the member of Parliament had been to him. In his letter he also spoke of his illustrations of delirium tremens and drunkenness as "imaginary stories," adding "it is doubtless painful for you to hear of these stories as it is painful for me to imagine them true for the sake of bringing home to your mind the impropriety of your unfair questions." In an action of damages at the instance of the member of Parliament against the proprietor of the newspaper in which the letter was published, held that the pursuer was entitled to an issue whether the letter represented him as a drunkard; that meaning being capable of being put upon the letter, and it being for a jury to say whether there was or was not a libel.

IV. WHAT CONSTITUTES SLANDER.1. "OF AND CONCERNING" THE PURSUER.

(62)

Slander of a class.

Two grocers and wine merchants in a burgh, one of whom had been elected a magistrate, and the other dean of guild, raised actions of damages for slander against A, founded upon a letter published in a newspaper which the defender had written, in which he stated that the temperance party were neglecting their duty. Held on a construction of the whole letter, that while it contained intemperate and foolish language directed against the class of licence-holders, it was not a slander of the pursuers as individuals, and the action dismissed.

Title of individuals to sue—Province of jury.

A newspaper published an article on Ireland stating that in Queenstown instructions were issued by the Roman Catholic religious authorities that all Protestant shop assistants were to be discharged, and that a shopkeeper who had refused so to act had had his shop proclaimed and had been forced to close it. An action was brought by the Roman Catholic bishop at Queenstown and six of his clergy (who averred that they were the Roman Catholic religious authorities referred to), in which they, suing as individuals, sought to recover separate sums of damages on account of the accusations in the article. Held (1) that the pursuers were entitled to sue for damages as individuals; and (2) that it was for the jury to determine whether they or any of them were the Roman Catholic religious authorities referred to.

Members of presbytery—Charge of intemperance.

The clerical members of a presbytery brought an action of damages for slander in respect of a passage in a newspaper article which they innuendoed as being of and concerning each of them, and representing that they were intemperate. The statement complained of did not refer to the pursuers individually, but an issue was allowed to each of the pursuers.

Macphail v Macleod, (O.H.) 1895, 3 S.L.T. 91.

Context excluding pursuer.

V, an unmarried woman, having threatened an action of damages for breach of promise of marriage against a client of B & Co., law agents, a correspondence followed between B & Co. and V's agent. One of B & Co.'s letters, after referring to certain entries of the births of certain illegitimate children in the public register of births, bore—"This last entry shows that the writer had been misinformed as to the particular child with which your client was to be credited; but this is not surprising, in view of the fecundity of the maidens of this family, and of their matrimonial and other relationships, as disclosed by the above, and sundry other entries in the registers." In an action of damages of slander brought by A (who was an unmarried sister of V, but whose name did not appear in the entries referred to), against B & Co., held that the words "maidens of this family" were shown by the context to refer only to persons whose names appeared in the entries in the registers, and defenders absolved.

Context excluding pursuer.

A ratepayer having made certain charges against the matron of a hospital, an inquiry was held, in which evidence was given by the matron and by other members of the hospital staff. The commissioner who conducted the inquiry reported adversely on the credibility of certain members of the staff, but stated his belief in the truthfulness of the matron, and exonerated her from the charges made against her. On this report being sent to the ratepayer, he acknowledged receipt of it in a letter, in which he said—

"I have but a languid interest in the question of which member of the staff lied the most." In an action of damages for defamation brought by the matron against the ratepayer, the pursuer sought to innuendo these words as representing that she had lied in giving evidence at the inquiry. Held that the words, construed along with the report of the commissioner, did not refer to the pursuer, and an issue disallowed.

Context not excluding pursuer.

A shipowner brought an action of damages against the proprietors of a newspaper for an alleged slander contained in a paragraph in an issue of the newspaper headed "Shipwreck by Arrangement." Neither the pursuer nor the ship was mentioned by name. Circumstances in which the Lord Ordinary allowed an issue, holding that, while primarily and critically there might be no accusation except against persons who were not owners, the paragraph was so expressed that it might reasonably be held by a cursory reader, not knowing the pursuer's exact relation to the ship, to apply to him. The Court adhered, holding that the paragraph might reasonably be read as a slander on the pursuer.

Briggs v The Amalgamated Press, 1910, 2 S.L.T. 334.

Pursuer not named in slanderous statement—Onus of proof.

A firm, which manufactured a coffee essence called "Camp" coffee, inserted in a newspaper an advertisement which narrated that complaints had been received that certain grocers (who were not named), when asked for "Camp" coffee, were by false statements deceiving the public and inducing them to buy an inferior coffee, and that the firm had taken proceedings against thirty-five of these grocers. In an action of damages for slander at the instance of one of the grocers proceeded against, the pursuer averred that the advertisement was of and concerning him. Held that the question whether the advertisement referred to the pursuer was for the jury, and observed that the onus of proof was on the pursuer, as he was not actually named.

Comment on anonymous letter in newspaper.

In an action of damages for slander the pursuer averred that the defender, the minister of the parish of C, had—in commenting from the pulpit upon an anonymous letter which had appeared in a newspaper bearing the signature "a member of C parish kirk-session"—falsely and calumniously stated that it "bears internal evidence that it is a forgery, and that the editor had been imposed upon by a so-called member of session," meaning thereby that the pursuer was the anonymous writer, and the "so-called member of session" to whom he was referring as having been guilty of forgery and imposition. It appeared from the pursuer's statement that on the day after that of the alleged libel the defender, at the pursuer's request, had by letter disclaimed any reference to the pursuer in the statement complained of. Held that the pursuer had not set forth a relevant case.

Caldwell v Monro, 1872, 10 M. 717; 44 J. 393; 9 S.L.R. 461.

Pursuer's name the same as that in slanderous article.

In an action of damages for slander by a music-hall artiste against newspaper proprietors the pursuer averred that a newspaper paragraph headed "A B shoots wife twice," was slanderous and of and concerning himself, his name being "A B." Issue allowed.

Wragg v Thomson & Co., 1909, 2 S.L.T. 409.

Pursuer's servants charged with improper conduct—Acts of servants not stated to be done with pursuer's authority.

During a parliamentary election a newspaper stated that it was alleged that a boat's crew from the yacht of one of the candidates was captured while poaching, and that it was affirmed that a boat's crew from his yacht had been seen fishing on a Sunday. Held that the candidate was not entitled to an issue, as the newspaper article did not say that the acts had been done with his authority.

2. FALSITY OF IMPUTATIONS.

[See also VI., infra.]

No averment that statements complained of were false.

A letter in a newspaper accused a parish minister of neglecting his duty by absenting himself from his charge for six of the busiest weeks of the year, during which the church was closed, and concluded by expressing a hope that the presbytery would do their duty "and not allow this part of their vineyard to be neglected," and would call him to account. In an action of damages for slander the minister did not allege that the statements of fact in the letter were false, but innuendoed it as representing that he had, in violation of his duty as a parish minister, neglected his parishioners and congregation, and had behaved in a manner unbecoming a minister of the gospel, and deserving of the admonition of the ecclesiastical courts. Held that the pursuer's averments were irrelevant in the absence of any denial on record of the truth of the statements of fact in the letter. Observed, per Lord President Inglis—"No man can come into Court only on an innuendo—he must have a statement that the statements complained of are false.”

Campbell v Ferguson, 1882, 9 R. 467; 19 S.L.R. 404.

True statement of fact conveying false representation.

In an action of damages for slander held that, although a letter might contain a substantially accurate statement of facts, the jury might return a verdict for the pursuer if satisfied that the letter contained a representation with regard to the pursuer which was false and calumnious.

True statement made maliciously with design and result of injury.

Held that a statement true in fact, and not defamatory, is not actionable, even if made maliciously with the design and result of injuring a man in his trade or business.

Truth of imputation appearing from pursuer's pleadings.

Carson v White, (O.H.) 1919, 2 S.L.T. 215, No. 254, infra.

3. DEFAMATORY IMPUTATIONS.

(1) IMPUTATIONS AGAINST CHARACTER.

(a) Imputations of Criminal or Dishonest Conduct.

(i.) Whether Defamatory.

“Prisoner” — Misdescription — Accused persons described as “prisoners.”

A person, who had been summoned to appear in a police court to answer to a complaint, in which he was charged with a breach of the licensing law, appeared in response to the citation, and was acquitted. A newspaper published a paragraph in which the police court proceedings were accurately described, but the paragraph was headed, “The Edinburgh Licensing Prosecution, Prisoners Acquitted.” The accused brought an action of damages for slander against the newspaper on the ground that, as he had not been apprehended, but had appeared in answer to a citation, and had then been acquitted, he had never been a prisoner. Held that in the circumstances the words “prisoners acquitted” were not slanderous, and action dismissed as irrelevant.

“Offender” — Misdescription.

Held that an action of damages for slander against the magistrates of a burgh was relevant where, in a report made by them with reference to a case in which the pursuer in the action of damages had been convicted of a police offence and the conviction quashed on appeal to the High Court of Justiciary, the pursuer was referred to as the “offender.”

Davidson v Anderson, (O.H.) 1905, 12 S.L.T. 679.

Suicide.

Opinion, per Lord Kincairney, Ordinary, that it is defamatory to say falsely of a person that he has committed suicide.

Broom v Ritchie & Co., 1904, 6 F. 942; 41 S.L.R. 723; 12 S.L.T. 205.

Travelling on railway without paying fare — Posting up sentence.

Buchan v North British Railway Co., 1894, 21 R. 379; 31 S.L.R. 273; 1 S.L.T. 450, No. 428, infra.

Abduction of girl under eighteen — Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, sec. 7.

In an action of damages for wrongous apprehension and slander the pursuer averred that he was apprehended in consequence of a telegram sent by the defender to the county police charging him with “having abducted” her daughter, who was a girl between seventeen and eighteen years of age. Held that the averment that the pursuer had been charged with abduction was not a relevant averment that he had been charged with a criminal offence, inasmuch as the abduction of a girl between seventeen and eighteen years of age was not a crime at common law, and was so under the 7th section of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, only if the intention was that she should be unlawfully known, and the pursuer did not aver that the defender had charged him with abduction with the intent expressed in the statute.

Abinet v Fleck, (O.H.) 1894, 2 S.L.T. 30.

Accusation of theft — Failure to pay for article bought.

A man who bought a coat, payable on delivery, failed to pay for it when it was delivered, and for some days thereafter. Held that a letter written to him by the seller stating that his action made the case one of theft was slanderous.

Handasyde v J. Hepworth & Son, (O.H.) 1907, 15 S.L.T. 180.

Poaching.

Opinion that it is slanderous to accuse a person of poaching.

Held that it is libellous to say of a man that he is a poacher and does nothing but poach.

Cook v Spence, (O.H.) 1897, 4 S.L.T. 295.

(ii.) Innuendo.

Fraud—Giving wrong coin.

A shop assistant asked a customer—"Did you give me half a sovereign to change last night." On receiving an answer in the affirmative, she said—"This is what you gave me," and held up a farthing. Held that an innuendo that the pursuer had fraudulently tendered a farthing for half a sovereign and had induced the defenders to give goods and change therefor was not justified.

M'Leod v A. R. Ure & Young, (O.H.) 1915, 1 S.L.T. 151.

Travelling twice with same ticket.

The following statement by a ticket collector to a passenger, "You have travelled twice with the same ticket," held capable of bearing the innuendo that the passenger had knowingly defrauded the railway company.

Cumming v Great North of Scotland Railway Co., (O.H.) 1916, 1 S.L.T. 181.

Defrauding insurance company — Refusing admission to fire brigade on occasion of fire—Newspaper article.

Terms of a newspaper article headed—"Fire at Ayr Farina Mills—Singular Conduct of the Manager," which were held to entitle the manager of the works in question to an issue whether the article falsely and calumniously represented that he "had endeavoured to prevent the fire at the works referred to in the said article from being subdued, so as to cause destruction of the said works and stock therein, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer."

Defrauding insurance company — Alleged accident.

In an action of damages for slander by the holder of an accident insurance policy against the insurance company, the pursuer averred that with regard to a claim on his policy made by him against the company, the secretary of the company said to him—"The company are in no respect liable to you under the policy. I know that it was not an accident in your case at all, and that you fell and sustained your injuries because you were tipsy at the time." An issue allowed which innuendoed the statement complained of as meaning that the pursuer had put forward an unfounded claim under the policy with the view of defrauding the company.

Oliver v Laidlaw, (O.H.) 1895, 3 S.L.T. 142.

Running wrong whippet in race.

The owners of a whippet dog sued the promoter of race meetings for such dogs for slander on the ground that in refusing to allow the dog to run in a race for which it was entered he had said to one of the pursuers—"It's a wrong dog. Get off this track or I will have you arrested." It was admitted that the defender was in sole control of the races in every way. Held that the words could not be innuendoed as implying a charge of fraud, and that in any event the occasion was privileged.

Costa v Lumley, (O.H.) 1907, 15 S.L.T. 230.

"Misappropriation of money."

In an action of damages for slander, the pursuer averred that the defender had falsely, maliciously, and calumniously stated to the agent of a bank that the pursuer had misappropriated trust money, meaning thereby that the pursuer had dishonestly appropriated the money to his own uses. Held that the pursuer's averments relevantly set forth a case of verbal slander.

A law agent who was in charge of the winding up of an executry estate wrote to the cautioners for the executrix (an old lady of eighty), intimating that a son of the executrix was demanding payment of the whole estate in name of his mother, and advising them to withdraw their bond of caution "because I have reason to suspect that if the son who is demanding the whole estate gets hold of it, the other beneficiaries will never receive the share they are entitled to." In an action of damages for slander the son innuendoed the letter to mean that he was a person who would dishonestly appropriate money that did not belong to him. Held that the innuendo was not inadmissible and an issue allowed.

Letter bearing to be part of a correspondence.

In an action of damages for slander the pursuer founded on a letter which bore to be part of a correspondence, and which the pursuer innuendoed as accusing him of dishonest appropriation of property. Held that, even in a question of relevancy, the whole correspondence must be looked at, and that when the correspondence was read as a whole the letter founded on would not bear the innuendo.

"Greatest liar and fraud."

The local agent for an insurance company, who was bound to account to the superintendent of the company, was in arrears with his payments. In an action of damages for slander against the insurance company the agent averred that the superintendent called at the pursuer's house and stated that the pursuer was the greatest liar and fraud that ever came into the town, and that if the pursuer did not settle with him by the beginning of the week he would give the pursuer into the hands of the authorities. The pursuer innuendoed the statement as representing that he had been guilty of dishonest appropriation of the moneys in his hands belonging to the defenders. Held that to call a man a fraud did not in ordinary language mean that he had committed a fraud, and that the words "liar and fraud," verbally uttered, were not slanderous.

Agnew v British Legal Life Assurance Co., 1906, 8 F. 422; 43 S.L.R. 284; 13 S.L.T. 742.

Administration of funds of a charity.

Terms of a newspaper article commenting on an appeal by A and B for subscriptions to a charitable "home," and asking "what guarantee is there that the money subscribed does not go to the private profit of" A and B, which it was held could bear the innuendo that B was a person capable of appropriating funds collected for charity to his own purposes.

Management of hospital funds.

Terms of an anonymous letter in a newspaper criticising the management of a hospital which were held to be incapable of bearing the innuendo that the secretary of the hospital was guilty of dishonest conduct in the application of the funds of the hospital, and was a person unfit to be entrusted with the management of public funds.

Branch of trade union "paying money to themselves."

A statement by the secretary of a trade union to the effect that a branch committee had paid money to themselves held to be incapable of bearing an innuendo of a charge of dishonest appropriation of money against an individual member of the committee.

"Withholding moneys contrary to bye-laws" of association.

In an action for slander the pursuer complained of the circulation of a pamphlet by the defenders (a free labour association), in which it was stated that the pursuer had been dismissed by the defenders for, inter alia, "withholding moneys belonging to the" defenders "contrary to the bye-laws" of the association. The pursuer proposed an issue in which he innuendoed this expression as representing "that pursuer had been guilty of dishonestly appropriating money."

Held that the expression complained of could not reasonably bear the innuendo proposed, and issue disallowed.

Ellis v National Free Labour Association, 1905, 7 F. 629; 42 S.L.R. 495; 13 S.L.T. 70.

Evading payment of rent.

A political lecturer engaged a hall for the purposes of a lecture which he delivered. In a newspaper article commenting upon it, it was stated of him—"Now one of them has left the town. Any information as to his whereabouts will be thankfully received by a sorrowing landlord, the proprietor of the hall, who now concludes that a Tory Cleon is no more profitable as a tenant than a Socialist Boanerges." Held that that language was capable of bearing the innuendo that the lecturer, being liable for the rent of the hall, had secretly left without giving an address and without making provision for payment of the rent, with the view of defrauding the proprietor of the hall, and was therefore actionable.

Theft—"Thief"—Newspaper article.

Terms of a newspaper article on a consideration of which it was held that the word "thieves" as it occurred therein would not bear the innuendo that the pursuer had been guilty of theft.

Campbell v Ritchie & Co.—Hay v Ritchie & Co., 1907 S.C. 1097; 44 S.L.R. 766; 15 S.L.T. 165.

"Taking" articles belonging to another—Necessity for innuendo.

In an action of damages for slander by a housemaid in a hotel against a resident in the hotel, the pursuer averred that the defender had accused her of "having removed a quantity of whisky and claret from bottles belonging to him, and which were lying in his bedroom, during his absence at breakfast," and that upon her complaining to her mistress that she had been so accused, he had repeated the accusation, saying that it was the pursuer who "took" it. Held that, in order to make her averments relevant, she must add to them the innuendo "intending to represent, and representing, that the pursuer stole" liquor belonging to the defender.

Failure of message girl to deliver goods sent from shop.

A message girl employed by a milliner was sent to deliver a cape to a customer. The customer stated on several occasions that the message girl had not delivered the cape to her. The cape was found in the customer's house and criminal proceedings which had been taken against the message girl were thereupon dropped. In an action of damages brought by the message girl against the customer the Court held that it was not proved that the defender had charged the pursuer with stealing the cape, and that the statements proved were not slanderous.

—Lodging information with police authorities.

Circumstances under which an issue was allowed where a threat to inform the police was innuendoed as implying a charge of theft.

Kennedy v John Henderson & Son, (O.H.) 1903, 11 S.L.T. 156.

—Words used in themselves inoffensive.

An inquiry as to missing property, accompanied by the searching of the pursuer, held to support an innuendo of theft, though the words used were in themselves inoffensive.

Adams v Templeton & Co., (O.H.) 1913, 2 S.L.T. 241.

—Law clerk removing his private papers on leaving office—Employer requesting information as to what clerk had removed.

A conveyancing clerk in a law office who had resigned his situation left the office taking with him two tin boxes which contained his private papers. After emptying them he returned them to the office. Some weeks afterwards the senior partner of the firm wrote a letter to the clerk asking him to explain what he had removed on the day when he left the office. Held that the letter would not bear an innuendo of dishonesty in the absence of extrinsic facts showing that it was intended to be defamatory.

Allen v Blair, (O.H.) 1895, 3 S.L.T. 126.

Forgery—Statement in pleadings that writ founded on as holograph of a party was not so.

The defender in an action of removing produced a missive of lease, which, he averred, was holograph of the pursuer, and was signed by the pursuer in presence of the defender and three witnesses. The pursuer denied that the missive of lease was in his writing. In an action of damages for slander, held that a jury were entitled to take the view that the denial was an accusation of forgery.

—Forging and uttering promissory note—Letter by payee of note to one of the granters.

The creditor in a promissory note, granted as security for a debt payable by instalments, wrote to A, one of the granters, "The promissory note handed by you to me, signed by yourself, B & Co., and B, was presented to-day to B for payment of the instalment now past due. He repudiates all knowledge of the said note, and

I have therefore to inform you that unless the full amount of the promissory note is now paid to me before eleven o'clock to-morrow, I shall consider it necessary to hand the case in to the procurator-fiscal." Held that the letter was capable of bearing the innuendo that A had been guilty of forgery and uttering a forged document knowing it to be forged.

Letter inciting to violence—Authorship attributed to pursuer—Issue.

In an action of damages the pursuer averred that the defenders, the publishers of a newspaper, had published an anonymous letter "intending to convey to members of the public that it was written by the pursuer," and had commented thereon. He stated that the letter was not written by him, and averred that the letter falsely and calumniously represented the pursuer as "longing for an opportunity of committing murder on his Roman Catholic fellow-citizens, or at all events of shedding their blood in civil commotion." On the terms of the letter the Lord Ordinary allowed an issue whether the letter designedly held the pursuer up to public hatred and contempt. The Court held (1) that the words could be innuendoed as an incitement to riot and bloodshed; and (2) that it was slanderous to attribute to the pursuer the authorship of the letter. Terms of the issue adjusted to try the cause.

"Deserving of imprisonment"—Farm servant dismissed—Innuendo of criminal offence against law for prevention of cruelty to animals.

A farm servant was dismissed by his master for alleged cruelty to a horse. The servant made a claim against the master, who wrote to his agents in reply—"He ought to be proud I did not give him six months' imprisonment, and he well deserved it." In an action of damages for slander by the servant against the master, an issue was allowed as to whether the defender sent the letter complained of "and whether the said letter is of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely, calumniously, and maliciously represents that the pursuer had committed a criminal offence against the laws for the prevention of cruelty to animals."

Campbell v M'Lachlan, (O.H.) 1896, 4 S.L.T. 143.

Adulteration of food.

In an action of damages for slander the pursuer, a baker, averred that the defender, who was a doctor and the chief magistrate of the town, had stated that he would probably have the pursuer's premises examined, as, according to the law, peace officers might, by warrants, search bakers' premises, and if any adulterated bread or flour were found, the same might be seized and disposed of. The pursuer innuendoed this statement as representing that he kept, in violation of the law, adulterated bread or flour on his premises. Held that the innuendo was admissible, and that, as innuendoed, the statement amounted to a charge of dishonesty and was slanderous.

Broomfield v Greig, 1868, 6 M. 563; 40 J. 299; 5 S.L.R. 367.

Passing off inferior goods as goods of A.

A firm, which manufactured a coffee essence called "Camp" coffee, inserted in a newspaper an advertisement which began "Truth will prevail," and narrated that complaints had been received that certain grocers (who were not named), when they were asked for "Camp" coffee, were by false statements deceiving the public and inducing them to buy an inferior coffee, which was palmed off on the public as being the same as "Camp"; that no fewer than seventy-four grocers had made these statements or similar statements; and that the firm had taken proceedings against thirty-five of them. In an action of damages for slander at the instance of one of the grocers proceeded against, the pursuer averred that the advertisement was of and concerning him, and represented that he acted dishonestly in the conduct of his business. Held that the advertisement, read as a whole, was capable of bearing this innuendo, and an issue allowed.

Deceit—Entering into contract under false pretences.

A theatre manager having cancelled an engagement between himself and an actor, alleging that the actor had not performed in first-class style, wrote to the actor in the course of certain subsequent correspondence in the following terms:—"You made your engagement under false pretences. You advertise what you are not capable of performing." In an action of damages by the actor against the manager, held that the letter being innuendoed to mean that the pursuer had wilfully deceived the defender was sufficient to found an issue.

Evading payment of debts.

An exciseman brought an action of damages for slander against a grocer in respect of certain statements contained in letters written by the defender, which the pursuer sought to innuendo as representing that the pursuer dishonestly intended to take advantage of the exemption of his salary as a civil servant from arrest to evade payment of his just debts. Circumstances in which the Lord Ordinary assoltized the defender, holding that there was no issuable matter in the record.

Dishonourable character.

The proprietor of a house wrote to the agent of his tenant (Macrae), who had ceased to occupy the premises—"That horrid man Macrae will never get a penny from me, and you know that as long as he keeps the key he is liable for the rent. There were several applicants for the place at a reduced rent, on account of its being occupied by him. I do believe that he would be mobbed if he was appearing in the Strath. His statement of facts were a tissue of falsehoods." In an action of damages for slander by the tenant, held that the words would bear the innuendo "that the pursuer is of dishonourable character."

In a letter by a landlord to his tenant complaining of the failure of the latter to make immediate payment of a debt alleged to be due by him under a reference to an arbiter, the writer stated—"I am surprised at your conduct, which you must see is very dishonourable." Held that the letter was not actionable.

Conduct inferring hypocrisy, deceit, and treachery — Privilege — Malice — Sufficiency of averments of malice.

In an action of damages for slander brought by a Glasgow licence-holder against two other licence-holders in the city, the pursuer averred that, in view of the provisions of the Temperance (Scotland) Act, 1913, the licence-holders in the city had resolved, as their official policy, to seek to prevent the requisite number of signatures to requisition forms for a poll under that Act being obtained, by themselves abstaining from signing forms and by distributing leaflets urging others to abstain, and that the pursuer had actively and openly supported that policy. He further averred that the defenders acting in concert had, to his serious prejudice, falsely, calumniously, and maliciously circulated a statement, which they both knew to be untrue, to the effect that he had signed a requisition form, and that they had thereby represented that he was a hypocrite, and was acting deceitfully and treacherously to his colleagues in the trade, and that that had in fact been the interpretation placed upon the statement. The occasion on which the defenders made the statement was privileged. The defenders admitted making the statement, but averred that in so doing they had relied upon an admission made to one of them by the pursuer himself that he had signed a requisition form. The pursuer averred that the requisition forms were open to public inspection; and he denied that he had ever signed such a requisition form or had stated to any one that he had done so, and averred that both the defenders knew that he had never made such a statement.

Held (1) that, in the circumstances, the statement complained of was reasonably capable of the innuendo averred, and was defamatory; and (2) that malice had been relevantly averred.

Obtaining public contract by dishonest and improper means.

Terms of newspaper article which were held to be capable of bearing the innuendo that the lowest offerer for a public contract had secured the contract by dishonest and improper means.

Corrupt acting in official capacity—Newspaper—Comments on matter of public interest—Criticism of position of architect to school board—Criticism of system or of individual.

An architect was employed by a school board under an agreement by which he acted as architect, and received the ordinary commission, in the case of alterations or enlargements of existing buildings, but where new buildings were erected the work was thrown open to public competition. An article in a newspaper, in commenting upon the proceedings at a meeting of the school board at which it appeared that the cost of certain proposed enlargements of an existing school according to the tenders received would be nearly double the estimate of cost prepared by the architect, referred to the large sums expended by the school board on enlargements, and added, with reference to the terms of the architect's employment—"The rule as interpreted is an absurdity, and it puts a premium upon a certain kind of advice." In an action of damages for slander, held that the statement was a fair criticism of the system and not a criticism of the pursuer as an individual, and that it would not bear an innuendo to the effect that the pursuer in his position of architect had acted corruptly for his personal benefit.

Literary criticism—Charge of deceiving the public.

An atlas was published entitled "The Edinburgh Educational Atlas of Modern Geography, with complete index, by W. & A. K. Johnston" (being the firm under which the publisher carried on business). A review of the atlas contained a statement that the atlas, though bearing the name of A. Keith Johnston, was the work of neither the primus nor the secundus of that name and lacked their geographical acumen, and also went into severe criticism of it. The publisher of the atlas brought an action of damages against the proprietor of the journal for slander, and averred that the article represented that the pursuer had falsely, and for the purpose of deceiving the public, issued as the work of A. Keith Johnston an atlas which was not the work of either the first or the second of that name, but of persons not skilled in making an atlas. An issue was allowed. The jury found for the pursuer. The Court refused to disturb the verdict as being contrary to the evidence.

Observed (per Lord Justice-Clerk Moncreiff) that if the critic, instead of stating as a matter of fact that the atlas was not the work of either the father or the son, and making that statement of fact the explanation of the inaccuracies which were found in it, had said that, looking to the abounding errors in the atlas, it could not be the work of these experienced men, the innuendo could not have been maintained.

Criticism of farm management.

Terms of a newspaper article criticising the management of a farm which were held to entitle the tenant of the farm to an issue "whether the said article . . . falsely and calumniously represents the pursuer as being dishonest, or makes similar false and calumnious representations of and concerning the pursuer."

Dun v Bain, 1877, 4 R. 317; 14 S.L.R. 248.

Threat to report matter to the authorities—Misappropriation of money—Letter from superior to subordinate in arrears.

The district superintendent of an insurance company wrote a letter to a district collector of the company (who was bound to account to the superintendent and was behindhand in his payments) ordering him to pay over every penny he had collected by a certain day, and stating that he (the superintendent) would be obliged to report the matter to the authorities. The collector averred that the letter represented that he had been guilty of dishonest misappropriation of money belonging to the insurance company. Held that this innuendo was inadmissible in view of the relationship between the superintendent and a collector who was in arrears.

Two partners in a joint adventure had a dispute as to the settlement of the accounts of the joint adventure. Terms of letters written by the law agents of one of the parties to the law agents of the other threatening to communicate with the procurator-fiscal which, it was held, would not support an innuendo that the other party had acted dishonestly.

Hunt v Paton, (O.H.) 1904, 12 S.L.T. 553.

Misappropriation of money.

In an action of damages for slander the pursuer averred that his firm of Ramsay Brothers had been in the practice of collecting accounts for the firm of MacLay & Co., that on 28th December, 1888, and on 5th March, 1889, the cashier of Ramsay Brothers had collected two accounts due to MacLay & Co. by a customer for £5 5s. and £4 4s. respectively, and that these sums had been credited to MacLay & Co.; that Ramsay Brothers had been sequestrated on 6th May, 1889; that on 20th February, 1890, MacLay & Co. had written to the pursuer—"Should we be forced to insist on [the customer] paying us the accounts she has already paid to you . . . she threatens to place the affair in the hands of her law agent, and you may then find yourself in an awkward situation, as he will in all probability report to the fiscal. If you wish to save yourself from unpleasant consequences you will let us hear from you without delay." The pursuer innuendoed this letter to mean that he had dishonestly appropriated the money to his own purposes. The pursuer did not deny on record the liability of his firm to account, or their failure to do so, and could not explain what had become of the money. Held (1) that the pursuer was entitled to an issue; and (2) that the word "maliciously" should not be inserted therein.

Misappropriation of money.

In an action of slander brought by a salesman in the employment of a milk company against the company, the pursuer averred that he had left his work on account of a dispute between himself and the company regarding an alleged shortage in his accounts; that he had received a visit from Bell, a foreman in the defenders' employment, who said to him—"I'll give you a piece of advice. If you are wise, you'll turn out to work, because I have been instructed by Mr. Watson" (the defenders' manager) "to place the matter in the hands of the police"; that by this statement Bell falsely and calumniously represented that the pursuer was guilty of dishonestly appropriating the money collected by him on behalf of the defenders, and had rendered himself liable to criminal prosecution on account thereof. Held that the action was irrelevant, in respect that the words would not bear the meaning sought to be put upon them and were not slanderous.

Theft.

In an action of damages for slander the pursuer averred that he had let a machine on hire to W, and that on W becoming insolvent, and granting a trust deed, he (the pursuer) had removed the machine from his premises; that the defender, the trustee's agent, wrote to the pursuer a letter threatening, unless evidence of the pursuer's right to remove the machine was at once produced, to place the matter in the hands of the fiscal without further notice; and that the statements in the letter represented that the pursuer was guilty of the crime of theft. Held that the letter would bear the innuendo, and that the pursuer was entitled to an issue; that the word "maliciously" should not be put in the issue.

Wilson v Purvis, 1890, 18 R. 72; 28 S.L.R. 76.

(b) Imputation of Immoral Conduct.

Exercising evil moral influence—"Source of evil."

In an action of damages for slander, the pursuer averred that the defender, a Roman Catholic priest, had said to the pursuer, who was one of the defender's parishioners—"You are a source of evil in the parish, and the sooner you are out of it the better"; and proposed an issue with the innuendo that the words complained of represented that the pursuer exercised an evil moral influence on those with whom he came in contact. Held that the words complained of were not in themselves defamatory, and that in the absence of any averment as to some particular moral fault or evil influence being referred to by the defender, the innuendo proposed was not sufficient to entitle the pursuer to an issue. Observations (per Lord McLaren) on actions for verbal slander.

Keeping disreputable house—Anonymous letter.

A man wrote an anonymous letter to his sister-in-law, whose husband was at sea, in which he stated that Mrs. B, the person with whom she lived, had not been her friend in days past, and then "the writer hopes to hear of different behaviour and not going under the roof of any one but the one you should, viz., your mother, or go to some place where drink and your present companions won't get near you, so that temptation will be out of your way." Held that these words would not found an innuendo that Mrs. B and her husband were keepers of a house of disreputable character.

Prostitution—"Street walker"—Whether intended and understood in sense injurious to character.

A schoolmistress, acting on information that a pupil teacher of fifteen years under her care was in the habit of walking with young men in the street and of dressing gaudily, scolded her in the presence of the other teachers, calling her, as the girl alleged, a "street walker." The girl stayed for nearly two years in the school without complaint. After leaving it for another reason, she raised an action of damages for slander. Held that the words were not intended by the defender, and were not understood by the pursuer or others, to bear any meaning injurious to the character of the defender.

Unchastity — Newspaper — False birth notice.

The publisher of a newspaper is not exempt from liability for damages merely because a statement of fact in regard to a private individual published by him is not ex facie defamatory, if in the circumstances it is defamatory. A newspaper among the notices of births stated that A B had given birth to a child at a certain date. A B raised an action of damages against the publisher on the ground that the statement was false, and that it was defamatory in respect that the date stated was within two months of her marriage. Held that the action was relevant, and that the pursuer was entitled to an issue.

False statement not ex facie libellous — Advertisement for wet nurse inserted in newspaper—Woman married five months previously.

A newspaper published an advertisement for a "wet nurse wanted immediately," application to be made at a certain public-house. The publican and his wife, who were the only married persons living on the premises, raised an action of damages against the publishers on the ground that, as they had been only five months married at the date of the advertisement, it contained an imputation on their character, and proposed the following issue:—Whether the defenders published the notice "meaning thereby that the female pursuer had within five months of her marriage given birth to a child of which the male pursuer was the father; that each of the pursuers had been guilty of antenuptial fornication and was of immoral character." The Court dismissed the action, holding that the words complained of were not libellous in themselves, and would not bear the innuendo.

Want of womanly delicacy.

Terms of a magazine article which were held to entitle a pursuer, a girl of seventeen, to an issue bearing the innuendo "that the pursuer undressed and went to bed in the presence of strangers of both sexes, and was thus chargeable with want of proper womanly delicacy."

A B v William Blackwood & Sons, 1902, 5 F. 25; 40 S.L.R. 20; 10 S.L.T. 311.

Charge of circulating a defamatory statement—Charge of being the author of indecent language—Relevancy—Specification.

In an action of damages for slander, the pursuer alleged that scandalous rumours affecting the moral character of the defender had been in currency in the town of F, and that an obscene inscription, which he believed to be applicable to the defender, had been inscribed on a wall; that the defender had, in the presence of witnesses, accused the pursuer of circulating the rumours, and of being the author or writer of the obscene inscription. The pursuer did not state that the rumours were false. He proposed an issue whether the defender had, in presence of witnesses, falsely and calumniously accused him of circulating statements of a defamatory and incriminatory character, and of being the author or writer of lewd and immoral language regarding her. The Court dismissed the action as irrelevant.

(c) Use of Opprobrious Epithets.

(133)

Using bad language—Complaint to committee of association for sport.

A referee at a football match complained by letter to the committee of the football union that one of the players had during the match made offensive remarks about him. At a meeting of the committee held to investigate the matter, the referee gave evidence in support of his complaint, and stated that the player had called him "a bloody little brute." In an action of damages for slander the player set forth several innuendoes as to the import of the same words. Held that the statements complained of were not per se defamatory, and that the pursuer had not set forth a proper innuendo of a different and libellous meaning.

Censure by committee of sporting association—Order to apologise.

The committee of a football union passed a resolution that A, a player in a football match, had during the match used offensive language to the referee, that he be severely censured and ordered to apologise to the referee. The resolution was published in the press. In an action of damages for slander at the instance of A the Court allowed an issue against the individual members of the committee.

Drunkenness — Charge of being tipsy on specified occasion.

In an action of damages for slander by the holder of an accident insurance policy against the insurance company the pursuer averred that with regard to a claim on his policy made by him against the company, the secretary of the company said to him—"The company are in no respect liable to you under the policy. I know that it was not an accident in your case at all, and that you fell and sustained your injury because you were tipsy at the time." The Lord Ordinary allowed an issue which innuendoed the statement as meaning that on the day of the accident the pursuer had drunk alcoholic liquor to excess, in consequence of which he fell and sustained injuries.

Oliver v Laidlaw, (O.H.) 1895, 3 S.L.T. 142.

"Informer"—Irishman.

In an action of damages for slander raised on the allegation that the defender had called the pursuer an "informer," the pursuer averred that he was an Irishman, and that the use concerning him of that word imported and represented "that he was a man who had treacherously, for the sake of reward, or for similar and disreputable motives, given information to the Crown or its executive against Irishmen or others." Held that the action was relevant, and an issue with that innuendo allowed.

"Attempt at extortion" — Privilege — Letter written by law agent on behalf of client—Necessity for averment of malice.

One law agent writing to another repudiating on behalf of a client a claim put forward by the other on behalf of one of his clients, after dealing with the claim in detail, said—"We all regard Mr. E's claim as nothing less than an attempt at extortion. . . . But knowing your personal, family and professional reputation, we do not include you in any way in the reflections we make against Mr. E." In an action for slander by E, held (1) that the words used could not be innuendoed as slanderous; and (2) that in any event they were privileged, and there being no averments from which malice could be inferred, the action fell to be dismissed.

"Dirty low scum"—Unfitness to associate with respectable people.

Held that to call a law agent a "dirty low scum" was defamatory, and that to say to another person regarding him, "I am sorry to see you in such company" might be innuendoed as defamatory.

Shepherd v Elliot, (O.H.) 1895, 3 S.L.T. 115.

Charge of wilfully and persistently making false and malicious accusations.

Held that the statement, "Your house-keeper has been accusing me of charging you for more milk than I supplied. The accusation is untrue," would bear the innuendo "meaning thereby that the pursuer had wilfully and persistently made false and malicious accusations against the defender," but that the innuendo was not defamatory.

Paton v Edine, (O.H.) 1898, 6 S.L.T. 191.

Charge of having relative confined as lunatic, although knowing that he was not insane.

In an action of damages for slander the pursuer averred that (1) in a letter published in a newspaper the defender had falsely, calumniously, and maliciously represented the pursuer as having illegally and wrongfully had his father-in-law, A B, confined in a lunatic asylum as of unsound mind when A B was not of unsound mind, and had done this when he knew that A B was sane; and (2) had corruptly and illegally used his public position as chairman of a parish council for that object and with that effect. Issues disallowed on the ground that the article complained of did not admit of the innuendo that the pursuer knew that his father-in-law was not insane, and that quoad ultra the statements in the article were admitted to be true.

Mackenzie v Anderson, (O.H.) 1900, 7 S.L.T. 469.

(2) IMPUTATIONS RELATING TO BUSINESS OR PROFESSION.

(a) Imputations Affecting Credit.

Financial difficulties.

A newspaper report of certain proceedings in bankruptcy bore that the bankrupt stated in Court that the pursuers were very hard up and that he had financed them from time to time, and made advances to them from time to time to enable business to be carried on. The pursuers averred that the bankrupt made no such statements, and they innuendoed the statements to mean that they were in financial difficulties and were being financed by means of accommodation bills and advances of money by a certain person. Held that the innuendo was admissible, and that as innuendoed the statement was defamatory.

Wright & Greig v Outram & Co., 1889,

In an action of damages for slander the pursuers complained of a letter written by the defenders in response to an inquiry as to their credit, and which stated of the pursuers—"They do a fairly extensive trade, but the account, from various causes, is not regarded with much confidence in these markets, although in certain quarters they appear to be in receipt of moderate credit. The capital at command, however, is limited, and the payments of late years have been slow and unsatisfactory, but their settlements for years have always been dilatory. At the same time, several of their shops are not thought to be paying, and it is feared that credit transactions meanwhile represent more than an average risk." The letter also referred to two small debt decrees obtained against the pursuers. The pursuers innuendoed the letter as representing that they were in financial difficulties. Held that the letter was actionable.

Bayne & Thomson v Stubbs, Limited, 1901,

"Cleaned out and lost his all"—Solicitor.

In an action of damages for slander the pursuer, a solicitor in a county town holding several public appointments of trust, averred that the defender had stated that the pursuer had been "cleaned out and lost his all," and that in consequence the pursuer had suffered in his reputation and business. Held that the pursuer was entitled to an issue, on the ground that it was not unreasonable to suppose that the statement might have injured his reputation and credit.

A B v C D, 1904, 7 F. 22; 42 S.L.R.
37; 12 S.L.T. 395.

(144)

Financial embarrassment.

The pursuer negotiated with a firm of wine merchants for a loan to enable him to buy a hotel business. He represented to them that he was not indebted for an advance to any other wine merchant from whom he was bound to take his supplies, and they were willing to make the loan on the usual condition that he should take his supplies of wine and spirits from them. Thereafter, as the result of inquiries, the defenders wrote to the pursuer withdrawing the offer on the ground that "we have learned that you have bills running with other wine merchants in Leith, and as you expressly told us that you were not indebted to any wine merchant, we have decided that we must not give the advance that you require." Held that the letter would not bear an innuendo that it "represented that the pursuer was in a state of financial embarrassment."

Robertson v John M. Scott & Co., (O.H.)
1903, 10 S.L.T. 575.

(145)

The defender, the owner of a hotel, agreed to let it to the pursuer. The pursuer negotiated for a loan from a firm of wine merchants to enable him to buy the hotel business, but the wine merchants refused to make the loan on learning that a representation that he had made to them to the effect that he was not indebted to any other wine merchants from whom he was bound to take his supplies was untrue. The wine merchants communicated the fact to the defender, who then telegraphed to the pursuer—"We agreed verbally to accept you as tenant of the hotel on certain representations. These representations are not right. We withdraw our consent to a lease." Held that the telegram would not bear an innuendo that it represented the pursuer as being in a state of financial embarrassment.

Robertson v Taylor, (O.H.) 1903, 10

Black list—List of names of persons against whom decree in absence pronounced.

A private firm instituted an agency for "enabling the trading classes to communicate one to another their knowledge of doubtful and habit and repute bad payers." The firm issued to their subscribers a list headed "List of Names," Edinburgh, 1885, and containing simply names and addresses. The list contained the names (to a certain extent selected) of persons against whom decree in absence had been granted in the Small Debt Court of the county during several months previous to publication. Prefixed to the list was a leaflet headed "Caution," which stated, "It is possible that there are names contained in this list of people to whom credit under certain circumstances might be given, but it is recommended that use be made of the inquiry department of the agency before the entailing the risk." In an action of damages for slander, raised by a person whose name appeared in the list, against the firm, held that the defenders had slandered the pursuer.

Representation that person is unworthy of commercial credit—List of names and addresses compiled from "black list."

A local association of traders issued to its members a list of the names and addresses of certain persons in the district. The list bore no title and contained no comment, but it was admittedly compiled from the "black lists." A person brought an action of damages for slander against the association, in which he averred that the list was known in the district as the "black list," and that the defenders by inserting his name in it had represented that he was unworthy of business credit. Held that the publication of the pursuer's name was defamatory.

—List of decrees in absence—Insolvency—Erroneous entry.

In an action of damages by a firm of tradesmen against the publishers of a newspaper called "Stubbs' Weekly Gazette," the pursuers averred that the defenders carried on for profit a business which they described in their advertisements as a means of enabling traders to avoid making bad debts; that the publication had a special portion devoted to the publication of names of traders and others by and against whom decrees in absence had been taken; that the name of any trader appearing in that list was looked on with grave suspicion as to solvency; that the defenders, on 21st February, 1895, had published in a list of persons against whom decrees in absence had been taken the names of the pursuers, the decree having in fact been a decree in foro; and that by the statement thus made the defenders falsely represented that the pursuers were unable to pay their debts, and were in insolvent circumstances or pecuniary embarrassment. Held that taking the averments of fact with the innuendo, the pursuers had set forth a relevant case and were entitled to an issue.

—List of decrees in absence—Erroneous entry.

In an action of damages for slander, the pursuers obtained an issue whether the publication of their name as defenders in a list of decrees in absence in "Stubbs' Weekly Gazette" falsely represented that they were unable to pay their debts. It was proved that the "Gazette" was a publication for the purpose of giving traders information as to persons who were in financial difficulties, and that the list of decrees in absence was prefixed by a note which bore—"In no case does the publication of the decree imply inability to pay on the part of the persons named." The Sheriff Court books showed that the decree in question was not in absence, but of consent. Held that the jury were entitled to take the view that the publication was a representation that the person named was unable to pay his debts; and that the same inference would not have arisen if the defenders had stated, as was the fact, that the decree was of consent.

—List of decrees in absence—Erroneous entry.

An issue of a trade journal known as "Stubbs' Weekly Gazette" contained a list headed "Extracts from the Court books of decrees in absence in the Small Debt Courts. Note.—It is probable that some of the decrees have been sisted, settled, or paid; and in no case does publication of the decree imply inability to pay on the part of any one named, or anything more than the fact that the entry published appeared in the Court books." In an action of damages for slander at the instance of a tradesman, whose name was erroneously included in the list in respect of a decree for £9 19s. 6d., the facts being that the debt had been paid and the action dismissed, the pursuer innuendoed the entry as falsely and calumniously representing that he was unable to pay his debts. Held that the entry, when read in conjunction with the explanatory note, would not bear the innuendo suggested.

—List of decrees in absence—Erroneous entry—Imputation against credit.

An issue of a trade journal known as "Stubbs' Weekly Gazette" contained a list headed "Extracts from the Court Books of Decrees in Absence in the Small Debt Courts. Note.— . . . It is probable that some of the decrees have been sisted, settled, or paid; and in no case does publication of the decree imply inability to pay on the part of any one named, or anything more than the fact that the entry published appeared in the Court books." A tradesman, whose name was included in this list by error, as no decree had been pronounced against him, brought an action of damages for slander against the proprietors of the journal, in which the entry was innuendoed as falsely representing "that the pursuer was given to or had begun to refuse or delay to make payment of his debts, and that he was not a person to whom credit should be given." Held that the entry would bear the innuendo put upon it.

—List of decrees in absence.

In an action of damages by a commission agent against the publishers of "Stubbs' Weekly Gazette" for publishing, under the heading of "Extracts of decrees pronounced in absence of the defenders, although appearance may have been made by them or on their behalf at the original or adjourned diet," a notice of a decree against him for £2 0s. 10d. in the Small Debt Court, bearing to be in absence, the pursuer averred that the notice was not complete; that it omitted to set forth entries in the record of the decree in the Small Debt Court book which showed that the sum sued for was £2 5s., and that the decree for £2 0s. 10d. was pronounced, not at the first diet but at an adjourned diet; that consequently it was not a fair and full report of the Small Debt Court proceedings, but conveyed, and was intended to convey, to the readers of this "Gazette" that the pursuer was unable to pay his debts. Held that the pursuer had failed to set forth a relevant case, in respect that the excerpt published in the "Gazette" was an accurate representation of those items of the record in the Small Debt Court book which it set forth, and that the omission of the items averred by the pursuer was not to his prejudice.

Insurance company—Statement that company to be taken over by rival.

Held that to say of an insurance company that it was about to be taken over with all its business by a rival company would not amount to a slander although it might be injurious to the company's business.

General Accident Assurance Corporation v Miller, (O.H.) 1902, 9 S.L.T. 510.

(b) Imputations of Unfitness for Duties.

Officer—False statement that a commanding officer gave an order to his men to surrender—Newspaper.

A newspaper published an article purporting to be based on the experiences of a corporal in a Highland regiment which surrendered in the retreat from Mons in 1914. The article stated that, during an engagement in the retreat, Colonel G, of that regiment, after saying that further fighting was only a useless sacrifice of life, ordered the men under his command to throw down their arms and surrender. In an action of damages for slander brought by Colonel G against the proprietors of the newspaper, the defenders accepted the pursuer's statement that no order to surrender had been given by him. Averments upon which held (1) that the pursuer was entitled to an issue, but (2) that an innuendo must be set forth in the issue; and an issue approved containing the innuendo that the statements falsely and calumniously represented that the pursuer was the officer responsible for the surrender, and that he had failed in his duty as a soldier.

Assistant minister—Charge of being insubordinate, inefficient, and unfit for position.

Held that a statement contained in a letter written by a minister to his elders regarding his assistant to the effect that "he has done what I expressly forbade him to do; he has neglected to do what I specially desired him to do," was not defamatory and would not bear the innuendo that the assistant was "insubordinate, inefficient, careless, and neglectful of his duties, and unfit for the position which he occupied as assistant minister."

Barclay v Manuel, (O.H.) 1902, 10 S.L.T. 450.

Schoolmaster—Charge of incompetence—Anonymous letter in newspaper.

Terms of an anonymous letter in a newspaper with reference to the state of a public school which were held to entitle the master of the school to an issue whether it represented that the pursuer was unfit for his post, and that it was the duty of the board to dismiss him.

Inspector of poor—Unfitness owing to drunken habits.

An inspector of poor and registrar for a parish brought an action for slander against a member of the parish council. A special meeting of the parish council had been called to consider a motion to rescind a resolution passed at a prior meeting to the effect that the pursuer should be asked to resign his position as clerk to the council, and before the vote was taken the defender stated that when out shooting on a certain date the pursuer was so drunk that he lost himself and the party he was with and joined another party. The Lord Ordinary approved an issue containing an innuendo to the effect that the pursuer was, owing to drunken habits, unfit to occupy a public position.

Tait v Morrison, (O.H.) 1913, 2 S.L.T. 325.

Accountant—Unfitness for office of trustee for creditors.

At a meeting of creditors an accountant was nominated trustee on the debtor's estate. Held that a statement that he was unfit for the post was prima facie defamatory.

Oliver v Barnet, (O.H.) 1895, 3 S.L.T. 163.

Shepherd—Charge of incompetence—Master and servant.

A farmer, charged in a sheriff court with failure to give notice of sheep scab among his sheep, pleaded guilty, and, before sentence, handed to the sheriff a written statement containing, inter alia, these words—"I left the management of my sheep stock entirely in the hands of my shepherd, who did not inform me that there were any signs of scab among them." In an action of damages the shepherd innuendoed the statement as branding him with neglect of his duties, and with unfitness and incompetence as a shepherd. Held that the words of the statement could not reasonably bear the innuendo.

Farmer—Charge of unskilful farming.

In an action of damages for slander the pursuer innuendoed the words complained of as representing that he, in the "course of his tenancy, worked a farm carelessly and unskilfully, and that the farm was left in an exhausted condition." The Court allowed an issue.

M'Keand v Maxwell, 1896, 3 S.L.T. 321.

Superintendent of lunatic asylum—Allegation of professional incapacity—"Quack."

In an action of damages for slander at the instance of C, the superintendent of a district lunatic asylum (who was admittedly not a qualified medical practitioner), complaining that the defender had said of him—"What does that mannie C know about treating lunatics? He is just a quack. We will sack him yet," held that the pursuer was entitled to an issue with the innuendo that these words represented "that he was unfit for his duties as superintendent, that he did not know his work, was not properly qualified for the work in which he was engaged, and ought to be dismissed from his post."

Engineer—Incompetence.

An engineer in the employment of a firm of shipbuilders brought an action of damages for slander against the assistant manager of the firm. The statement complained of was made by the defender in the course of evidence before a court of arbitration under the Munitions of War Act, 1915, and was to the effect that the pursuer was dismissed because he did work which cost £180 to put right. The pursuer innuendoed the statement to mean that he had been grossly incompetent and lacking in skill as an engineer. Held that, as innuendoed, the statement complained of was defamatory.

Slack v Barr, (O.H.) 1918, 1 S.L.T. 133.

Criticism by customer of tradesman's employee—Skirt cutter—Unskilfulness.

The pursuer in a slander action (a skirt cutter) averred that the defender, while she was having a skirt fitted at a ladies' tailor's shop where the pursuer was employed, stated in the presence and hearing of the manager of the shop that the pursuer "was grossly unfit for her duties, and that her services should be dispensed with," and that "A B (another ladies' tailor) has got a splendid skirt fitter. Why don't you try and get her to come here?" On another occasion, while again having the skirt fitted, she stated to the manager in the presence and hearing of the pursuer—"She cannot cut a skirt. She does not even know how to begin to fit a skirt. She does not know her business at all." The pursuer sought to innuendo the words used by the lady as meaning that she was unfit to hold the post of a skirt cutter and fitter. The Lord Ordinary dismissed the action as irrelevant.

Wallace v Ford, (O.H.) 1903, 10 S.L.T. 555.

Master and servant—Criticism by master of servant's skill.

Observed (per Lord Stormonth-Darling, Ordinary)—"When a master confines himself to merely expressing an opinion about the incompetency or unskilfulness of a servant, it seems to me it would be dangerous to the proper carrying on of the work of society that he should be liable to an action of damages for slander."

Munro v Mudie, (O.H.) 1901, 9 S.L.T. 91.

Manager—Inattention and neglect—Issue—Malice.

The proprietor of several shops under different managers after dismissing B, one of his managers, sent a letter to his other managers (about fifty in number) stating with reference to B, whom he named—"I was greatly pained to find that a manager who had always been well treated was causing me loss by his inattention and lack of interest, and I was reluctantly compelled in the interests of my business to dismiss him." In an action of damages for slander raised by B against the proprietor the Court held that in the special circumstances B was entitled to an issue, but, as the letter was privileged, malice must be put in the issue. The issue allowed was in these terms—Whether the letter "falsely, calumniously, and maliciously represented that the pursuer had been guilty of such inattention and neglect of defender's interests, as manager of the defender's shop in Glasgow, that the defender had been compelled to dismiss him?"

Imputation by master against character of servant—Factor—Unfaithful in discharge of duty—Unfit to be trusted with custody of employer's property.

In an action of damages for defamation the pursuer, formerly a factor on the defender's estate, averred that the defender, by his law agent, presented to him a letter desiring him to give the law agent possession of all books, &c., and all the contents of the office safe, and that the law agent, on being asked for an explanation, said that the defender wished "to hold an investigation"; that the law agent thereupon demanded the keys of the repositories, and (the key of the safe being in possession of the pursuer's cashier, who was absent) proceeded to seal up the safe; that two days later two clerks, bearing a letter of authority from the law agent, arrived at the estate office, broke the seals, removed books, &c., from the safe, searched the whole premises, and thereafter took away with them books, papers, &c., all in presence of certain persons named; that the law agent's statements and actings were made and done on the defender's instructions, and represented to the pursuer and to the persons named that the pursuer had been unfaithful in the discharge of his duty, and

Servant — "Unjust steward" — Lack of specification.

A master in the course of a conversation with his servant on a privileged occasion said to the servant that he had been an unjust steward and unfaithful. Averments held to be too vague to be admitted to probation.

Pybus v Mackinnon, 1908, 45 S.L.R. 598; 15 S.L.T. 1066.

(c) Imputations of Improper Conduct.

Minister—Charge of dishonourable conduct unbecoming a minister—Terrible revelations.

Held that a letter published in a church magazine by the minister to the effect that he had "terrible revelations" to make regarding his assistant was defamatory, and that the words would bear the innuendo that "the pursuer had been guilty of conduct of a dishonourable nature unbecoming the character and sacred profession of a minister of the gospel."

Barclay v Manuel, (O.H.) 1902, 10 S.L.T. 450.

Assistant minister—"Broken . . . solemn pledges"—Innuendo.

Held that a statement contained in a letter written by a minister to his elders concerning his assistant, to the effect that the assistant had "broken every one of the solemn pledges which he gave me," was not defamatory and would not bear the innuendo that the assistant was "persistently untruthful and unfaithful to his solemn promise."

Barclay v Manuel, (O.H.) 1902, 10 S.L.T. 450.

Doctor—Professional negligence.

Where a letter reflected on a doctor's treatment of a patient the Lord Ordinary allowed an issue containing an innuendo that the letter represented the pursuer as guilty of gross professional negligence or unskillfulness in his treatment of the patient.

Simmers v Morton, (O.H.) 1900, 8 S.L.T. 285.

Baker—Statement that his bread was unfit for human food.

The pursuer, a baker, averred that the defender, a doctor practising in the same town, had stated that the bread baked by the pursuer was injurious to the health of those who consumed it, and unfit for human food. Held that the statement was not slanderous.

Broomfield v Greig, 1868, 6 M. 563; 40 J. 299; 5 S.L.R. 367.

Hotel-keeper overcharging at hotel—Necessity for innuendo.

The following paragraph appeared in the "variety" column of a newspaper—"I shall not sup again in the Albany Hotel. The other evening I was charged there 4s. 6d. for supper, consisting of an omelette, with certainly not more than half-a-dozen eggs, and the quality was by no means consistent with the price." In an action of damages for slander by the proprietor of the hotel against the publisher of the newspaper, held that the pursuer was entitled to an issue, and that an innuendo was not necessary.

Licence-holder—Charge of breach of certificate.

The chief constable of a burgh wrote to the manager of a hotel in the burgh in the following terms:—"It has come to my knowledge that on two occasions recently in connection with special licences in the Palace Hotel the neighbourhood was disturbed by the firing of shots or fireworks there, and I think it right to give notice that if there is any repetition of this or any other breach of the conditions of the licence, I will consider it my duty to strenuously oppose the granting of any special licences to the house in future." Held that the letter did not contain a charge of breach of the conditions of the licence and was not libellous.

Opinion (per Lord Trayner) that it is slanderous to charge an innkeeper with having committed a breach of his licence.

Charge of conducting business in a disorderly and illegal manner.

Terms of a newspaper article which were held to be incapable of bearing an innuendo that a publican had conducted his business in a disorderly and illegal manner.

Charge of shebeening.

A newspaper contained a letter to the editor in which the writer, after criticising the action of the licensing authorities of the district in taking away a licence in B, and referring to a conviction of another licence-holder in B of shebeening, continued—"I should like to ask if this was the first conviction against the same party." In an action of damages for slander, a publican in B averred that he had once been convicted of shebeening, and that the letter falsely represented that he had been more than once convicted of shebeening. Held that the pursuer was entitled to an issue whether the letter falsely represented that he had been more than once convicted of shebeen-ing.

—Charge of conducting a "shebeen"

—Veritas.

Cook v Gray, 1891, 29 S.L.R. 247, No. 195, infra.

(177)

—Charge of conduct inferring hypocrisy, deceit, and treachery towards other licence-holders—Signing requisition form under Temperance (Scotland) Act, 1913.

Police officer—Slander by chief constable in dismissing police officer.

Words used by a chief constable in dismissing a police officer which were held in the circumstances not to be slanderous.

Schoolmaster—Brutal treatment of pupil.

In an action of damages for slander by a schoolmaster against the parent of a pupil in respect of an alleged slander contained in a letter sent to two newspapers for publication, the Lord Ordinary allowed an issue as to whether the statement complained of falsely and calumniously represented that the pursuer thrashed a boy (giving his name) on a certain date in a brutal fashion.

Wright v Steel, (O.H.) 1909, 2 S.L.T. 265.

Publisher—Charge of deceiving the public as to authorship of atlas—Literary criticism.

Johnston v Dilke, 1875, 2 R. 836; 12 S.L.R. 486, No. 117, supra.

Newspaper proprietor—Writing offensive articles—Counter issue.

In an action of damages for slander the pursuer complained of a certain article in a newspaper owned and published by the defender, which stated, with regard to another newspaper—"It said some things in such offensive terms about so many people in the town that it is well to bear it in mind. We knew all the while the particular gentleman in whose interest the paper was run, and who wrote its most offensive articles, although that gentleman took every opportunity to deny all knowledge and connection with" it. "Little wonder that he did; the articles written by the editor and financier of the concern were such that any man holding a respectable, not to say responsible position, might well be ashamed of. We are in possession of the whole story from start to finish, and may publish it all some day, revealing the name of the gentleman who lay behind the hedge and shot his poisonous darts at well-known public men in this town." The defender admitted that this article in part referred to the pursuer, and averred that the newspaper alluded to was under the pursuer's control, and was financed by him; that certain articles specified by date and title which appeared in it were of an offensive character and were written by the pursuer, and that on various specified occasions the pursuer had denied all connection with it. The Court (1) allowed an issue whether the article complained of represented that the pursuer was editor and financier of the newspaper in question; that he wrote for that paper offensive articles of such a disreputable character that any respectable man would be ashamed of having written them; that he used the said paper as a means of anonymously defaming public men, and that notwithstanding he took opportunity falsely to deny all knowledge of and connection on his part with the said paper; and (2) allowed a counter issue whether the pursuer wrote the articles specified by the defender, and specifically referred to (but not set forth ad longum) in the schedule to the counter issue; whether they or some of them were offensive to well-known men in the town where they were published, and of such a character that a man in the pursuer's position ought to have been ashamed of having written them; and whether on several occasions he nevertheless denied any connection with that newspaper.

Signalman acting unfairly to fellow servants.

A paragraph in a railway magazine animadverted on the "fluffing" tactics of a signalman. The signalman brought an action of damages for slander, in which he sought to innuendo the paragraph as meaning that he was "guilty of practices which are unfair to his fellow servants, interfere with the efficient discharge of his duties as a signalman, and call for the animadversion and interference of his employers in the interests of his fellow servants of the railway company and of the safety of the public." Held that the proposed issue did not disclose a slander.

Dobson v The Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants, (O.H.) 1901, 8 S.L.T. 378.

(3) IMPUTATIONS AGAINST PUBLIC CHARACTER.

(183)

Candidate for Parliament—Charge of being a scoffer at religion—Newspaper article.

During a contest for a seat in Parliament a newspaper published an article concerning one of the candidates in which he was described as a "scoffer" who talked in a "morally offensive way" and spoke sarcastically about "God Almighty's earth." In an action of damages against the proprietor of the newspaper, held that the expression "scoffer" was prima facie defamatory, and that the candidate was entitled to an issue, whether the article represented him as a "scoffer" at religion, as morally offensive in his public addresses, and as sneering at divine government and providence.

Candidate at municipal election—Slander of candidate by elector—Charge of dishonest and disreputable bankruptcy.

In an action of damages for slander the pursuer averred that in the course of a municipal election in which he had been a candidate, the defender, who was an elector, had falsely stated that the pursuer had been bankrupt, and that he had made a very bad failure, meaning thereby that it was a dishonest and disreputable failure, and that his creditors had received only 1s. 6d. per £, and that the pursuer was in consequence an unsuitable person to represent the electors. Held that the words alleged to have been used by the defender might reasonably bear the innuendo put upon them.

Candidate for office—Criticism of qualifications of candidate.

Observations as to how far adverse criticisms on the qualifications of a candidate for a public office are actionable where no special privilege can be pleaded.

Candidate for office in Good Templar Lodge—Charge of "deceitful and dishonourable conduct"—"Sharp practice"—"Crooked ways."

A newspaper published a report of a meeting of a Good Templar Lodge, headed "Mr. A's Crooked Ways," and referring to certain conduct of his as "sharp practice." The news-bill of the day also contained the words—"Mr. A and his crooked ways." Terms of the article which were held to be incapable of bearing the innuendo that Mr. A had been guilty of deceitful and dishonourable conduct, and that he habitually indulged in conduct that was unfair, deceitful, and dishonourable.

Justice of the peace—Charge of unfaithfulness to public trust.

Observed (per Lord President Robertson) that a charge of infidelity on the part of a justice of the peace to the public trust is slanderous.

Magistrate—Newspaper criticism.

In an action of damages for slander against the publisher of a newspaper, on account of statements as to the manner in which the pursuer, who was a burgh magistrate, discharged the duties of that office, held that the issue for trial of the case must contain an innuendo that he was by these statements represented "to be a person who had been guilty of wilful falsehood and of dishonesty, and as a magistrate who disgraced that office, and who used it for the purpose of gratifying his private spite." Form of issue adjusted.

Town councillor—Corruption by town councillor—Newspaper.

Terms of a newspaper article which were held capable of bearing an innuendo that a town councillor took advantage of his position to throw the burden of repairing the footpaths of property belonging to himself upon the burgh, while he caused footpaths belonging to other proprietors to be reconstructed at their expense; that he was unfaithful to the public trust reposed in him; and that he acted corruptly for his own benefit. Observed that the question in such cases is not the meaning to be derived from a critical reading of the words in question, but the meaning which the words used would convey to an ordinary reader reading them as newspaper articles are usually read.

"Bribe"—Offering a bribe for information—Words.

A town council, who owned a pier and who suspected leakage of pier dues collected by the pier master, adopted a resolution designed to prevent leakage, proposed by a councillor who was a member of the pier committee. Another councillor then stated that he had something to say regarding the proposer of the resolution, and he hoped the press would take a note of his statement; he had, he continued, been informed by two seamen that the proposer of the resolution had offered them a bribe to give him information about the pier master's absence from duty; and that their captain had told them that, if they carried any information to the proposer of the resolution, he would instantly dismiss them. In an action of damages for slander at the instance of the proposer of the resolution, the pursuer averred that the statement represented, and was intended to represent, that he committed the dishonourable action of endeavouring to bribe two seamen in order to induce them to make a statement to him by means of which he might charge the pier master with neglect of his duties. Held (1) that the statement complained of, taken in its context, was not in itself necessarily slanderous; and (2) that, as the innuendo suggested by the pursuer merely paraphrased and did not add anything to the statement, the action was irrelevant for want of any averment instructing the use of the word "bribe" in a slanderous sense. Import of the word "bribe" considered.

Member of school board—Imputation of dishonourable conduct—Prejudice.

Architect—Unfairness in quasi judicial position—Architect of building in course of erection—Acting from personal spite in condemning work.

The architect of a building in course of erection condemned some of the joiner work. The law agent of the joiner wrote a letter to the architect, in which he stated—"I understand that you are attempting to annoy" the joiner "for some old grudge you have against him." The agent also sent a copy of this letter to the employers and in the covering letter referred to the architect's "spleen" towards the joiner. The architect innuendoed the letters as meaning that he had condemned the joiner work not because he believed it to be dis-conform to contract but because of personal spite which he entertained towards the joiner. Held that the innuendo was ad-missible, and issue allowed.

Acting corruptly in official capacity—Criticism of position of architect of school board—Criticism of system or of individual.

Clergyman—Abuse of religious influence—Newspaper article.

A newspaper published an article on Ireland stating that in Queenstown instructions were issued by the Roman Catholic religious authorities that all Protestant shop assistants should be discharged, and that a shopkeeper who had refused so to act had had his shop proclaimed, and had been forced to close it. In an action of damages the article was innuendoed as charging the pursuers with abusing their religious influence to procure the indiscriminate dismissal of Protestant shop assistants, and with ruining a shopkeeper's business. Held that the article would bear the innuendo.

Trustee—Breach of trust—"Shebeen"—Veritas.

The proprietrix of a hotel obtained a certificate and excise licence therefor from Whitsunday, 1889, to Whitsunday, 1890. She died in October, 1889, and her trustees carried on the business without obtaining a transfer of the certificate until March, 1890. On 6th December, 1889, a letter appeared in a local newspaper which suggested that the police superintendent "might inquire into the truth or untruth of the report at present current that an old public-house in the Guestrow is being personally conducted as a shebeen—in point of strict law—waiting the convenience of an ex-bailie and a town councillor who are both about to become joint proprietors of the place when a licence has been secured." The trustees in possession of the hotel, who were the parties referred to in the letter, sued the writer thereof for damages. Held that the letter was not libellous as (1) in strict law the public-house was a shebeen; and (2) the letter would not bear an innuendo of breach of trust.

Cook v Gray, 1891, 29 S.L.R. 247.

Trustee of charitable trust—"Not a trustworthy trustee"—"Capable of appropriating funds"—"Acting corruptly in administration of trust."

Terms of an anonymous letter published in a newspaper relating to the administration of a charitable bequest, of which the minister of the parish was sole trustee, which were held (1) to be capable of the innuendo that the pursuer was not "a trustworthy trustee and administrator" of the bequest, and was "a person capable of appropriating the funds" of the bequest "to his own uses"; but (2) not to be capable of the innuendo that he had "acted corruptly in the administration" of the bequest.

Political lecturer—Charge of sacrificing political convictions in order to secure an audience.

Terms of a newspaper article—representing that a Conservative lecturer had arranged with a Socialist lecturer to hold a joint meeting, and to divide the proceeds—which were held not to entitle the former to an issue, whether the article represented that he from mercenary motives entered into a plot or dishonest arrangement with the Socialist speaker under which he was to sacrifice for the time being his political principles in order to secure a sufficient audience.

Sanitary inspector—Newspaper article.

Terms of a newspaper article with innuendo which the Court held to support the following issue in an action of damages against the newspaper proprietor—"Whether the defender published . . . the statements complained of, and whether the statements . . . falsely and calumniously represent that the pursuer in his capacity of sanitary inspector for the town of F had maliciously endeavoured to falsely discredit another official . . . appointed by the . . . town council . . . and in order to gratify his spite and malice against the said official had recklessly spent the money of the community to their prejudice, to the loss, &c., of the pursuer?"

Neilson v Johnston, 1890, 17 R. 442; 27 S.L.R. 333.

(4) STATEMENTS BY POLICE IN COURSE OF THEIR DUTIES.

(199)

Police constable—Removal of persons of bad character from paddock at racecourse.

The pursuer, who had on 15th August, 1884, paid for admission to the paddock at Paisley races, was forcibly removed therefrom by the defender, who was the constable on duty there, and had instructions to remove bad characters from the enclosure. In doing so the defender stated to another police constable who came to his assistance, and in hearing of the public, that the pursuer was "a resetter from Glasgow." It was also proved that the pursuer had, in 1861 and 1876 been convicted of theft, and from 1877 to 1880 had undergone a period of police supervision; that he was reputed a resetter by the Glasgow police, but that they had never obtained evidence to warrant a prosecution. Held that the instructions given to the defender to remove persons of bad character from the enclosure were lawful, and that in the circumstances the defender did not slander the pursuer.

Statement to another policeman while taking person to police office.

In an action of damages for alleged slander, brought by a woman against a detective officer, the pursuer averred that the defender came to her house and insisted on her accompanying him to the police office, and repeatedly, and in a loud voice, in the presence and hearing of another detective and of her two sons, called her a "resetter" of certain articles which one of her sons had found in the street. The Court dismissed the action as irrelevant.

Malcolm v Duncan, 1897, 24 R. 747; 34 S.L.R. 625; 4 S.L.T. 353.

4. COMMENT AS SLANDER.

(201)

Comment on facts truly stated.

Observed (per Lord M'Laren)—"The expression of an opinion as to a state of facts truly set forth is not actionable even when that opinion is couched in vituperative or contumelious language."

The medical superintendent of a hospital brought an action against the proprietors of a newspaper for damages on account of slander alleged to be contained in an article in the newspaper. The article set forth the facts regarding the treatment of a patient with substantial accuracy, and described them as a "cruel proceeding" and "pure red tape." The Court dismissed the action as irrelevant, in respect that the article in so far as it set forth facts was not false, and in so far as it consisted of comment was not an actionable wrong.

A newspaper published a letter to the editor, in which it was stated that, though the magistrates of the burgh where the newspaper was published had recommended the publicans there to close their premises on New Year's Day, A, a publican, had kept his shop open till 10 p.m., and a leading article stating that most of the publicans in the city closed early on that day, but "there were one or two black sheep, and a correspondent calls attention to the disgraceful scenes which occurred at" A's premises. "The magistrates, we hope, will deal with this gentleman." In an action against the publishers of the newspaper for slander, in respect of the statements in the leading article, A did not deny the facts stated in the letter. Held that the leading article was merely a comment upon the facts stated in the letter, and was not in itself slanderous.

A letter in a newspaper accused a parish minister of neglecting his duty by absenting himself from his charge for six of the busiest weeks of the year, during which the church was closed, and concluded by expressing a hope that the presbytery would do their duty and call him to account. In an action of damages for slander the minister did not allege that the statements of fact in the letter were false, but innuendoed the letter as representing that he had, in violation of his duty as a parish minister, neglected his parishioners and congregation, and had behaved in a manner unbecoming a minister of the gospel, and deserving of the admonition of the ecclesiastical courts. Held that, in the absence of any denial on record of the truth of the statements of fact in the letter, the pursuer's averments were not relevant, and action dismissed.

Fair comment — Newspaper — Anonymous letter—Diligence to recover letter.

Criticism of official by member of town council.

At a meeting of a town council a member made a speech, which the burgh sanitary inspector, who had been appointed to inspect carcases of animals killed in the burgh slaughter-house, innuendoed as meaning that the inspector, with shameful indifference to the health of the community, had been guilty of a breach of duty in not calling in professional assistance, and in consequence had culpably passed as sound carcasses which were unfit for human food. The Court refused an issue, holding that the speech was merely a criticism upon the conduct of an official of the town council, which the member of the town council was quite entitled to make.

Newspaper—Comments on matter of public interest—Criticism of position of architect to school board—Criticism of system or of individual.

An architect was employed by a school board under an agreement by which he acted as architect, and received the ordinary commission, in the case of alterations or enlargements of existing buildings, but where new buildings were erected the work was thrown open to public competition. An article in a newspaper, in commenting upon the proceedings at a meeting of the school board at which it appeared that the cost of certain proposed enlargements of an existing school according to the tenders received would be nearly double the estimate of cost prepared by the architect, referred to the large sums expended by the school board on enlargements, and added with reference to the terms of the architect's employment—"The rule as interpreted is an absurdity, and it puts a premium upon a certain kind of advice." In an action of damages for slander held that the statement was a fair criticism of the system and not a criticism of the pursuer as an individual, and that it would not bear an innuendo to the effect that the pursuer in his position of architect had acted corruptly for his personal benefit.

Master and servant—Criticism by master of servant's skill.

Observed (per Lord Stormonth-Darling, Ordinary)—"When a master confines himself to merely expressing an opinion about the incompetency or unskilfulness of a servant, it seems to me it would be dangerous to the proper carrying on of the work of society that he should be liable to an action of damages for slander."

Munro v Mudie, (O.H.) 1901, 9 S.L.T. 91.

5. RIXA—VITUPERATIVE EPITHETS.

(209)

"Blackguard"—"Scoundrel."

In an action of damages for slander held that general opprobrious and contumelious epithets, such as "scoundrel" and "blackguard," which imputed no specific charge against character when uttered under provocation and in rixa, did not amount to slander.

Mackintosh v Squair, 1868, 40 J. 561; 5 S.L.R. 635.

(210)

"Damned puppy."

In an action of damages for slander held that the words "damned puppy" were not actionable.

Jameson v Bonthronne, 1873, 11 M. 703; 45 J. 437; 10 S.L.R. 474.

"Low, treacherous fellow."

Held that the statement that the pursuer was "a low, treacherous fellow, whose conduct was known throughout the length and breadth of the land," was actionable, and that it was not necessary to insert an innuendo in the issue.

Grierson v Harvey, 1871, 43 J. 190.

"Greatest liar and fraud."

In an action of damages for slander raised by a local agent of an insurance company against the company, the pursuer alleged that a superintendent of the company, who shortly before had by letter threatened to report the matter of the defender's collections to the authorities, called at his house, and stated that he was the greatest liar and fraud that ever came into the town. Held that to call a man a fraud did not in ordinary language mean that he had committed a fraud, and that the words "liar and fraud," verbally uttered, were not slanderous; and action dismissed as irrelevant.

Agnew v British Legal Life Assurance Co., 1906, 8 F. 422; 43 S.L.R. 284; 13 S.L.T. 742.

Threat to "put" subordinate "in prison" on account of neglect of duty.

In a quarrel which took place between a managing clerk and a subordinate, arising out of charges of neglect of duty made by the former against the latter, the managing clerk said, "I will put you in prison," or used words to the same effect. The other raised an action of damages against him for slander, and sought to attach to these words the innuendo that the defender thereby falsely and calumniously represented that the pursuer had been guilty of such criminal misconduct as would warrant his being apprehended on a criminal charge and thereafter imprisoned. Held that, in the circumstances of the case, the innuendo was forced and unreasonable, and that the pursuer had no ground of action.

"Drunk"—Statement by master that servant drunk.

The head cook in a hotel raised an action of damages against her master, alleging that, being in a violent temper with her for asking for additional assistants in the kitchen, he had called out to her in a loud voice several times in a public part of the hotel, and in presence of several of her fellow-servants, "You are drunk and must go at once"; and further averring that these statements were made by the defender without taking the trouble to ascertain whether they were true or not, and "simply to browbeat" the pursuer. Held that the action was irrelevant.

"Liar"—"Damned liar."

The inspector of water meters in a burgh, in the mistaken belief that a certain millowner was improperly using the town water, charged the millowner at his premises with the abstraction of the water. The millowner thereupon called him a "liar," and a "damned liar." Subsequently, at a public meeting held for the purpose of nominating candidates for the police commission, the inspector stated that a stream of water which used to keep clean the public drain near his house had been let to the millowner the year before, and that the water having been diverted by the millowner for his own purposes, the drain had become so filthy that the inspector's family had been attacked with fever, and he asked the candidates whether they would restore the water to the drain again and thus place the health of the community before a question of money to a trader. The millowner then charged the inspector with telling a deliberate falsehood, and according to the account of some of those present called the inspector "a liar." In an action of damages for slander by the inspector against the millowner, the Court set aside a verdict for the pursuer on the ground that the evidence showed that the expressions were used in the heat of the moment, and were not intended to be defamatory.

Watson v Duncan, 1890, 17 R. 404; 27 S.L.R. 319.

"Liar"—"Swindler"—Bystanders asked to hear accusations as witnesses.

A, in denial of a statement by B that A was due an account to B, said that B was a liar. Ten months afterwards A again met B, and in the presence of two bystanders called him a liar and a swindler, and stated that hell was too good for him. He then added, "I repeat it before two respectable witnesses." B having raised an action for damages for slander against A, held, after a proof, that while A's statement on the first occasion was made in rixa, and not in a defamatory sense, the words used by A on the second occasion must be held to have been used in a defamatory sense, and not in rixa, and that B was entitled to damages.

"Should have been in hands of police twenty times during the past five years."

At a sale by auction two bidders, A and B, each thought that a particular horse had been knocked down to him. On A proceeding to lead away the horse, B charged him with attempting to steal it, whereupon a quarrel ensued, in the course of which A said that B "should have been in the hands of the police twenty times during the past five years." B having raised an action of damages for slander against A, held, after a proof, that the words used by A were not used in a defamatory sense, and were not so understood by the persons in whose hearing they were uttered. The Court assailed the defender.

6. SARCASM.

(218)

Terms of letters which were held to be only sarcastic and not defamatory, the recipient of the letters having replied in a similar strain.

Bell v Haldane, (O.H.) 1894, 2 S.L.T. 320.

7. SLANDER OF PROPERTY.

(219)

Statement that patent is invalid.

The publication of a circular that a patent is invalid is a good ground for an action of damages for slander of title.

Montgomerie v Paterson, 1894, 11 R.P.C. 635.

Special damage—Necessity for innuendo—Issue.

A newspaper published a paragraph disparaging a building. The owner raised an action of damages for slander in which he averred that the paragraph was false, and that the reputation of the building in question had suffered by reason of the publication of the paragraph, which had prevented the letting of the building, and greatly depreciated its selling value; but he made no specific averments of damage. Held that the action was relevant and that an innuendo was unnecessary. Form of issue approved.

—Necessity for averring special damage—Suspension and interdict against infringement of patent—Patent invalid.

A raised an action of damages against B for alleged damage caused by B having raised a suspension and interdict to have A interdicted from infringing certain letters patent for machinery for pressing oil out of seed. Issue disallowed on the ground that in so far as the damage claimed was damage for slander of title, the pursuer must aver special damage.

Harpers, Limited v Greenwood & Batley, (O.H.) 1896, 4 S.L.T. 116.

Onus of proving falsity of statements.

Opinion (per Lord Kincairney, Ordinary) that the pursuer must prove that the statements complained of are false, there being no room for the presumption of falsity which is recognised in actions of slander of character.

Bruce v J. M. Smith, Limited, 1898, 1 F. 327; 36 S.L.R. 243; 6 S.L.T. 247.

(223)

Slander of title — Statement as to legal rights—No false statement as to fact.

The law agent of the proprietor of a house attended a sale of the tenant's furniture and stated to the auctioneer in the hearing of the persons present at the sale that he had come to stop the sale, that he was to apply for a sheriff's warrant to stop the sale, that purchasers would not be allowed to remove articles purchased, and that he desired payment of or security for the rent of the following year. The auctioneer stated that the current year's rent had been paid, and produced the receipt, and asked the law agent to exhibit his warrant for stopping the sale, which he failed to do. In consequence of the statement various persons were deterred from bidding, and the sale realised less money than it would otherwise have done. Opinion (per Lord Barcaple, Ordinary) that the statements were not actionable, being merely statements as to the legal rights of the landlord in the circumstances of the case.

Yeo v Wallace, (O.H.) 1868, 5 S.L.R. 253.

8. SLANDER BY ACTINGS.

(224)

Innuendo.

Opinions that there may be an actionable wrong of the nature of slander solely based upon actions, provided an innuendo can reasonably be drawn from them.

Inserting photograph in criminal records.

Opinion that a detective officer who inserts in the criminal records a photograph and finger impressions of an accused person illegally obtained lays himself open to an action of damages on the ground of slander.

Adamson v Martin, 1916 S.C. 319; 53 S.L.R. 237; 1916, 1 S.L.T. 53.

V. VERBAL INJURY.

(226)

Holding up to public hatred — Issues — Counter issue—Veritas.

In an action of damages for verbal injury, on the ground that the defender had, with the design of exposing the pursuer to public hatred, falsely attributed to him certain statements, a counter issue whether the pursuer had in fact made these statements was allowed by the Lord Ordinary and acquiesced in. At the trial the jury affirmed the counter issue, and the judge directed that this was a verdict for the defender. Held that, in the circumstances, the judge was right in so directing. Question, whether a counter issue should be allowed in an action for verbal injury.

Holding up to public hatred and contempt.

In an action of damages, the pursuer averred that the defender had, at a meeting of a school board, and afterwards at a meeting for the nomination of candidates for municipal election, stated that the pursuer had at a meeting of the governors of a certain college, of whom he was one, expressed the opinion that the children of the board schools would, if admitted to the college, "contaminate the genteel children" attending it; that the pursuer had never expressed any such opinion; that the defender's statements were falsely made, with the design of injuring the pursuer in the opinion of the citizens of the town in which he lived, and of which he was the chief magistrate; and that they had in fact so injured him. Held that the statements alleged to have been made by the defender were not slanderous; but that the pursuer was entitled to an issue "whether the said statements are false, and were made with the design of exposing, and did expose, the pursuer to public hatred and contempt."

Charge of changing religion.

A newspaper article charged a man with changing his religion. In an action of damages for slander, issue disallowed on the ground that a charge of change of religion does not expose one to public hatred and contempt.

Burns v Diamond, (O.H.) 1896, 3 S.L.T. 256.

(229)

Letter inciting to violence.

Waugh v "Ayrshire Post," 1893, 21 R. 326; 31 S.L.R. 248; 1 S.L.T. 431, No. 106, supra.

Design of injuring the pursuer.

A newspaper, commenting on the manner in which a contract for printing a register of voters had been secured, said—"This contract was secured by the lowest offerer in a mean and contemptible manner. We attach no blame to any of the burgh officials, but to the unfair advantage taken by the successful offerer to secure the contract." The successful offerer brought an action against the printer and publisher of the newspaper, in which he innuendoed the statement to mean that he had obtained the contract by dishonest and improper means. He also averred that the statement had been made with the design and the result of injuring him. The Court held that the statement would bear the innuendo put upon it, and allowed the pursuer an issue of slander, but held that the pursuer was not entitled to an issue of verbal injury.

Public ridicule and contempt.

In an action of damages by a burgh magistrate against the proprietors and publishers of a local newspaper, the pursuer averred that the defenders had published a series of articles (which he set forth) with the purpose and effect of exposing him to public ridicule and contempt. The Court, in respect that the articles referred to the public conduct of the pursuer, and did not impute anything that was dishonest or immoral in his character or actions, refused an issue, and assolizied the defenders.

Exposing to public odium and contempt.

A commercial firm brought an action against the proprietors of a newspaper for reparation for injuries alleged to have been suffered in consequence of articles published in the newspaper reflecting on the business methods of the firm. The pursuers proposed two issues—(1) whether the articles falsely and calumniously represented that the pursuers had deceived the public “by dishonest methods and practices in business, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers”; (2) whether the articles were published “with the design of exposing, and did expose the pursuers to public odium and contempt, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers.” The Court granted the first issue, but disallowed the second.

Lever Brothers v The “Daily Record,” Glasgow, 1909 S.C. 1004; 46 S.L.R. 725; 1909, 1 S.L.T. 553.

VI. VERITAS.

(233)

Competency of plea—Falsity of slanderous statements admitted in letter of apology—Action of slander for subsequent repetition of same statements.

Held that the defender in an action of damages for slander was not barred from pleading veritas by having, on a former occasion, written a letter of apology, admitting that similar statements then made by her were false, and undertaking not to repeat them.

Necessity of counter issue—Form of issue.

The defender in an action of damages for slander cannot prove veritas either by the evidence of the pursuer or otherwise without a counter issue.

Observations on the form of counter issue of justification, and as to the cases in which it is necessary to express the innuendo in the counter issue.

Torrance v Weddel, 1868, 7 M. 243; 41 J. 149; 6 S.L.R. 180.

Mitigation of damages.

In an action of damages for slander, where no counter issue of veritas is taken, it is incompetent to lead evidence for the purpose of showing the truth of the alleged slander, even for the purpose of mitigation of damages.

Craig v Jex-Blake, 1871, 9 M. 973; 43 J. 524; 8 S.L.R. 616.

Mitigation of damages—Circumstances in which slander uttered.

Where an action of damages is directed against the publisher of a slander, who is not the writer, he will not be allowed to prove in mitigation of damages circumstances which might have affected the writer, but of which the defender was ignorant, and this rule applies to the publisher of a newspaper who publishes a slander and refuses to disclose the name of the writer. In an action of damages against the publisher of a Scottish newspaper for slander contained in a paragraph published in it, the defender stated in evidence that he received the paragraph from his regular correspondent in Ireland, whose name he refused to disclose. There was no counter issue of veritas. Evidence as to the circumstances in which the paragraph was written, of which the defender admittedly knew nothing, held not admissible.

Mitigation of damages—Provocation.

In an action of damages for slander the writings complained of were letters accusing the pursuer of having used murderous threats against the defender. The letters were admitted, and it was stated in defence that the pursuer had, on various specified occasions, used violent and abusive language concerning the defender, threatening him with bodily harm, which induced him to write the letters complained of. No counter issue of veritas was taken. Held that the defender was not entitled to lead evidence in proof of his statements in order to show provocation or in mitigation of damages, as such evidence could not, in the circumstances, be distinguished from evidence of veritas.

Statement admitted but innuendo denied—Evidence as to statement without counter issue.

In an action of damages for slander the pursuer obtained an issue whether the defender falsely and calumniously stated that a clause in an agreement between a client of the pursuer and the police commissioners of a burgh had been added by the pursuer to the agreement after its execution by the commissioners, meaning thereby that the clause had been fraudulently interpolated in the agreement by the pursuer after execution. The defender admitted that he had made the statement, and stated that it was true, but denied the innuendo. Held that the defender was entitled to adduce evidence at the trial to show that the clause was added after execution by the commissioners.

Whether counter issue meets issue—Issue as innuendoed.

When, in an action of damages for slander, the principal issue contains an innuendo, it is sufficient for a defender pleading veritas to put in a counter issue facts which would justify the language complained of as explained in the innuendo, although they might not justify the language complained of apart from the innuendo.

In an action by an insurance company for damages for slander, the pursuers obtained an issue "whether the said statements falsely and calumniously represent that the accounts issued by the pursuers had been falsified, and that their financial position was at the date" when the statements were made "unsound." The defender pleaded veritas, and proposed as counter issues—(1) whether the pursuers knowingly deposited with the Board of Trade accounts and valuations which were calculated and intended to mislead the public; (2) whether the pursuers' financial position is unsound? The Court disallowed the counter issues as not meeting the pursuers' issues.

In an action of damages for slander at the instance of a gamekeeper, the pursuer obtained an issue, "whether the defender did falsely and calumniously say of and concerning the pursuer that he, the defender, had repeatedly sold and disposed of game for and on behalf of the pursuer and paid him the proceeds thereof, meaning thereby that the pursuer had taken game off the estate of F, belonging to his employer, and had sold the same and appropriated the proceeds thereof to his own uses and purposes, and had thus been guilty of dishonesty and a breach of the trust reposed in him by his employer." The defender pleaded veritas, and proposed as a counter issue, "whether on various occasions the pursuer . . . left at the defender's house for the purpose of being sold, or otherwise disposed of, hares, &c., and whether the defender handed or transmitted to the pursuer . . . the money received by defender for the said hares," &c. The counter issue was disallowed on the ground that it did not impute dishonesty to the pursuer, and therefore did not meet the issue.

M wrote a letter to a newspaper, in which he stated that he had detected W, who had contracted to supply groceries to a school of which M was superintendent, in trying to send a different, and, he believed, a cheaper brand of coffee than that contracted for. W replied by a letter to a newspaper. M raised an action of damages for slander against W, and obtained an issue whether the defender's letter represented that the pursuer "had no regard for truth and was a liar." Held that the defender was not entitled to a counter issue whether the pursuer's statement as to the coffee contract was a lie, as not fully meeting the issue.

In an action of damages for slander, the pursuer obtained the following issue:—Whether, within the ring or paddock of a race meeting the defender "falsely and calumniously said of and concerning the pursuer, 'this is the man who owes me money,' or used words of similar import, meaning that the pursuer was owing him money on betting transactions which he dishonourably refused to pay, and was a person who ought not to be allowed to remain in the said ring or paddock, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?" The defender proposed the following counter issue:—"whether the pursuer was owing the defender money on betting transactions which he dishonourably refused to pay?" The pursuer contended that the words "and was a person who ought not to be allowed to remain in the said ring or paddock" should be added to the counter issue. The Court held that those words should be added to the counter issue.

—A visitor to a hotel wrote in the visitor's book that he had visited most of the hotels in Scotland, but had nowhere "encountered so much drinking or so much squalid untidiness or dirt." In an action of damages for slander by the innkeeper, the visitor pleaded veritas. The pursuer obtained an issue whether the entry represented that he kept his hotel in a state of squalid untidiness and dirt and permitted persons to drink therein to excess all to such a degree as to distinguish it in these respects from most hotels in Scotland, and to cause discomfort and annoyance to visitors to and residents in the hotel. Held that the defender only required to put into his counter issue whether about the date of the entry there was an excessive amount of drinking in the hotel, and whether at that time the hotel was in a state of much squalid untidiness and dirt.

M'Iver v M'Neill, 1873, 11 M. 777; 45 J. 510.

General accusation averred — Issues limited to specific charges.

In an action of damages for alleged slander, the pursuer averred that two leaflets, issued by the defender, represented him to be a dishonest and disreputable person, but only proposed to put in issue certain specific charges of dishonesty out of various charges which the leaflets contained. The defender pleaded veritas, averred a number of instances in which he alleged the pursuer to have acted dishonestly, and proposed issues in justification. Held that the pursuer was entitled to limit his issues to certain of the specific charges of dishonesty contained in the leaflets, although these were only given in illustration of the general attack on his character, and that the counter issues must be limited to these specific charges.

Whole terms of issue not represented.

The defender in an action of damages for slander had referred to the pursuer, a justice of the peace, as having made a dastardly and cowardly attack upon A. The pursuer obtained an issue whether the letter falsely and calumniously represented that he had been guilty of the crime of assaulting A in a dastardly and cowardly manner, and was unfit to hold the office of justice of the peace. The defender pleaded veritas, and the counter issue allowed by the Court was whether the pursuer, being a justice of the peace, assaulted A in a dastardly and cowardly manner.

Ogilvy v Paul, 1873, 11 M. 776; 45 J. 511.

Averment to support counter issue.

In an action of damages for slander in respect that the defender had called the pursuer "a swindler and a thief," and "a questionable character," the defender admitted having said that the pursuer's conduct "was little removed from thieving," but stated that the pursuer had made fraudulent representations to the defender regarding a proposed mining company, and thus induced the defender to contribute to the capital of the company, in the promotion of which the pursuer was pecuniarily interested as vendor; that the pursuer further falsely represented to the defender that the run upon the shares had been so great that it would be necessary for the defender to take more shares in order to make sure of an allotment, and the defender was thus induced to take additional shares; and that the pursuer as vendor was dependent for the carrying out of the sale on a sufficient number of shares being applied for. The Court allowed counter issues.

Statement that pursuer seven times convicted of theft—Averment of two convictions for petty theft in boyhood to support counter issue.

In a newspaper notice of a conviction for assault it was stated that the panel "had been seven times previously convicted of theft," the word "theft" having been inserted by a clerical error instead of "assault." In an action of damages at the instance of the panel against the proprietors of the newspaper, a jury awarded damages. The defenders moved for a new trial on the ground that they had discovered that twenty-three years before, the pursuer, when a boy of fourteen, had been twice convicted of petty theft. Held that the new facts would not be sufficient to justify a counter issue of veritas, and motion for a new trial refused.

Charge of untruthfulness—No averments of specific acts of untruthfulness.

In an action of damages for slander in respect of an alleged charge of untruthfulness, the pursuer asked for a counter issue of veritas, without, however, specifying on record any detailed acts of untruthfulness on the part of the pursuer. The counter issue refused.

Hamilton v Wright, (O.H.) 1895, 3 S.L.T. 10.

Charge of drunkenness—Averment of particular occasions.

In an action of damages for slander brought by an elder against a parish minister, the pursuer obtained an issue whether certain statements made by the defender on 16th July, 1893, falsely and calumniously represented that the pursuer was addicted to taking strong drink to excess, and that this was notorious to the parishioners. The defender, who pleaded veritas, and set forth on record a number of occasions, giving dates and places from 1887 onwards, on which he alleged that the pursuer had been intoxicated, proposed a counter issue in general terms. The Court, having regard to the specific averments on record to which the proof would be limited, allowed the counter issue.

Charge of keeping mistress—Averment of two occasions on which adultery committed with her.

The pursuer in an action of damages for slander obtained an issue whether at a certain time and place "the defender falsely and calumniously said to . . . that the pursuer was a man of immoral character, and kept a mistress. . . .” The defender on record pleaded veritas, and averred that “the pursuer is a man of immoral character, and during the last two years has associated and has committed adultery with” A, but he only averred two occasions prior to the date of the alleged slander on which adultery had been committed. Held that the defender’s averments did not entitle him to the counter issue “whether, during the period of two years prior to the raising of the action, the pursuer has repeatedly committed adultery with” A.

Charge that pursuer, a married woman, had committed adultery with defender—Averments by defender of pursuer’s misconduct with third parties—Relevancy.

In an action of damages for slander brought by a married woman against a man who had in a letter to her stated that she had committed adultery with him, the defender pleaded veritas. The defender stated that the pursuer had also committed adultery with “A,” and had allowed “B” and “C” to take indecent familiarities with her. He did not mention on record the names of A, B, and C, but sent the names and addresses to the pursuer’s agents. Held that the defender’s statements in regard to third parties were irrelevant, and fell to be deleted.

Charge of misconducting public-house.

A publican brought an action of damages for slander alleged to have been uttered at a Licensing Court, to the effect that he was not conducting his public-house in a satisfactory manner, “in respect that dissolute men and women of loose habits and easy virtue are allowed to frequent the premises.” Averments as to the pursuer’s method of conducting his public-house which were held sufficient to entitle the defender to a counter issue of veritas.

Veritas established from pursuer’s pleadings.

Held that the pursuer’s pleadings contained sufficient admissions to establish, in conjunction with the documents produced, the plea of veritas, and action dismissed as irrelevant.

Carson v White, (O.H.) 1919, 2 S.L.T. 215.

(255)

Action for verbal injury.

Question, whether a counter issue should be allowed in an action for verbal injury.

VII. PRIVILEGE.

1. GENERALLY.

(256)

Duty giving rise to privilege.

Per Lord Macnaghten—“To protect those who are unable to protect themselves is a duty which every one owes to society.”

Statement made in bona fide but erroneous belief that occasion privileged.

An occasion, which in point of fact is not privileged, does not become so because the person making the slanderous statement bona fide believes that the occasion is privileged.

Observed (per Lord Buckmaster, Lord Chancellor)—“It is quite true that no protection can be afforded to a person who wrongly assumes the facts which constitute a privileged occasion. No person can, even with the best of good faith, assume relationships which do not in fact exist, or think that they possess duties which the real facts of the case show were no duties at all.”

No averment of malice—Ruling at trial that slander privileged—No motion to withdraw case from jury—Proof of malice led—Motion for new trial.

Where in an action of damages for written slander malice is not averred, and the judge at the trial rules that the writings are privileged, the defender ought then to ask the judge to direct the jury to return a verdict in his favour, in respect that malice has not been averred; and in the event of the defender failing to do so, and allowing proof of malice to proceed, he will be barred from raising the question on a motion for a new trial.

Privilege disclosed at trial—Malice averred on record but not inserted in issue—Competency of proving malice.

Held that when the pursuer in an action of damages for slander has averred malice on record, it is competent for him to meet the defence of privilege by proof of malice at the trial, though malice is not in the issue.

(260)

Privilege not disclosed on record—Admission by counsel at bar.

An auctioneer brought an action of damages for slander against a law agent, in respect of a slanderous statement alleged to have been made by the defender to a bank agent. The defender averred that the bank agent was his father and partner in business, and at the hearing in the Inner House the pursuer's counsel stated in answer to a question from the bench that he understood the averment was accurate. Held that as the pursuer's record did not disclose a case of privilege, malice ought not to go into the issue, but that the question of privilege must be left to be dealt with by the presiding judge at the trial.

2. MALICE.

(1) WHAT AMOUNTS TO MALICE.

(261)

Evidence of malice—Intrinsic evidence of malice—Undue violence of statement.

Observed (per Lord Buckmaster, L.C.)—"To submit the language used on privileged occasions to a strict scrutiny, and to hold all excess beyond the actual exigencies of the occasion to be evidence of express malice, would greatly limit, if not altogether defeat, the protection which the law gives to statements so made. . . . The real question is whether, having regard to the circumstances, the statement is so violent as to afford evidence that it could not have been fairly and honestly made; for the very essence of a privileged occasion is that it protects statements that are defamatory and false, when, apart from the protection, the very character of the statement itself carries with it the implication of malice. If once the privilege be established, unless there be extrinsic evidence of malice, there must be something so extreme in the words used as to rebut the presumption of innocence and to afford evidence that there was a wrong and an indirect motive prompting the publication." At a meeting of a school board the chairman drew the attention of the meeting to the fact that a member moving a certain amendment adverse to the headmaster had, as defender in an action of damages for slander at the instance of the headmaster, been found liable in the sum of £400, and moved that this fact should be recorded in the minutes as showing that the member, in moving the amendment, was a prejudiced party. In an action of damages for slander against the chairman at the instance of the member, the pursuer innuendoed the statement and motion of the defender as representing that the pursuer was actuated, not by a sense of public duty, but by private animosity, and was thereby guilty of dishonourable conduct. Held that there was no evidence in the statement itself or in the circumstances in which it was made, to infer malice. Question, whether the statement was capable of bearing the innuendo placed upon it.

Violence of language—Refusal to hear explanations—Accusation of immorality made by master against servant.

Failure to make inquiry—Violent terms of statements—Refusal to withdraw.

The matron of a hospital belonging to certain local authorities brought an action of damages against a ratepayer within the hospital district for defamatory statements contained in two letters. The first of these letters was sent by him to the clerk of one of the local authorities, reporting certain information received by him as to the pursuer's conduct as a matron (which he stated, if true, pointed, in his opinion, to criminal conduct), and demanding an inquiry. The second letter was sent by him to the Local Government Board, and expressed dissatisfaction with the result of two inquiries in which the pursuer had been absolved of blame, and made another charge, based on fresh information, against the pursuer, and craved a further inquiry. A third inquiry was held in which the pursuer was again absolved. The defender, however, refused to apologise or withdraw the charges. The pursuer maintained that malice sufficiently appeared from (1) the violent terms in which the statements in the letters were couched; (2) the fact that they were made without prior inquiry; (3) the reiteration of them; and (4) the defender's adherence to them and refusal to apologise. Held that these facts and circumstances were not sufficient to infer malice; and action dismissed as irrelevant.

In an action of damages for slander the pursuer, an office cleaner, averred that she had been dismissed by the defender, her employers' manager, and that upon her asking for an explanation he accused her of theft in an intemperate manner; that he had made no inquiries to ascertain whether these statements were well or ill-founded; and that they were false, and were uttered maliciously and without probable cause. Held that there was a relevant averment of facts inferring malice.

Knowledge that statement false.

The matron of a hospital belonging to certain local authorities brought an action of damages against a ratepayer for defamatory statements regarding her conduct, contained in letters addressed by him to the county council and to the Local Government Board, reporting information which he alleged he had received with regard to the management of the hospital, and demanding an inquiry. The pursuer averred that the defamatory statements were deliberately invented by the defender, although he had information in his possession which disproved them; that they were made maliciously and with the intention of injuring her; that the defender had never received the alleged information; and that the letter to the Local Government Board was accompanied by a private letter from the defender to a member of the Board, designed to influence him against the pursuer, and that the defender declined to produce this letter. Held that, while the defender's letters were privileged, facts and circumstances sufficient to infer malice were averred; and issues allowed.

Judicial slander—Defamatory statements on record—Sufficiency of averments of malice.

In an action of damages for breach of a contract for the purchase by the defender of shares in a company, the defender, who averred and eventually succeeded in establishing that there was no concluded agreement, also averred upon record that the alleged agreement was induced by gross fraud and misrepresentation on the part of the pursuer. The pursuer brought an action of damages for slander against the defender, in which he averred that the defender made the statements as to fraud and misrepresentation, well knowing them to be false; that he made no inquiry regarding their truth; that he had no precognition on which to base them; that he led no evidence in support of them; that he never intended to establish any of them; and that they were put on record, not with the view of maintaining his defence, but for the oblique purpose of intimidating the pursuer, and compelling him to abandon his action rather than allow the statements to become widely circulated and be made the subject of public comment. Held that the pursuer had averred facts and circumstances from which malice could be inferred; and an issue allowed. Observed that, where malice must be averred, it is necessary to examine the whole averments in the case before estimating the weight to be attached to a statement by the pursuer that the defender knew the words complained of to be false when he uttered them.

Averments inferring malice.

A brought an action of damages for defamation against B, in respect of a certain statement alleged to have been made by B on two different occasions. In regard to the first occasion, it was averred that the statement was made "in the knowledge that it was wholly unfounded," but this averment was not repeated with regard to the second occasion. B pleaded that his statement on the second occasion alleged, if made, was privileged. Held that the averment in question might be read as applying to the second occasion as well as the first, and was a sufficient averment of particular circumstances inferring malice. Observations (per Lord Kincairney) on the necessity of averring facts and circumstances from which malice may be inferred in an action on a defamatory statement when a plea of privilege is taken.

In an action against two police constables, the pursuer averred that he had been charged by the defenders with assaulting them, convicted on their evidence, and sentenced to imprisonment; that on the day of the alleged assault he was in another town; that after his conviction he was liberated on that ground, and the conviction subsequently quashed by the High Court of Justiciary; and that he was well known to the defenders before and at the date of the alleged assault, and that their charges and evidence against him were false to their knowledge, and were malicious and without just or probable cause. Held that malice was relevantly averred.

Recklessness amounting in law to malice.

A tenant while removing some flooring from his house was stopped by his landlord on the street, and, having refused to return with the flooring, which he claimed as his own, was given into custody by the landlord, but on being taken to the police office was at once liberated. Held that the landlord had been guilty of such recklessness in giving the tenant into custody as to amount in law to malice.

Evidence of malice—Conduct of trial by counsel.

Observed (per Lord Johnston and Lord Anderson) that the fact that counsel for the defence in an action of damages for slander leads evidence attacking the pursuer's conduct on occasions other than that put in issue cannot be taken into consideration by a jury as an element either in proving malice, unless it be established that counsel is acting on the express instructions, or with the privity of his client.

(2) AVERMENT OF MALICE—FACTS AND CIRCUMSTANCES.

(271)

Observations (per Lord President Inglis) on the distinction between the class of cases in which a general averment of malice is sufficient and the class of cases in which particular averments of malice are required.

Innes v Adamson, 1889, 17 R. 11; 27 S.L.R. 26.

(272)

Observations (per Lord Young) on the circumstances in which a pursuer requires to make specific averments of facts and circumstances from which malice is to be inferred.

Observations (per Lord Dunedin) on the class of cases in which averments of facts and circumstances inferring malice are necessary.

Definite and special duty or right.

Observed (per Lord Kyllachy, Ordinary)—The rule which requires an averment of facts and circumstances inferring malice in certain cases of privilege must be taken to apply "to all cases where a defamatory statement is made in pursuance of any definite and special duty, whether to the public or to an individual, including any duty owed to the aggrieved person himself."

Sheriff v Denholm, 1897, 5 S.L.T. 234, 346.

(275)

Observed (per Lord President Kinross and concurred in by Lord Kinnear)—"It might be proper to add to this statement of the rule the words 'or in the exercise of any right.'"

Macdonald v M'Coll, 1901, 3 F. 1082; 38 S.L.R. 781; 9 S.L.T. 146.

Sufficiency of averments of malice—Necessity for averring facts and circumstances inferring malice.

The general rule laid down by Lord President Kinross in Macdonald v M'Coll, No. 275, supra, and followed in subsequent decisions, as to the necessity in cases of privilege of averring facts and circumstances from which malice can be inferred, doubted (per Lord Skerrington).

Exclusion of possibility of good faith.

A wrote a letter to B containing statements inferring dishonesty on the part of C. The occasion of writing the letter was privileged. Held that to make an averment of malice relevant it must be such as to exclude the possibility of the statements having been made in good faith.

Graeme-Hunter v The Glasgow Iron and Steel Co., (O.H.) 1908, 16 S.L.T. 72.

Creditor and trustee on debtor's estate.

An accountant was nominated trustee on a debtor's estate at a meeting of the creditors. One of the creditors made statements to the effect that the accountant was unfit for the post. In an action of damages by the accountant against the creditor, held that the defender was privileged, but that a general averment of malice was sufficient.

Oliver v Barnet, (O.H.) 1895, 3 S.L.T. 163.

Averments irrelevant.

A B brought an action against C D for slander, consisting of a statement alleged to have been uttered at an interview between the pursuer and defender that A B had had immoral relations with a woman named on record. The defender pleaded that the occasion was privileged. At adjustment the pursuer added an averment that defender had used indecent liberties or attempted to use indecent liberties with other women named who were in the defender's employment. Held that the pursuer's averments were irrelevant to displace privilege or to infer malice, and should be struck out of the record.

A B v C D, (O.H.) 1919, 2 S.L.T. 46.

Evidence of malice—Sufficiency of evidence.

In an action by a midwife against a medical practitioner the jury returned a verdict for the pursuer on the first and fourth issues, which were in these terms—(1) Whether on 15th October, 1891, the defender falsely and calumniously stated to Stephen Moore that the pursuer had poisoned his wife, Mrs. Agnes Moore." . . . (4) Whether on 20th October, 1891, . . . the defender falsely, calumniously, and maliciously, and without probable cause, stated to Archibald Mackenzie, detective officer, that Mrs. Moore, wife of Stephen Moore, had been poisoned by a drug given to her by the pursuer, which had caused her death. . . . The judge directed the jury that the statements contained in the first issue were privileged, and that malice must be proved, and no objection was made by the pursuer. The only evidence of malice adduced by the pursuer as affecting either the first or the fourth issue was the evidence of Mackenzie, who proved that the statements made to him were not volunteered by the defender, but were used in the course of the defender's replies to Mackenzie's inquiries made officially by him. Held that the verdict was unsupported by evidence, and a new trial granted.

Observations (by Lord Trayner) as to the limits within which the existence of malice at an earlier date may be inferred from proof of malice at a later date.

Reid v Coyle, 1892, 30 S.L.R. 335.

3. WANT OF PROBABLE CAUSE.

(281)

Inappropriate to actions of slander.

Observed (per Lord President Dunedin) that the words "without probable cause" have no relation to actions of damages for slander, but were meant to deal with a different class of circumstances where a person has done something, as, for instance, executing a diligence or denouncing a person to the police authorities.

(283)

Judicial slander—Statement in defences to action.

In an action of damages for slander in respect of a statement made in the defences to an action, held that the issue must contain that the statement was inserted in the defences "maliciously and without probable cause."

Douglas v Ferguson, (O.H.) 1896, 4 S.L.T. 200.

Arbitration proceedings—Statements by litigant in pleadings.

A firm went into liquidation, and it was agreed that disputes arising out of the liquidation should be referred to the sheriff-substitute. A dispute as to the liquidator's remuneration having been referred to the sheriff-substitute, one of the partners of the firm lodged a note in the reference in which he stated (1) that the liquidator "dishonourably made use of his position of liquidator to endeavour to obtain for himself business which had previously belonged to the firm"; and (2) that the liquidator "grossly neglected his work and apparently temporised, whether instigated to do so or with the idea of drawing larger remuneration is best known to himself." In an action of damages by the liquidator, held that want of probable cause must go into the issue. Held, further, that the pursuer's averments showed that the defender had probable cause for making the statements complained of, and action dismissed as irrelevant.

Private prosecutor — Game prosecution—Charge of poaching.

A shooting tenant caused a complaint at his own instance to be served on a land steward charging him with having committed a trespass within the meaning of the Day Trespass Act, 1832. After trial, the land steward was acquitted. The land steward then brought an action of damages for slander against the shooting tenant, in which it was held that malice and want of probable cause must go into the issue, the fact that the prosecution was by a private prosecutor for his private interest not taking the case out of the general rule.

Cook v Spence, (O.H.) 1897, 4 S.L.T. 295.

(286)

Relevancy — Probable cause disclosed in pursuer's pleading.

A pursuer will not be allowed an issue of malice and want of probable cause when the Court are satisfied from the pursuer's own statements that the defender had probable cause.

Craig v Peebles, 1876, 3 R. 441; 13 S.L.R. 287.

Slander of municipal candidate at election meeting.

Held that, in an action of damages for slander in respect of defamatory language used about a town councillor who was seeking re-election at a meeting held in reference to the election of town councillors, an averment of want of probable cause was not necessary.

Christie v Craik, (O.H.) 1899, 7 S.L.T. 67; affirmed on other points, 1900, 2 F. 380; 37 S.L.R. 285; 7 S.L.T. 321.

4. ABSOLUTE PRIVILEGE.

(290)

Judge.

A judge—whether of the Supreme Courts or of an inferior Court—has with respect to words uttered by him, in the course of judicial proceedings, with reference to the case before him, an absolute privilege.

Primrose v Waterston, 1902, 4 F. 783; 39 S.L.R. 475; 10 S.L.T. 37.

(291)

Sheriff-substitute.

An action of damages against a sheriff-substitute for slander alleged to have been uttered by him while sitting in judgment is incompetent.

Advocate.

The privilege of a person exercising the function of an advocate is absolute, whether the pleading containing the alleged defamatory statement is oral or in writing.

Rome v Watson, 1898, 25 R. 733; 35 S.L.R. 561; 5 S.L.T. 377.

Law agent as procurator.

At a meeting of justices of the peace for the granting of licences, a letter containing matter defamatory of one of the applicants was read by A, a law agent, who had been employed to oppose the application. The letter had been written to A by B, one of the clients who so employed him. Held (1) that as A had read the letter in Court as agent for B, and upon his instructions, A had an absolute privilege, and no action lay against him.

Williamson v Umphray, 1890, 17 R. 905; 27 S.L.R. 742.

Law agent—Statement made outwith presence of judge and Court officials—Counter issue.

In an action of damages for slander by a person against whom a petition for cessio had been presented, against the agent of the petitioner, the pursuer alleged that the defender had, in the Sheriff Court buildings, Edinburgh, used words to and of the pursuer, which represented that the pursuer had been guilty of a crime and offence under the Debtors Act, 1880; and that the words (which were in the form of a question) were used by the defender in the absence of the sheriff or of any official of Court of any kind. The defender denied these averments, and stated that he had asked no questions, except such as were pertinent to the cause and in the line of his duty. The Court allowed the pursuer an issue, but refused the defender a counter issue of privilege, on the ground that he had not set forth on record that the words were used in circumstances raising a case of privilege, but observed that if such circumstances were disclosed at the trial it would be the duty of the presiding judge to direct the jury accordingly.

Statement by agent while conducting case.

An agent objected to another agent appearing for a party in the Sheriff Court, giving as the ground of his objection that the other agent's name did not appear on the law agents' roll. Held that the occasion was privileged.

Clark v Haddon, (O.H.) 1895, 3 S.L.T. 85.

(296)

Irregularity in proceedings—Absence of judge—Statutory examination of bankrupt—Statement by trustee in bankruptcy.

Thomson v Munro & Jamieson, (O.H.) 1900, 8 S.L.T. 327, No. 302, infra.

Witness—Party as witness.

In an action against a medical man for alleged wrongful granting of a certificate that the pursuer was insane, the defender was examined as a witness for the pursuer. Held that the privilege of the witness was absolute, and that an action of damages for slander founded on what the defender stated in evidence could not be made relevant by any allegation of malice.

Mackintosh v Weir, 1875, 2 R. 877.

Voluntary appearance before Arbitration Court.

Held that a statement, made by a voluntary witness before a Court of Arbitration under the Munitions of War Act, 1915, which had reference to the questions under consideration by the Court, to the effect that it cost £180 to put right work which a workman had done, was absolutely privileged.

Slack v Barr, (O.H.) 1918, 1 S.L.T. 133.

Privilege in precognition.

Held that the privilege of a witness in giving evidence extends to statements made by a person on precognition with a view to his giving evidence.

Watson v M'Ewan, 1905, 7 F. (H.L.) 109; [1905] A.C. 480; 42 S.L.R. 837; 13 S.L.T. 340.

5. QUALIFIED PRIVILEGE.

(1) JUDICIAL SLANDER—PRIVILEGE OF LITIGANT.

(300)

General rule.

A litigant is entitled to a certain freedom of speech, and may with impunity say many things which may be painful and injurious to his opponent or to third parties. But if he descends to false statements known to himself to be false, and makes these not for the legitimate purpose of maintaining his suit, but for the gratification of his own spite and malice, he is liable to an action of damages.

Privileged occasion—Whole subject-matter of cause.

Held that an action of damages for judicial slander is relevant although the matter alleged to be libellous formed the whole subject-matter of the original action.

Irregularity in proceedings—Absence of judge—Statutory examination of bankrupt—Statement by trustee in bankruptcy—Newspaper report.

The statutory examination of a bankrupt was taken in the sheriff-clerk's room and in part outwith the presence of the sheriff. The trustee used slanderous words with reference to the law agent of the bankrupt. Held that the statements made, though made in the course of judicial proceedings, had no relation to the proceedings, and that a newspaper report of the incident was not privileged.

Thomson v Munro & Jamieson, (O.H.) 1900, 8 S.L.T. 327.

Statement in note of objections to election of trustee in sequestration.

A was elected trustee on a sequestrated estate at a meeting of creditors. B, a defeated rival, lodged a note of objections with the sheriff-clerk which contained a statement that A had promised to give C a consideration in money in respect of a vote in favour of A's election as trustee. Held that the statement, being made in a judicial process and being pertinent to the issue, was privileged, and that, there being no proof of malice, the defender was entitled to absolvitor.

Arbitration proceedings—Malice—Necessity for averments of facts inferring malice—Want of probable cause.

A firm was in liquidation and it was agreed that disputes arising out of the liquidation should be referred to the sheriff-substitute. A dispute having arisen with regard to the amount of the liquidator's remuneration, a submission was made to the sheriff-substitute, in the course of which one of the partners lodged a note of objections in which he stated—" (1) A B (the liquidator) dishonourably made use of his position of liquidator to endeavour to obtain for himself business which had previously belonged to the firm"; (2) "A B grossly neglected his work and apparently temporised, whether instigated to do so, or with the idea of drawing larger remuneration, is best known to himself." The liquidator brought an action of damages for slander. The action was dismissed as irrelevant on the grounds that (1) the case fell within the rules of judicial slander; (2) the pursuer must aver malice and facts and circumstances from which it might be inferred; (3) the pursuer must aver and put in issue want of probable cause; but (4) the admissions on record and documents showed that the defender had probable cause for making the statements complained of.

Arbitration proceedings—Malice—Issue.

In an action of damages for slander the pursuer averred that during the course of arbitration proceedings to which the defender was a party and in which the pursuer was called by the arbiter to give information, after a statement by the pursuer to the arbiter, the defender stated to the arbiter "that man cannot speak one word of truth, and all that he has stated just now is lies from beginning to end." Held that the occasion was privileged, and that malice must be put in issue.

Private prosecutor—Game prosecution—Want of probable cause.

Cook v Spence, (O.H.) 1897, 4 S.L.T. 295, No. 83, supra.

Pertinent though irrelevant statement—Malice—Sufficiency of averments—Facts and circumstances.

In an action of damages for judicial slander, where the statement complained of is relevant to the action in which it is made, the pursuer must aver facts and circumstances from which malice can be inferred. So held in an action of damages for slander founded on statements made on record in a previous action.

Observed (per Lord President Inglis) that the pursuer must aver such facts and circumstances, even if the statement complained of is irrelevant, unless it is also not pertinent to the action in which it is made.

Malice—Sufficiency of averments—Slander of person not a party to the litigation—Statement pertinent to litigation.

In an action by a tenant against his landlord for damages for breach of contract in taking possession before the expiration of the lease of the shop let to the pursuer, the defender, inter alia, averred that the tenant had gone to England, and had left the shop in charge of J S, that J S "was seldom sober" during the time he was on the premises. In an action of damages for slander raised by J S against the landlord, held that the defamatory statement made by the landlord in the other action, being pertinent to the cause, was privileged, and that as the pursuer had failed to set forth facts from which malice could be inferred, the action fell to be dismissed.

Malice—Sufficiency of averments—Statements made by defender to pursuer's agent in reply to a threat of legal proceedings.

In reply to a letter from the pursuer's law agent threatening legal proceedings against the defender to recover damages for wrongous dismissal, the defender stated that his reason for dismissing the pursuer was that he had dishonestly appropriated to his own use butter belonging to the defender. Held that the statements, being made in reply to a threat of legal proceedings, and being a relevant defence to such proceedings, fell within the degree of protection accorded to judicial slanders made upon record, and were only actionable on an averment of facts and circumstances sufficient to infer malice. Averments which were held not to be relevant averments of malice.

Letter written by client to law agent—Law agent reading letter in Court on instructions of client.

At a meeting of justices of the peace for the granting of licences a letter containing matter defamatory of one of the applicants was read by A, a law agent, who had been employed to oppose the application. The letter had been written to A by B, one of the clients who so employed him. In an action of damages for slander by the applicant against A and B the pursuer averred that the defenders knew that the statements in the letter were untrue, that they had made them maliciously for the purpose of defaming the pursuer, and that B had maliciously instructed A to read them in open Court for the purpose of defaming the pursuer's character. Held that the pursuer was entitled to an issue against B, putting, inter alia, the questions whether he wrote the letter and maliciously instructed A to read it in Court, and whether it was read by A acting on the instructions so maliciously given.

Malice—Sufficiency of averments—Facts and circumstances.

In an action of damages for judicial slander the pursuer must aver facts and circumstances from which the jury may reasonably infer malice.

Averments of facts and circumstances which were held relevant to support an issue for judicial slander.

Gordon v British and Foreign Metaline Co., 1886, 14 R. 75; 24 S.L.R. 60.

Sufficiency of averments—Facts and circumstances.

In an action of damages for judicial slander the statements complained of were admittedly pertinent to the questions raised in the proceedings in which they were made, and were therefore privileged. The pursuer averred that the defender knew that the statements in question were untrue. Held that in the circumstances there were no relevant averments of malice on the part of the defender.

Stevenson v Wilson, 1903, 5 F. 309; 40 S.L.R. 286; 10 S.L.T. 546.

Sufficiency of averments—Knowledge that statements are untrue.

Sufficiency of averments of malice.

P & Sons, a firm which manufactured a coffee essence called "Camp" coffee, raised an action of interdict and damages against W, a grocer, craving to have him interdicted from making statements that "Kit" coffee was the same as "Camp," and from selling "Kit" coffee for "Camp." In that action P & Sons averred that by making such statements W was inducing his customers to purchase "Kit" coffee instead of "Camp"; that the said statements were made fraudulently and maliciously with the intent of damaging the reputation of P & Sons' coffee, and encouraging the sale of "Kit" coffee, because the manufacturers of the latter offered better terms to the grocer than did P & Sons; and that W was acting in collusion with a quondam partner of P & Sons. The action, which was eventually abandoned, was one of thirty-five actions of interdict and damages raised by P & Sons against grocers. Thereafter W brought an action against P & Sons for damages for slander contained in their averments in the action of interdict, in which he set forth that the action of interdict was raised for the purpose of advertising "Camp" coffee, and of intimidating him from buying or selling "Kit" coffee; that the averments therein were (as P & Sons knew) false, and were made falsely, maliciously, and calumniously; and that the action of interdict was raised in pursuance of a fraudulent and malicious scheme conceived by P & Sons of using legal process for the purpose of advertising their "Camp" coffee, and of intimidating grocers from dealing in "Kit" coffee. Held that W had set forth sufficient facts and circumstances from which a jury might infer malice; and that an issue must be allowed. Observed (per Lord President Dunedin) that the words "without probable cause" are not appropriate to the issue in an action on slander.

Sufficiency of averments of malice—Averments regarding co-defender in divorce action.

In an action of divorce for adultery brought by a husband against his wife, the wife's alleged paramour was called as co-defender. The Lord Ordinary granted decree of divorce against the wife, on the ground of her adultery with the co-defender, but assoltized the co-defender, with expenses. Thereafter the co-defender brought an action against the husband for damages for the slander contained in statements made in the record in the divorce action. Held that this being a case of judicial slander, it was necessary for the pursuer to set forth facts and circumstances from which malice could be inferred, and that, as he had failed to do so, the action was irrelevant.

Sufficiency of averments of malice—Want of probable cause.

In an action of damages for slander contained in the defences to an action in the Sheriff Court, held that the issue must include the words "maliciously and without probable cause," and that certain averments of malice were sufficiently specific.

Douglas v Ferguson, (O.H.) 1896, 4 S.L.T. 200.

Proof of malice.

The defender in an action of removing produced a missive of lease which, he stated, was written and signed by the pursuer when sober, and in the presence of the defender and three witnesses. The pursuer denied that the missive was in his writing, after being warned that the denial imported a charge of forgery. The pursuer repeated the denial in a subsequent Court of Session process between the same parties, and persisted in the denial even after warning in Court. Held, in an action of damages for slander, that the jury were entitled to infer that the charge of forgery was made maliciously.

Logan v Weir, 1872, 10 S.L.R. 22.

(2) PRIVILEGE OF PUBLIC OFFICIALS.

(318)

Privileged occasion—Chairman of public health committee.

The chairman of the public health committee of a local authority stated, at a meeting of the committee, that a case of typhoid fever had been reported to him by a medical man, "who said that it was probably to be traced to the milk supplied" by a certain dairyman. In an action of damages against him by the dairyman, it was proved that the medical man had not been of that opinion, and had not said so; but that the defender, had misunderstood a conversation which he had held with him, and had made the statement in the belief of its truth and in the discharge of his public duty. Held that, in these circumstances, the defender was entitled to be assoltized. Observations (per Lord Justice-Clerk Macdonald) on the circumstances in which the groundless character of an allegation against another may infer malice.

Chairman of war pensions committee—Duty to communicate—Interest to receive communication—Letter of complaint by servants of public authority against fellow-employee—Letter read by chairman to sub-committee appointed to deal with different matter—Presence of representatives of head office not members of sub-committee—Malice.

In an action of damages for slander, brought by the secretary of a war pensions committee against the vice-chairman, the pursuer averred that the defender, while presiding at a meeting of a sub-committee, read a letter, addressed to the chairman of the war pensions committee by certain employees, which contained defamatory statements regarding the pursuer's conduct as an official. As showing that the occasion was not privileged, the pursuer founded on averments that the sub-committee was appointed only to consider questions as to a reduction of the staff; that the defender was not in fact a member of the sub-committee, and had no authority to attend the meeting or to act as chairman; and that, in addition to the members of the sub-committee, there were present at the meeting the regional director and two members of the region office of the Ministry of Pensions. Held that the averments disclosed a case of privilege, and that, as the pursuer had failed to make relevant averments of malice, the action fell to be dismissed.

Member of burgh police commission.

At a meeting of police commissioners of a burgh, a member, who had heard complaints regarding the conduct of a sheriff officer who had charge of collecting arrears of water rates, made a motion as to employing a different system for the collection of police rates, and, in the course of a speech supporting the motion, made statements imputing drunkenness to the sheriff officer. In an action of damages against him by the sheriff officer for slander, held that the defender was privileged in expressing himself as he did, in respect that he was versans in officio, and that, as it was not proved that he was actuated by malice, he was entitled to absolvitor.

Town councillor—Criticism of burgh official.

Neilson v Johnston, 1890, 17 R. 442; 27 S.L.R. 333, No. 206, supra.

(322)

Charge of corruption against burgh official.

At a meeting of the electric lighting committee of a town council, a town councillor charged the burgh electrical engineer with corruption. In an action of damages for slander by the burgh engineer against the town councillor, held that the defender's privilege was not absolute, but was qualified, and an issue containing "maliciously" allowed.

Teague v Russell, (O.H.) 1900, 8 S.L.T. 253.

Convener of town council committee—Reflection on contractor in conversation about another contract.

In an action of damages for slander by a contractor against the convener of a town council committee, the pursuer averred that the pursuer had said that the defender had robbed the town over a certain contract. The slander was uttered at a street corner in the presence of a town chamberlain and a partner of the firm of engineers for the contract in the course of a conversation relative to another contract. Held that prima facie the defender was not privileged, as in cases of this description it was necessary, in order to determine whether or not a statement was privileged, to keep in view not only the relationship of the parties, but the occasion on which the slander was uttered.

Reid v Little, (O.H.) 1894, 2 S.L.T. 244.

Distress committee—Report to committee by man of skill.

The distress committee of the city of Edinburgh owned a number of small holdings, which they leased to tenants. The committee instructed a man of skill to make a report upon the condition of the holdings, and the report was printed for circulation among the members of the committee. A tenant brought an action for slander against the distress committee and their reporter, in respect of certain statements in the report, which he sought to innuendo as meaning that he was an unskilful and negligent market gardener. Held that the reporter in returning the report, and the committee in dealing with it, were privileged, and that malice was not relevantly averred.

Cadzow v Distress Committee of City of Edinburgh, (O.H.) 1914, 1 S.L.T. 493.

Member of school board—Attack on schoolmaster at public meeting.

A schoolmaster brought an action of damages for slander against a former member of the school board. The pursuer averred that the defender, while still a member of the school board, called and addressed a public meeting, at which he announced his intention to retire and charged the pursuer with unfitness to perform the duties of his office. Held that the occasion was not privileged.

Leitch v Lyal, (O.H.) 1903, 11 S.L.T. 394.

Principal of college—Malice.

The patron of a college chair of humanity having announced his intention to appoint A to the chair on the occurrence of a vacancy, the principal of the college wrote to the patron stating, in strong terms, that A was unfit for the post. Inter alia, he stated that A had notoriously failed as a classical teacher in a school. Some years previously the principal had given A a testimonial, in which he had spoken favourably of him as a teacher. Held that the principal was privileged in writing the letter. Held, also, that malice was not proved.

Parish minister—Minister alleging misconduct by co-presbyter—Malice—Want of probable cause.

Held (by Lord Wellwood, Ordinary) (1) that a parish minister is privileged in bringing before his presbytery a charge of misconduct against another minister in the presbytery; (2) that he does not forfeit his privilege by failure to comply with the recommendation given by the forms of process of 1707 to communicate first with the accused minister and with some of the "most prudent" of his co-presbyters, though such failure may aid in a proof of malice; and (3) that accordingly malice and want of probable cause must be put in issue in an action of damages based on statements alleged to have been made by a minister at a meeting of the presbytery to which he belonged regarding the conduct of another minister in the same presbytery.

Minister communicating to candidate for eldership report as to candidate's character—Malice—Sufficiency of averments of malice—Want of probable cause.

In an action of damages for slander the pursuer, a candidate for eldership, averred that the defender, the parish minister, had written a letter to him in which he informed him that a third party had made a serious charge against him, and that the defender could not ordain the pursuer as elder with such a charge against his character. Circumstances in which held that the occasion was privileged, and that the pursuer had failed to aver facts and circumstances from which malice could be inferred. Opinion (per Lord President Strathclyde and Lord Skerrington) that the pursuer was bound to put in issue want of probable cause as well as malice.

—Parish minister—Malice—Want of probable cause.

In an action of damages for slander, the pursuer alleged that the defender, the minister of the parish in which the pursuer resided, had, by letters written by him to the inspector of poor of another parish and to the Board of Supervision, represented the pursuer as grossly unfit to have the charge of pauper children boarded with him by the parochial board of that other parish. Held that the pursuer was bound to put in issue want of probable cause as well as malice.

—Chief constable—Duty to admonish subordinate — Malice — Sufficiency of averments.

A police constable brought an action of damages for slander against a chief constable, his superior officer, stating that the defender had, in the presence of two police officers, maliciously and without probable cause, slandered him by saying that he had given in a false report, that that report was a lie, and that instead of attending to his duties he had merely been putting off his time. The Court dismissed the action as irrelevant, holding (1) that it appeared from the pursuer's statement that the defender was acting within his duty in admonishing his inferior officer in regard to the report, and that his statement was privileged; and (2) that the pursuer in averring malice had failed to state specifically facts and circumstances from which malice was to be inferred. Observed that in certain cases of privilege a general averment of malice is sufficient.

—Police inspector—Malice—Sufficiency of averments of malice.

A police officer brought an action of damages for slander against an inspector of police, stating that he had maliciously and without probable cause prepared and sent to the pursuer's superior officer, the chief constable of the county, a report, falsely stating that rumours were current in the county that he had been guilty of immoral conduct, and that an official investigation as to his conduct was required. Held that, having regard to the nature of the report and its privileged character, a specific statement of the grounds on which malice was to be inferred was required, and that such not being given, the action was irrelevant. Opinion (per Lord Young) that an action will not lie against a public officer in respect of defamatory statements made in a report sent in the discharge of his duty to his superior officer.

—Police constable—Sufficiency of averments of malice—Knowledge that statement false.

In an action against two police constables, the pursuer averred that he had been charged by the defenders with assaulting them, convicted on their evidence, and sentenced to imprisonment; that on the day of the alleged assault he was in another town; that after his conviction he was liberated on that ground, and his conviction subsequently quashed by the High Court of Justiciary; and that he was well known to the defenders before and at the date of the alleged assault, and that their charges against him were false to their knowledge, and were malicious and without just or probable cause. Held that malice was relevantly averred.

—Police surgeon—Statement regarding illness of police constable—Malice—Sufficiency of averments.

In an action of damages for slander brought by a police constable against a police surgeon who had attended him for illness, the pursuer averred that the defender, without sufficient examination, had erroneously stated that the pursuer was suffering from the effects of venereal disease, and had repeated that statement to the chief constable; that he had persisted in that statement though informed that other medical men disagreed with his view; and that, in doing so, he had used violent and abusive language towards the pursuer. Held that the facts and circumstances averred by the pursuer were insufficient to infer malice, and that, the occasion being privileged, the action fell to be dismissed as irrelevant.

(3) STATEMENTS MADE—

(a) To the Police.

Threat to give information to the police.

[See IV. 3 (1) (a) (ii), supra.]

(334)

Privileged occasion — Malice and want of probable cause in issue.

"When it comes to the knowledge of any one that a crime has been committed, a duty is laid on that person, as a citizen of the country, to state to the authorities what he knows respecting the commission of the crime, and if he states only what he knows and honestly believes, he cannot be subjected to an action of damages merely because it turns out that the person as to whom he has given the information is . . . not guilty of the crime. It is necessary for any one raising an action of damages against a person who has given such information to aver that the information was given maliciously and without probable cause. . . . In order to make out malice, . . . it is necessary for the pursuer to prove that, in making the statements or giving the information respecting the commission of the crime, the defender acted, not in discharge of his public duty, but from an illegitimate motive; . . . the pursuer must also prove that the statements were made or the information given without any reasonable grounds of belief" (per Lord President Inglis).

In an action of damages for giving wrongous information to the police, the pursuer is entitled to have his innocence presumed; but he must prove that there was a want of reasonable and probable cause for giving the information, or that the circumstances of the case were such as to be, in the eyes of the jury, inconsistent with the existence of reasonable and probable cause; and also that the proceedings complained of were taken in a malicious spirit, that is, from an indirect and improper motive, and not in furtherance of justice (per Lord President Dunedin, approving dicta of Lord Justice Bowen in Abrath v North-Eastern Railway Co., 11 Q.B.D. 440).

—Statements to police constable on duty.

In an action of damages for slander brought against a lady who occupied a villa on the outskirts of a town, the pursuer averred that the defender had made statements to two police constables to the effect that the pursuer was concerned in a theft from an adjoining villa. There was no allegation of malice and want of probable cause. The defender denied having made the statements complained of, and also pleaded privilege. A proof was allowed, from which it appeared that the statements were made to the police constables on duty. Held that the statements were privileged, and that, in the absence of averment or proof of malice and want of probable cause, the defender was entitled to absolvitor.

Green v Chalmers, 1878, 6 R. 318; 16 S.L.R. 213.

—Repetition of information laid before police.

In an action of damages for repeating to members of the public an accusation of the commission of a crime of which the defender had informed the police, held that the occasion was not privileged, and that malice and want of probable cause need not be averred.

Walker v Cumming, 1868, 6 M. 318; 40 J. 175; 5 S.L.R. 220.

—Public repetition of charge after informing police.

In an action of damages for wrongous apprehension and slander, the pursuer averred that he and the defender, having travelled in the same railway carriage, had gone on board the same steamer; that while on board the steamer the defender had stated to a police constable that the pursuer had stolen the defender's watch; that the constable had thereupon apprehended the pursuer; and that the defender had frequently, from the time of the pursuer's apprehension till the vessel reached its destination, in a loud voice continued to say, in the presence of certain passengers, that the pursuer had stolen her watch. Held that the pursuer was entitled to an issue whether the defender falsely and calumniously stated, in the presence of the persons named, that the pursuer had stolen the defender's watch.

—Circulating crimen falsi petition.

Held that persons who had signed a crimen falsi petition to the Lord Advocate craving that criminal proceedings should be taken against certain persons for conspiracy and perjury, were privileged so far as regarded the signature of the document, but were not privileged in instigating the circulation of the document among the public with a view to getting other signatures.

Dowgray v Gilmour, (O.H.) 1906, 14 S.L.T. 104.

—Statement made in presence of bystanders before police summoned—Res gestæ—Malice and want of probable cause.

In an action of damages for slander and wrongous apprehension, it was proved that the pursuer, while walking on the street with his mother and sister, had, in their presence, been charged by the defender, who mistook him for another person, with fraudulent imposition; that the defender then went for a policeman, and ten minutes after gave him into custody. Held that the statement made to the police was privileged, and that, on the evidence, malice and want of probable cause had not been proved; that as the whole res gestæ formed only one occurrence, the pursuer was not entitled to damages in respect of the statements made to him before the police were called.

—Charge of theft—Question of civil right.

The pursuer of an action of damages for slander, who was a former employee of the defenders, had certain goods of the defenders in his hands when he left their service. He refused to return the goods until certain charges which he claimed for work done on the goods had been paid. The defenders lodged a charge of theft against the pursuer with the police authorities. Held that the occasion was not privileged.

Kennedy v John Henderson & Son, (O.H.) 1903, 11 S.L.T. 156.

———Letter leading up to prosecution — Separate issue on letter.

The pursuer, a wholesale bottler, received a letter from the solicitor for the defenders, a firm of wholesale brewers, charging him with adulteration of stout issued to him by the defenders. In a prosecution which followed, the pursuer was acquitted. Held that, as the letter merely led up to, and formed a step in, the prosecution, the pursuer was not entitled to an issue founded on the letter apart from the prosecution.

———Malice and want of probable cause—Slander and wrongous apprehension—Form of issue.

In an action of damages by a railway clerk against a goods manager of the railway for calling the pursuer a thief in the presence of other railway officials, and thereafter giving him into the custody of the police, the pursuer proposed two issues, one for the alleged slander and another for wrongous apprehension. Held that the whole res gestæ formed only one occurrence, and that one issue only should be allowed, with malice and want of probable cause inserted.

Gray v Maitland, (O.H.) 1896, 4 S.L.T. 38.

(344)

———Threat to report to procurator-fiscal.

(345)

Malice—Sufficiency of averment.

Circumstances in which a general averment of malice was held sufficient to support an issue in an action of damages for slander on account of information given to the police.

Currie v Weir, 1900, 2 F. 522; 37 S.L.R. 382.

———Sufficiency of averment—Form of issue.

In an action at the instance of a dismissed employee against the manager of the employers' firm for damages on account of wrongous information given by the defender to the police, the pursuer averred circumstances connected with his dismissal, which, he stated, had given rise to ill-will against him on the part of the defenders. Averments which were held relevant to infer malice. Form of issue allowed.

———Want of probable cause—Sufficiency of averment—Knowledge of falsity of charge.

A plasterer brought an action against a builder for damages on account of the defender having given information to the police, in consequence of which the pursuer was tried in the police court on a charge of having stolen five cornice moulds and a plan from the defender, but was acquitted; he averred that the defender was well aware that said cornice moulds, or at least the zinc portions thereof, were the property of the pursuer, yet he maliciously withheld this information from the police; that the defender was well aware that said plan had been treated by both parties as valueless, yet he maliciously included it in the said charge. The defender pleaded that the pursuer's averments were irrelevant, in respect that he had not made a sufficient averment of facts and circumstances inferring malice, and, further, in respect that the pursuer's averments showed that the defender had probable cause for giving information to the police. Held that the pursuer's averments were relevant, and issue allowed.

———Proof of malice—Charge of theft—Recklessness.

A tenant, while removing some flooring from his house was stopped by his landlord on the street; the tenant having refused to return with the flooring, which he claimed as his own, was given into custody by the landlord, but on being taken to the police office was at once liberated. Held that the landlord had been guilty of such recklessness in giving the tenant into custody as to amount in law to malice.

———Want of probable cause—Charge of presenting forged cheque.

A crossed cheque bearing a forged indorsation was presented at a bank. G, the bank agent, believing that he recognised the person who presented it as L, the servant of the customer whose name G understood to be indorsed on it, cashed the cheque. The indorsation was unlike the customer's usual signature. On the forgery being discovered G went to the customer, and stated that he believed L was the person who had presented the cheque. G then gave information to the police. L was in consequence put on trial, but the charge against him was found not proven. Held that the foregoing facts were not evidence of malice and want of probable cause.

———Want of probable cause—Complaint by hotel proprietor that guest had left without paying bill.

A guest at a country hotel left early in the morning without paying her bill, which had been handed to her late on the previous night, alleging as her reason for not paying it that she had not had time to check it. The hotel proprietor sent a letter to the local constable in the following terms:—"Mrs. West left without paying bill, £69 4s. 2d. Please detain." In an action of damages by the guest against the hotel proprietor, a jury found for the pursuer on an issue whether the defender had falsely, calumniously, maliciously, and without probable cause, represented that the pursuer had attempted to defraud the defender. Circumstances in which the Court set aside the verdict, on the ground that there was no evidence either of malice or of want of probable cause, and in the exercise of their powers under sec. 2 of the Jury Trials Amendment Act, 1910, instead of allowing a new trial, entered judgment for the defender.

Want of probable cause—Proof of statements in trade circular.

In an action of damages, at the instance of a discharged employee against his former employers, a jury found for the pursuer on issues whether the defenders had maliciously and without probable cause lodged with the criminal authorities charges of theft and of fraud against the pursuer, and whether they had caused to be circulated amongst certain business firms a circular in which they maliciously represented that the pursuer had been guilty of fraudulent practices. Circumstances in which the Court set aside the verdict on the ground that there was no evidence before the jury either of want of probable cause or of malice.

Want of probable cause—Averment to rebut—Grounds on which defender lodged information.

A brought an action of damages for slander against B, his former partner, upon the ground that B had falsely, maliciously, and without probable cause lodged an information with the criminal authorities charging him with embezzling a certain sum of money. B stated that he had laid the facts as to A's actings in the matter in question, and also as to A's actings in other matters, before the criminal authorities, and set forth in detail the whole information which he submitted, and the grounds on which he submitted it. Held that B was entitled to prove the grounds on and circumstances in which he lodged the whole information in order to show that he had not acted maliciously or without probable cause.

Privileged occasion—Statement made to parish council with regard to medical officer—Statement made by president of nursing association with reference to non-employment of nurse—Statement made in the interest of the poor.

The president of a district nursing association sent to the parish council a letter calling their attention to the fact that the parish medical officer had failed to obtain the services of the association's nurse for one of his patients, Mrs. H, who was an old-age pensioner, but not a pauper. The letter, which narrated with substantial accuracy the facts which had occurred, made no specific charge against the medical officer, but it concluded with these words—"I venture to bring Mrs. H's case to your notice, as one who should have been given help which was within reach, and to which she was entitled." The parish council had on two occasions issued instructions to their medical officer to call in the services of the association's nurse where required. The medical officer, who had been attending Mrs. H as a private practitioner, and not in his capacity as medical officer, brought an action of damages for slander against the writer of the letter. Held (1) that the defender's position as president of the nursing association, coupled with the general interest which she took in the welfare of the poor, would have made the occasion privileged even had the parish council owed no special duty towards the patient; but (2) that the parish council had a duty of affording medical relief to old-age pensioners which per se rendered the occasion privileged.

Statement regarding servant made to employer by former employer—Malice—Issue.

A farm servant brought an action of damages for slander against a company, alleging that the defenders had written a letter to the pursuer's employer stating that the pursuer had maliciously injured a horse belonging to them, and that they brought the matter under the notice of pursuer's employer because his horses might possibly be subjected to similar treatment, and that the statements in the said letter were false, calumnious, and malicious. Held that the question whether there was privilege or not would depend on the evidence, and must be left for determination at the trial, and that malice need not be put in the issue. Observations (per Lord Justice-Clerk Macdonald) as to the class of cases in which malice must be inserted in the issue.

Charge of theft against hotel servant by guest in hotel.

In an action of damages for slander by a housemaid in a hotel against a person residing in the hotel, the pursuer averred that, while she was cleaning the defender's room, he came in and accused her of having stolen during his absence a quantity of whisky and claret from bottles belonging to him in his bedroom, and that thereafter he had repeated the accusation to her mistress, in the presence of the pursuer and of another servant. Held that the pursuer's statement did not disclose a case of privilege, and that it was therefore unnecessary for her to aver facts and circumstances from which malice was to be inferred.

Charge of dishonesty by secretary against foreman of co-operative society.

(359)

Criticism by customer of tradesman's employee.

A skirt cutter brought an action of damages for slander, in which she averred that the defender, while having a skirt fitted at a ladies' tailor's shop where the pursuer was employed, stated in the presence of the manager of the shop that the pursuer was grossly unfit for her duties, and that her services should be dispensed with. Held that the words used were not actionable in the circumstances.

Report by railway inspector to his superiors as to conduct of clerk — Proof.

A railway inspector lodged a report with the traffic superintendent stating that he had detected, in a goods shed, a railway clerk using a gimlet in the side of a cask, and a railway porter sitting on the cask with a water can in his hands, that he had said to them that they were in a very awkward position, and that the clerk said they were, while the porter followed him and asked if he intended to report the matter. The clerk and the porter raised an action of damages for slander against the inspector, and obtained an issue which contained malice. At the trial the pursuers deposed that the whole report was an invention, but they offered no explanation of the defender's motive in making the charge against them. The jury having returned a verdict for the pursuers, the Court held that, if the jury believed the evidence for the pursuers, the false report by the defender was sufficient evidence of malice to warrant the verdict.

Charge of theft by employer of contractor against contractor's servants — Malice — Sufficiency of averment.

In an action of damages for slander the pursuer averred that he was a joiner in the employment of C M & Co., shipwrights; that on a certain day he and three other workmen were sent by the firm to execute a piece of work on board a vessel lying in the docks at Glasgow belonging to the defenders; that some days after the said workmen had left the vessel the defenders sent an account to C M & Co. — "To six bottles of whisky, at 3s. 6d. per bottle, abstracted by your men while putting up, &c., on board" the vessel, and subsequently wrote this letter to C M & Co. — "In reply to yours of yesterday's date, we know that when your men went down the hold to put up the powder bulkhead the whisky cases were intact, but after they left, we found, on examination, that a case had been tampered with and six bottles of whisky abstracted. We could come to no other conclusion but that your men had taken it." The pursuer averred that the account and letter maliciously, and without probable cause, represented the pursuer as being dishonest, and as having stolen six bottles of whisky. There was no other averment of malice. Held that the pursuer's averments showed that the defenders were privileged in making the statements complained of, and that as the pursuer had failed to set forth facts from which malice could be inferred, the action was not relevant.

Giving information to proper authority—Duty or right—Master of ship—Entry in log—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, secs. 243, 244, and 280-286.

Held that, where a pursuer seeks to recover damages for a statement, imputing misconduct to him, which has been made by the defender, in discharge of his duty, to the proper authority, he must put in issue, not only that the statement was made maliciously, but also that it was made without probable cause. Opinion (per Lord Trayner) that the same rule applies where the statement is made in exercise of a right.

The chief officer of a ship raised an action against the master, concluding for damages in respect of an entry in the log, made by the master, that the pursuer had "wilfully and intentionally disobeyed" his orders in allowing a particular seaman to steer. Held (1) that the pursuer must put want of probable cause in issue, as well as malice; and (2) that his averments disclosed a case in which the master had probable cause for his conduct.

Poor law authority's ill-usage of pauper children.

In an action of damages for slander, the pursuer alleged that the defender, the minister of the parish in which the pursuer resided, had, by letters written by him to the inspector of poor of another parish and to the Board of Supervision, represented the pursuer as grossly unfit to have the charge of pauper children boarded with him by the parochial board of that other parish. Held that the pursuer was bound to put in issue want of probable cause as well as malice.

minister as to conduct of session clerk asking for inquiry.

A member of a congregation stated to one of the elders, openly in his shop, and in the presence of another person, that another member of the congregation, who was session clerk, had been drunk and incapable on a certain night. Held that the statement was not privileged.

In an action of damages for slander, held by the presiding judge at the trial (Lord Ormisdale) that a letter written by a member of a congregation to the minister, informing him that another member, who was also session clerk, had been charged with drunkenness, sent with a view to inquiry, was privileged. Observations on the nature and extent of the privilege claimed.

Malice—Issue—Duty of master to guarantors of servant's honesty.

The employers of a commercial traveller were insured with an insurance company under a policy taken out by him against his possible defalcations. In an action of damages for slander the traveller averred that the employers had made statements to the insurance company that the pursuer had been guilty of embezzlement, and that they made those statements in the knowledge that the policy had been avoided. The defenders denied that the policy had been avoided. Held that the occasion was privileged and that malice must be inserted in the issue.

Dismissal of servant on account of drunkenness—Letter to registry through which servant engaged—Malice—Sufficiency of averment.

A domestic servant in an action of damages for slander against her former mistress averred that the defender, immediately after dismissing the pursuer for alleged drunkenness, wrote to the registry office through which the defender had engaged the pursuer a letter in which she stated that she had found the defender "a most unsatisfactory servant, and she is leaving to-day. Yesterday morning she was quite incapable, and unfit to take orders," and the letter further stated that the writer declined to give any one the servant's character "without mentioning her failing." The pursuer further averred that the statements regarding the pursuer were not made in answer to any inquiry, but were gratuitous and unsolicited, and were made by the defender maliciously, and without probable cause, and with the intention of injuring the pursuer in her character and prospects. Held (1) that the letter founded on was privileged; and (2) that the averments of malice were irrelevant for want of specification.

Proof — Report against servant to employers' association — Register of defaulters.

An association of owners of steam fishing vessels resolved that a "register of defaulting crews" should be kept, and that, if one of the crew of a vessel belonging to a member should, when engaged to go to sea, refuse to do so, or should come on board drunk, the member should report his name to the secretary for insertion in the register. A member of the association reported an engineer to the secretary as having been drunk, and having refused to proceed to sea. The engineer's name and alleged offences were accordingly inserted in the register. The engineer brought an action of damages for slander against the member who had reported him. Held that in making the report the defender was privileged, and that, as it was not proved that he had acted maliciously, he was not liable in damages for slander.

Law agent who had given personal guarantee to cautioners for executrix writing to cautioners — Malice — Sufficiency of averments.

A law agent who was in charge of the winding up of an executrix estate, and had given the cautioners for the executrix his personal guarantee that the estate would be distributed according to law, wrote to the cautioners that his guarantee would become inept in consequence of the actings of the son of the executrix, and advising them to withdraw their bond of caution. In an action of damages, the son innuendoed the letter as slanderous, and averred that the defender wrote the letter maliciously, with the object of inducing the cautioners to withdraw their bond, and so obstructing the administration of the estate and preventing or delaying the funds being taken out of his hand. Held (1) that the occasion was privileged; and (2) that, assuming the necessity for an averment of facts and circumstances inferring malice, such were sufficiently averred.

Trade slander — Company for providing subscribers with confidential information as to financial status of traders.

In an action of damages for slander, the pursuers complained of a letter as injurious to their credit. It was admitted that the defenders were a company formed for the purpose, inter alia, of preventing their subscribers from making bad debts, by furnishing them with information as to the financial status of persons with whom they proposed to trade; that the letter complained of was written in response to a request by a member for information as to the amount of credit which it would be safe for him to give the pursuers; and that the information was given on the condition that it was confidential, for the use of the subscriber only, and not to be divulged by him to any third party. Held that the defenders were privileged in writing as they did, and that malice must be put in the issue.

Trade association — Statement affecting credit — Black list.

A local association of traders, at their own expense, and for the protection of their trading interests, caused a list of names and addresses of certain persons in the district to be circulated annually among their members (but to no one who was not a member). The list bore no title, and made no comment on the persons whose names were included; but it was admittedly compiled from the "black lists." An action of damages against the association and certain of its members, at the instance of a person whose name appeared in the list, was dismissed as irrelevant, in respect that the defenders were privileged in issuing the list, and that facts inferring malice were not averred.

Privileged occasion — Moral duty to make communication — Poaching — Communication to shooting tenant in response to inquiry.

A, the tenant of the shootings on a certain estate, complained to an innkeeper in the neighbourhood that poaching had been taking place on the estate, and the innkeeper promised to assist A in finding out who the poachers were. Thereafter the innkeeper was told by a gamekeeper that B had been poaching on the estate. The innkeeper communicated this information to A. In an action of damages for slander brought by B against the innkeeper, held that in making this communication to A the defender was privileged.

Statement to relative about matter of family interest — Statement to mother about son's companions.

The defender in an action of slander said to his sister-in-law that he had had it from a friend that the pursuer would not be permitted to go on any racecourse in the country, and he made the statement because he thought the pursuer was not a good companion for his nephew. Held that the statement was privileged.

Malice—Sufficiency of averments—Discrepancy between statements at different times as to servant's character.

In an action of damages for slander, the pursuer averred that he had been for four years in the service of the defender as a barman, that on leaving his service he received a certificate that the defender had always found him honest, sober, and trustworthy; that a year later, in answer to an inquiry, the defender wrote that the pursuer was "no good," meaning thereby that the pursuer was not honest and sober; that that statement was known to the defender to be false, and was made maliciously. Held that malice might be inferred from the unexplained contradiction between the character of 1899 and the character of 1900, and an issue allowed.

Macdonald v M'Coll, 1901, 3 F. 1082; 38 S.L.R. 781; 9 S.L.T. 146.

Want of probable cause—Kirk session—Objections to appointment of elder.

In an action of damages for slander on account of statements made by members of a parish church to the kirk session, with a view to preventing the pursuer from being ordained as an elder, held (by Lord Stormonth-Darling, Ordinary, and acquiesced in) that want of probable cause must be put in issue as well as malice.

Doctor and chemist—Malice—Extravagant statements—Recklessness.

A doctor, in making a complaint to a chemist that he has not dispensed a medicine in accordance with the doctor's prescription, is in a privileged position, and anything said or written by the doctor to the chemist, pertinent to the occasion, will be protected unless malice is proved. Terms of a letter written by a doctor to a chemist, complaining of the way in which the chemist had dispensed one of the doctor's prescriptions, which, in the circumstances proved, were held to be so extravagant and to indicate such recklessness on the part of the doctor as to infer malice.

Sale of goods—Charge of theft.
 The purchaser of a coat having failed to pay for it at the contract time, the sellers wrote him a letter demanding payment, and stating that his retention of the coat was in the circumstances theft. Held that the occasion was not prima facie privileged. Opinion that, if the occasion were privileged, and malice had accordingly to go into the issue, the case was not one where special facts and circumstances inferring malice would require to be averred.

Handasyde v J. Hepworth & Son, (O.H.) 1907, 15 S.L.T. 180.

Manager of theatre—Statement that actor obtained engagement under false pretences as to capacity.

A theatre manager engaged an actor to perform at three towns. After the performance had been completed at two of the towns, he cancelled the engagement for the third, stating that the actor had failed to complete his part of the transaction by not performing in first-class style, and, after some correspondence, in which the actor insisted on implement of the contract, wrote to him in these terms—"You made your engagement under false pretences. You advertise what you are not capable of performing." The actor brought an action of damages for slander against the manager, averring that the defender had maliciously and without probable cause written the letter complained of. Held that the letter was privileged, and that it was therefore necessary for the pursuer to aver and to prove malice, and issue allowed.

Stuart v Moss, 1885, 13 R. 299; 23 S.L.R. 231.

Theatre—Bye-laws made by statutory authority—Duty not to permit women of ill-fame to enter theatre.

In an action by a married woman for having been called a prostitute and ordered to leave a theatre by the theatre manager, the pursuer referred for its terms to a bye-law, made under statutory authority, and founded on by the defenders, which was applicable to the theatre, and which provided that the licensed manager should not permit men or women of bad fame to enter the theatre. Held that the occasion was privileged and that malice must be inserted in the issue.

Shop manager charging customer with theft.

A lady brought an action of damages for slander against a shopkeeper, in which she averred that one of his departmental managers had challenged her in the shop with the theft of a purse. The pursuer did not aver actual malevolence on the part of the manager. The Lord Ordinary disallowed issues and dismissed the action, holding that the occasion was privileged and that malice was not relevantly averred.

Henderson v Patrick Thomson, Limited, (O.H.) 1911, 1 S.L.T. 284.

Sufficiency of averments of malice—Recklessness—Master's liability for servant's slander.

In an action of damages for slander, brought against a limited company owning a music hall, the pursuer averred that, while he was present at a performance in the hall, he was falsely accused by an attendant of indecent conduct towards a member of the audience, and that he was taken to a private room, where the slander was repeated by the attendant and by the manager. He averred that these slanderous statements "were made and persisted in most recklessly, pertinaciously, and maliciously." The occasion was admittedly privileged. Held there was no sufficient averment of facts inferring malice, and the action was irrelevant.

Accusation of dishonesty—Manager of business and dismissed servant—Malice—Sufficiency of averments of malice.

A cashier, who had been dismissed from his employment, brought an action of damages for slander against the manager of the business. The pursuer averred that, having discovered shortages in the cash, he reported these to his employer; that the same afternoon, in the presence of his employer, the defender charged him with having taken the money, and the same evening dismissed him from the employment. Two days later the defender called on him at his house and, in the presence of his wife, said to him, "I have come to ask for explanations; you must have taken the money." He further averred that the defender, who had formerly been very friendly, had for some months entirely changed in his demeanour; that he had become jealous of the pursuer and desired to undermine his influence with his employer and to find an excuse for getting him dismissed; that he made these accusations, which inquiry would have shown to be baseless, without making any investigation and with the object of gratifying the animus he had conceived against the pursuer. Held that, on the pursuer's averments, the occasion when the slander was uttered in the pursuer's house was not privileged; and issue without malice allowed. Held further that, if it should appear at the trial that the occasion was privileged and consequently that malice must be established, the pursuer's record contained relevant averments of malice.

Want of probable cause—Minister communicating to candidate for eldership a report as to candidate's character.

In an action of damages for slander, the pursuer, a candidate for eldership, averred that the defender, the parish minister, had written a letter to him in which he informed him that a third party had made a serious charge against him, and that the defender could not ordain the pursuer as elder with such a charge against his character. Opinion (per Lord President Strathclyde and Lord Skerrington) that the pursuer was bound to put want of probable cause in issue as well as malice.

(e) By Master to Servants.

Criticism by master of servant's skill.

Observed (per Lord Stormonth-Darling, Ordinary)—"When a master confines himself to merely expressing an opinion about the incompetency or unskilfulness of a servant, it seems to me it would be dangerous to the proper carrying on of the work of society that he should be liable to an action of damages for slander."

Munro v Mudie, (O.H.) 1901, 9 S.L.T. 91.

Privileged occasion—Charge of theft—Inquiry about missing property made in presence of persons not concerned in the matter.

An inquiry as to missing property which was held to support an innuendo of theft was held not to be privileged, in respect that it was made before fellow-servants of the accused person, who were not concerned with the matter.

Adams v Templeton & Co., (O.H.) 1913, 2 S.L.T. 241.

Malice—Issue—Warning by mistress to female servants as to character of person with whom they associated.

In an action of damages for slander against the wife of the rector of an institution, the pursuer averred that the pursuer had been at a ball with two of the female servants in the institution; that thereafter the defender stated in the presence of Nellie Angus, Margaret Johnston, Annie M'Phail, and Annie Dunbar, all domestic servants in the institution, that the pursuer was "a noted blackguard," "a low scamp," and that he went after every good-looking girl for the purpose of seducing them. The pursuer in answer to an averment by the defenders stated that he took Maggie Johnston and Mary M'Phail to the ball, and returned with Maggie Johnston and Nellie Angus about five o'clock next morning, and admitted that the pursuer and Nellie Angus spent a short time together in the grounds of the institution before they separated. The pursuer admitted that in 1886 he had unsuccessfully defended an action for the alimony of an illegitimate child. Held that the pursuer's averments did not necessarily disclose a case of privilege, and that malice and want of probable cause should not be put in the issue.

—Dismissal of servant on account of theft—Correspondence between master and servant's law agent with reference to claim for wages—Malice—Sufficiency of averment.

A domestic servant was convicted of stealing certain articles from her master's premises, and dismissed from his service. Her law agent having on her instructions written demanding the balance of wages due to her, her master replied that the wages should be duly paid, but that since her departure many more things had been missed. Her agent again wrote demanding an explanation of these insinuations, and her former master answered that "he had no doubt she had also taken the things now amissing." In an action of damages for slander by the servant against her master, the pursuer averred that the statements were malicious. The defender pleaded privilege and contended that special averments of malice were necessary to entitle the pursuer to an issue. The Court allowed an issue whether "the defender falsely, maliciously, and calumniously made" the last statement quoted, meaning thereby that the pursuer had stolen the things referred to.

—Charge of immorality by employer of domestic servant.

In an action of damages for slander brought by a domestic servant against her master, the pursuer averred that one evening she and a fellow-servant took two men who had come to visit them into their bedroom; that the defender having discovered this ordered the visitors to leave the house; that about three o'clock on the following morning he came into the bedroom where the pursuer was alone and in bed, charged her with immoral conduct the night before, and with being the mother of an illegitimate child, and then expressed a wish to have connection with her. The defender pleaded that as the pursuer's master he was privileged in charging her with misconduct. Held that although a case of privilege might be disclosed at the trial no such case appeared on the pursuer's averment, and that it was not necessary for the pursuer to put malice in issue.

Observed—The general rule is, that an accusation by a master to his servant of misconduct then and there brought to the master's knowledge is privileged.

—Dismissal of servant—Accusation of immorality made by master against servant—Duty of master to inform other members of staff.

The manager of an engineering firm, having observed that two clerks in the drawing office had spent about ten minutes together in a water-closet in the works with the door closed, summarily dismissed them, refusing to hear explanations and using the words—"When two men are discovered under those circumstances, there is only one inference to be made from their conduct." On the following day the manager addressed the drawing office staff and told them—"Two of your number were dismissed yesterday at a moment's notice; they left without a shred of character; they are not men, they are beasts." In actions of damages for slander by both men against the manager, in which it was admitted that the first occasion was privileged, held that the second occasion was also privileged, in respect of the interest and duty which the defender had to inform the staff as to the circumstances of the dismissal.

—Dismissal of servant—Accusation of indecency—Informing other members of staff.

A works manager was alleged to have said before the workpeople employed in the paint shop of the works—"Look here, all of you, decency must be maintained. If men and women are to work together in this employment, I will have no indecency here. What I saw to-day was enough. A, B and C will leave this employment at five o'clock to-night." A and B were men, C was a woman. In separate actions of damages for slander brought by A, B and C against the works manager, held that the case was one of privilege and that malice must go into the issue, but that specific averments of malice were not required and that want of probable cause should not go into the issue.

—Dismissal of nurse by head nurse—No admission that defender had power to dismiss—Form of issue—Malice.

The head nurse of a hospital dismissed another nurse by a letter which the latter alleged to be defamatory. In an action of damages for slander by the dismissed nurse against the head nurse, held that malice was not required in the pursuer's issue, as no admission could be extracted from the condescendence that the defender was lady superintendent of the hospital, and that as such she had oversight of the nurses and had power to dismiss them.

Hamilton v Wright, (O.H.) 1895, 3 S.L.T. 10.

—Dismissal of servant—Circular sent by employer to other servants—Charge of in-attention and neglect on part of dismissed servant—Malice—Issue.

—Malice — Sufficiency of averment — Animus and knowledge that charge false.

A cashier, who had been dismissed from his employment, brought an action of damages for slander against his employer, for having, on two occasions (which were admittedly privileged), accused him of misappropriating money, the proposed issue being whether the defender had made these accusations "falsely, calumniously, and maliciously." The pursuer averred that the defender, with whom he had previously been on friendly terms, had conceived an animus against him, and had, by a series of petty incidents which he detailed, endeavoured to annoy him and to induce him voluntarily to leave the defender's service; and that having failed in this purpose the defender had taken steps to dismiss him by making the false accusations complained of. He further averred that these accusations had been made and repeated by the defender in the knowledge that they were false, without inquiry and without listening to the explanation of his innocence which the pursuer had offered, and would have been able, to give. Held that the pursuer had averred facts and circumstances relevant to instruct malice on the part of the defender. The general rule laid down by Lord President Kinross in Macdonald v M'Coll, 3 F. 1082, and followed in subsequent decisions, as to the necessity in cases of privilege of averring facts and circumstances from which malice can be inferred, doubted (per Lord Skerrington); and opinion that in certain cases of privilege a general averment of malice is sufficient.

—Sufficiency of averments—Allegation of dishonesty.

In an action of damages for slander by a former employee against her employer, the pursuer averred that the defender, in presence of two employees, had maliciously accused her of defrauding him. She further averred that the defender had made no inquiry into the truth of the accusation, though inquiry would have shown that the charge was groundless; that he had conceived an ill-will towards the pursuer, and, though formerly friendly, had ceased to speak to her because of a quarrel between her and the defender's manager, and because the pursuer's father had given up his situation in the defender's employment. Held that there was a relevant averment of malice.

(400)

—Sufficiency of averments—Allegation of drunkenness.

A cook was dismissed by her employer on the ground of drunkenness. Her agent wrote to the employer demanding a month's board wages. The employer replied to the agent stating that he had dismissed her for drunkenness. In an action of damages for slander by the cook against her employer, the defender was assailed, on the ground that the pursuer must aver facts and circumstances from which malice might be inferred, and that the pursuer's averments were insufficient.

Sheriff v Denholm, 1897, 5 S.L.T. 234, 346.

(401)

Averments which, in an action of damages for slander arising out of a charge of being drunk, made by a master against a servant, were held not to amount to a relevant averment of malice.

(402)

Secretary of trade union—Duty to criticise returns of branches.

The secretary of a trade union, whose duty it was to criticise the returns from the branches, stated at a general meeting of the union, and while in course of submitting the reports of the branches, that the committee of a branch had paid a certain sum to themselves while distributing strike pay. Held that the occasion was privileged. Averments which were held insufficient to infer malice.

Creditors on insolvent estate—Imputation against trustee on debtor's estate.

At a meeting of creditors an accountant was nominated trustee on the debtor's estate. One of the creditors made statements to the effect that the accountant was unfit for the post. Held that the occasion was privileged, but that a general averment of malice was sufficient.

Oliver v Barnet, (O.H.) 1895, 3 S.L.T. 163.

Sporting association—Complaint by referee of football match to committee of football union as to offensive behaviour of player—Malice—Sufficiency of averments.

The referee at a football match complained by letter to the committee of the football union that one of the players had during the match made offensive remarks about him. At a meeting of the committee held to investigate the matter, the referee gave evidence in support of his complaint. Held that the occasion was privileged, and an action of damages for slander at the instance of the player against the referee dismissed as irrelevant in the absence of a specific averment of facts and circumstances inferring malice.

(g) At Public Meetings.

(405)

Discussion of questions before meeting—Charges against individuals.

At a meeting of the statutory court of contributors to the Royal Infirmary of Edinburgh a question arose as to the propriety of electing as managers persons favourable to the admission of female medical students to the clinical lectures in the Infirmary. A member of the court, in speaking of the importance due to the opposition of the male medical students, referred to a petition presented to the managers signed by a number of them, and to a students' riot at Surgeons' Hall, where female students had been attending medical classes along with male students, and said—"This I do know, that the riot was not wholly or mainly due to men from Surgeons' Hall. I know that Dr. C's class assistant" (in the University) "was one of the leaders of the riot, and that the foul language he used could only be explained on the supposition I heard asserted that he was intoxicated." In an action of damages, brought by the class assistant referred to, against the speaker, held that in the circumstances the defender was not privileged in her observations regarding the pursuer.

Craig v Jex-Blake, 1871, 9 M. 973; 43 J. 524; 8 S.L.R. 616.

Responsibility for admission of public—Reply to public attack.

A district nurse brought an action of damages for slander against the members of committee of a district nursing association in respect of a report which referred to the pursuer and was read on behalf of the defenders at a meeting of the association attended by the public, and was published in a newspaper. The Lord Ordinary allowed issues without the insertion of malice or want of probable cause, leaving it to be determined by the judge who presided at the trial whether the defenders were responsible for the presence of the public at the meeting, and whether the defenders were vindicating their conduct from public attack in consequence of the pursuer herself having, in the first instance, carried the controversy into the public prints.

Jackson v Kemp, (O.H.) 1900, 7 S.L.T. 391.

(h) In Other Cases.

(407)

Bank agent—Charge of forgery against customer—Statement made in presence of bank clerks—Sufficiency of averments of malice.

In an action of damages for slander, the pursuer averred that the defender, who was a bank agent, had in the public office of the bank, and in the presence and hearing of the bank clerks, who were named, maliciously, and without probable cause, used words which implied that the pursuer had forged the signature of the acceptor of a bill; that the defender had then consulted a friend, who stated that, in his opinion, the signature was genuine; but that, notwithstanding that opinion, he had repeated the charge of forgery, and that later in the same day, when a clerk whom he had sent with a letter to the pursuer returned and said that he could not find him, he had said of him, "he may have skedaddled," implying that he had probably fled in order to escape a criminal prosecution; and that on both these latter occasions the slander was also uttered in the public office, and in the presence and hearing of the bank clerks and members of the public. The pursuer further averred that, if the defender had any reason to suspect the signatures, he might have satisfied himself by applying to the acceptor, whose office was near at hand. Held (1) that the pursuer's averments did not disclose a case of privilege; and (2) that they contained a sufficient averment of malice to entitle him, if a case of privilege were made out at the trial, to meet that by proving malice.

Doctor — Charge of improper treatment against midwife.

A midwife raised an action of damages for slander against a doctor, averring that she had been called to attend a woman (Mrs. Moore) in labour; that she had given her a certain drug which was the proper treatment; that the defender, having been called in to see the woman, stated to Mrs. Moore's husband that the pursuer had poisoned his wife. The Court refused to insert malice and want of probable cause in the issue, on the ground that the pursuer's statements did not necessarily disclose a case of privilege.

Tradesman engaged in construction of building — Complaint against architect of building.

An architect of a building in course of erection condemned certain joiner work. The law agent of the joiner, acting on the instructions of his client, wrote letters to the architect and to the employers accusing the architect of acting unfairly. Held that the joiner was not in a position of privilege.

False birth notice—Statement not ex facie slanderous—Ignorance of slander.

A newspaper among the notices of births stated that A B had given birth to a child at a certain date. The statement was defamatory because the date stated was within two months of A B's marriage. Observed (per Lord Moncreiff) that the statement was not privileged.

Negligence—Advertisement—Necessity for averring negligence.

Sporting association—Complaint by referee of football match to committee of football union as to offensive behaviour of player—Publication of resolution of committee.

The referee at a football match complained to the committee of the football union that one of the players had during the match made offensive remarks about him. The committee, after inquiry, passed and communicated to the press a resolution that the player had used offensive language to the referee, and that he be severely censured, and be ordered to apologise to the referee. In an action of damages for slander at the instance of the player against the individual members of the committee, held that a case of privilege was not disclosed on the pursuer's averments, and that the question of privilege must be left to be dealt with at the trial.

Law agent—Law agent writing slanderous letter on instructions of client—Agent identifying himself with slanderous statement.

A law agent wrote a slanderous letter on the instructions of his client. The person slandered was held entitled to sue the agent in respect that he had identified himself with the slanderous statement. Question, whether the agent was privileged.

Slanderous statement made without instructions of client.

In an action of damages for slander, the pursuer averred that he had let a cutting machine on hire to W, and that on W becoming insolvent and granting a trust deed, the pursuer removed the machine from his premises; that the defender, the law agent for the trustee, wrote to the pursuer a letter in which he demanded delivery of the machine, and which the pursuer inuendored as charging him with theft of the machine; and that the letter was written and the charge of theft made maliciously and without instructions from the defender's client. Held that the word maliciously ought not to go into the issue. Opinions (per Lord President Inglis and Lord Adam) that if the defender made the charge of theft without instructions from his client he was not privileged. Opinion (per Lord Kinneir) that if the defender had instructions to write a letter demanding delivery of the machine, the mere variation in its terms from his instructions would not deprive him of his privilege.

Slanderous statement made as agent and in reference to client's business.

A partnership was dissolved by the death of one of the partners, and a reference took place to ascertain the amount which the representatives of the deceased could claim from the surviving partner. There was a formal investigation into the affairs of the surviving partner, the result of which the law agent of the deceased's representatives had to consider, in order to satisfy himself as to the survivor's financial position. The law agent on six different occasions made statements to the effect that the surviving partner was in embarrassed circumstances. The statements were made with reference to the inquiries into the surviving partner's financial position, and there was nothing to suggest that in making them the law agent was acting otherwise than as agent. In an action by the surviving partner against the law agent, held that the defender was privileged, that it was not necessary to state facts and circumstances showing malice, and that want of probable cause need not be inserted in the issue.

Watson v Ross, (O.H.) 1897, 5 S.L.T. 182.

(416)

Letter written by law agent on behalf of client—Letter written to law agent about claim put forward against client—"Attempt at extortion."

Edmondson v Cartner, (O.H.) 1905, 13 S.L.T. 78, No. 137, supra.

Slander of title—Statement by law agent of landlord at sale of tenant's furniture—Malice.

The law agent of the proprietor of a house attended a sale of the tenant's furniture, and stated to the auctioneer, in the hearing of the persons present at the sale, that he had come to stop the sale, that he had got or was to apply for a sheriff's warrant to stop the sale, and that purchasers would not be allowed to remove articles purchased. The auctioneer stated that the current year's rent had been paid, and produced the receipts therefor, and called on the law agent to produce a warrant for stopping the sale, which the agent failed to do. In consequence various persons were deterred from bidding, and the sale realised an amount much below what it would have realised but for the statements made by the law agent. Held that an action of damages against the law agent, in which the above facts were averred, was irrelevant, in respect that the statements complained of were of the nature of slander of title made by a person who had a natural interest to make them, and did not constitute an actionable wrong in the absence of an averment of malice.

Yeo v Wallace, (O.H.) 1868, 5 S.L.R. 253.

(4) REPORTS OF JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS.

(418)

Privilege of newspaper—Fair report.

Per Lord Kyllachy—"I do not . . . consider that any privilege whatever attaches to a newspaper report as such. If a newspaper gives circulation to a slander, it is simply in the position of any other person circulating a slander, and the general rule is that a person circulating a slander is answerable equally with the author of the slander. . . . On the ground of public policy, a certain exception has come to be recognised, namely, that a person reporting truly—that is, fairly and accurately—the proceedings in public Courts of justice is not to be answerable for the circulation thereby of defamatory matter—at all events, in the absence of proof of express malice. On that ground . . . alone, does any privilege attach to the reports of proceedings in Courts of justice, and it is a privilege entirely conditional on the truth—that is, the fairness and accuracy—of the report, and it is a privilege, moreover, which is not at all peculiar to a newspaper, but extends to all other persons who desire for any legitimate reason to put the outside public in the same position as the portions of the public who happened to be within the walls of the Court."

Circumstances in which the Court refused to set aside as contrary to evidence the verdict of a jury finding that a newspaper report of Court proceedings was not fair and accurate.

Fair report—Counter issue.

In an action of damages against the proprietors of a newspaper for slander alleged to be contained in a report in the newspaper of proceedings in a Court of justice, the pursuers averred that certain statements reported to have been made in Court were not made, and that these statements were false and calumnious. The defenders contended that the pursuers were bound to put malice in the issue, and proposed as a counter issue whether the report was a fair and accurate report of the proceedings. Held (1) that a case of privilege did not arise unless the report was fair and accurate, and therefore that malice should not be inserted in the issue; and (2) that the counter issue was unnecessary.

Fair report—Onus of proof.

It is prima facie libellous for a newspaper to say of any one that in a process of divorce he is accused of having committed adultery with a married woman, even although the fact of his being so accused is admitted.

In an action based upon a defamatory statement made in a newspaper, where the defence is that the statement complained of was a fair and accurate report of proceedings in a public Court of justice, it is not incumbent upon the pursuer to negative this defence in his averments. If the statement is prima facie defamatory, the pursuer is entitled to an issue. It is for the defender to establish such a defence, and it is a question for the jury whether he has done so. Question, whether a statement of defamatory allegations made in an action, which is published after the decision of the case, without any intimation of the result, can be a fair and accurate report of proceedings in a public Court of justice.

Privileged occasion—Publication of closed record before trial of cause.

Opinions that the publication in a newspaper of a closed record containing defamatory statements, which has not been referred to publicly in discussion in open Court, is not privileged.

Macleod v Justices of Peace of Lewis, 1892, 20 R. 218; 30 S.L.R. 186.

Publication of summons before record closed.

A summons which has been called in Court, but upon which no other step of procedure has followed, is not a public document, and any person who publishes defamatory statements contained in it is liable to an action of damages.

Observations on the principle of the publicity of judicial proceedings.

Publication of decrees in absence—Fair and accurate report—Black list—Erroneous entry.

In an action of damages of slander the pursuers obtained an issue whether the publication of their name as defenders in a list of decrees in absence in "Stubbs' Weekly Gazette" falsely represented that they were unable to pay their debts. The decree in question was not in absence but of consent. The jury found for the pursuers, and the defenders moved for a new trial on the ground that the statement was a substantially correct report of what took place in a Court of justice. The Court refused the motion, holding that the jury were entitled to take the view that the publication was a representation that the pursuers were unable to pay their debts, and that the same inference would not have arisen if it had been stated that the decree was of consent.

The defenders in an action of damages for slander carried on a business which they described as a means of enabling traders to avoid making bad debts, and were proprietors of a newspaper which had a special portion devoted to the publication of the names and addresses of persons by and against whom decrees in absence were taken. Observed (per Lord Kinnear)—“People who follow such a business . . . impose upon themselves a duty of care and circumspection, . . . and it will be no answer to any well grounded complaint of injury through misrepresentation of fact that they have misunderstood the import of entries in the Sheriff Court books, or that the entries themselves were misleading. They undertake to say what passed in Court apparently by a study of what is recorded in the Sheriff Court books, and they take the risk of their own interpretation of the entries which they may not perfectly understand.”

—Decree recalled in respect of invalid citation.

A debt collector was employed by a creditor to collect a debt. Having failed to do so, he employed a law agent, who used arrestments on the dependence of an action subsequently raised in the creditor's name against him in the Sheriff Court. The debtor was then outwith the jurisdiction of the sheriff, and was not duly cited. Decree in absence was obtained, and arrestments in execution were used against him. The debt collector then published in a “commercial compendium,” for which it was alleged he was responsible, a bare statement that the decree had been obtained against the debtor for the amount of the debt in question. The decree in absence was subsequently recalled on the ground of improper citation. In an action for damages at the instance of the debtor against the debt collector, held on the averments (1) that the defender was merely an intermediary between the client and the law agent, and was not responsible for the errors of the latter; and (2) that the defender, not being responsible for the obtaining of the decree, was not liable in damages for publishing the fact that it had been granted. Action dismissed as irrelevant.

Publication of decrees—Railway company posting up bills setting forth convictions for offences against company.

A railway company is not liable in damages for slander by posting up in its stations bills announcing the names and addresses of persons who have been convicted of the offence of travelling without having previously paid the fare, and with intent to avoid payment thereof, or of other offences against the company's acts and bye-laws, together with the date and nature of the offence and the sentence imposed.

Malice—Publication of fair report—Interdict.

The Court will not interfere by way of interdict to prevent the publication of a report of proceedings in an open Court of Justice, British or foreign, including letters produced in evidence and read, when it is not alleged that the report is unfair. Question, whether averments of malice in such publication will found an action of damages at the instance of a person referred to in such letters.

Privileged occasion—Report of judicial proceedings—Absence of judge—Statements not pertinent to the proceedings.

The statutory examination of a bankrupt was taken in the sheriff-clerk's room, and in part outwith the presence of the sheriff. The trustee used slanderous words with reference to the law agent of the bankrupt. A newspaper published a report of the bankruptcy proceedings, including the statements made by the trustee. In an action by the law agent against the proprietors of the newspaper, the accuracy of the report was admitted by the pursuer, but its fairness was challenged. Held (1) that the words must be deemed to have been uttered in the course of judicial proceedings; but (2) that they had no relation to the judicial proceedings, and that the proprietors of the newspaper were not privileged. Observations on the privilege of newspapers.

Criticism of public official.

Observed (per Viscount Haldane)—“In dealing with a newspaper article written about a public functionary, considerable latitude is allowed by the law. Any gentleman who takes the position of architect under the school board of Dundee is filling a capacity as a public official, and he must expect criticism, such criticism as the law might not recognise as justified in the case of a merely private person, but readily admits when it is in the public interest that criticism should be brought to bear upon the conduct of public officials. When a person is in a public capacity, he may be criticised by the newspapers in the public interest; and that rebuts the presumption of malice in law which the Court might otherwise make and leaves malice in fact to be proved, and malice in fact to be found either in the special language of the article or in circumstances proved which point to some motive of enmity to the particular individual.”

(b) Statements Regarding Candidates at Elections.

(435)

Privileged occasion—Statement by person not an elector.

Where a parish was divided into two electoral divisions for county council purposes, and a voter in one division was sued by a candidate for the other for damages for falsely and calumniously stating that it would be useless to elect the pursuer as he would soon be bankrupt, held that the defender was not privileged, and that malice need not be put in the issue.

Statement by elector.

In an action of damages for slander the pursuer averred that in the course of a municipal election, in which he had been a candidate, the defender, who was an elector, had, in order to influence electors to vote against him, falsely and calumniously stated that the pursuer had been bankrupt, and that he had made a very bad failure, meaning thereby that it was a dishonest and disreputable failure, and that his creditors had received only 1s. 6d. per £, and that the pursuer was, in consequence, an unsuitable person to represent the electors. Held that the pursuer's statement showed that the defender was privileged, and that as malice was not averred, the action fell to be dismissed.

Election to eldership—Canvassing for signatures to petition against candidate.

In an action of damages for slander the pursuer averred that on the occasion of his election to the eldership in a parish church, the defenders had deliberately and maliciously resolved to use means to prevent his ordination; that they had prepared and published a petition to the minister to be signed by members of the congregation representing that the pursuer's appointment as an elder would be injurious to the church; and that they proceeded to canvass certain members of the church for signatures to the petition. Held (by Lord Stormonth-Darling, Ordinary, and acquiesced in) that the pursuer was not bound to put malice and want of probable cause in issue, as the defenders were not privileged in canvassing for signatures to the petition.

Election to eldership—Minister communicating to candidate report as to his character.

In an action of damages for slander, the pursuer, a candidate for eldership, averred that the defender, the parish minister, had written a letter to him in which he informed him that a third party had made a serious charge against him, and that the defender could not ordain the pursuer as elder with such a charge against him. Circumstances in which held that the occasion was privileged and that the pursuers had failed to aver facts and circumstances inferring malice. Opinions (per Lord President Strathclyde and Lord Skerrington) that the pursuer was bound to put probable cause in issue as well as malice.

Want of probable cause—Slander of town councillor standing for re-election.

Held that in an action of damages for slander in respect of defamatory language used about a town councillor who was a candidate for re-election at a public meeting held in reference to the election of town councillors, the averment of want of probable cause was not required.

Christie v Craik, (O.H.) 1899, 7 S.L.T. 67; affirmed on other points, 1900, 2 F. 380; 37 S.L.R. 285; 7 S.L.T. 321.

(c) Replies to Public Attacks.

(440)

Privileged occasion.

Communications to a newspaper made in fair self-defence are privileged, and no action will lie against a man who has been publicly attacked by the pursuer of the action for relevant statements made as publicly in answer to the attack.

A stable-keeper was, on the information of officers of a society for the prevention of cruelty to animals, tried on a charge of cruelty, the result being that the charge was found not proven. He then entered into a correspondence with the secretary of the society, demanding payment of the expenses of the prosecution, complaining that he had suffered cruel injustice, that the society and its officers had an interest in bringing as many prosecutions as possible, that he had been "rushed" into Court without any inquiries having been made, and that the prosecution had "ignominiously failed." His demand for expenses having been refused, he sent the correspondence to a newspaper, and it was published. Thereafter the secretary of the society wrote to the same newspaper, detailing the information on which the prosecution had proceeded, referring to a warning which the society had addressed to the stableman in another case, and pointing out that the judgment was one of "not proven," which was "in the circumstances a very different verdict from 'not guilty.'" The stableman having raised an action of damages for slander, held that the statements complained of did not go beyond what the defenders were entitled to say in answer to the charges made against them, and that there was no relevant ground of action.

Opinion (per Lord Shand) that the occasion was privileged.

Observations (per Lord Shand) on the necessity for averments of malice and an issue of malice in cases of this description.

Gray v Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, 1890, 17 R. 1185; 27 S.L.R. 906.

———M wrote a letter to a newspaper in which he stated that he had detected W, who had contracted to supply groceries to a school of which M had been superintendent, in trying to send a different, and, he believed, a cheaper brand of coffee than that contracted for. W replied by a letter to a newspaper, which M in an action of damages for slander by him against W innuendoeed as representing that he "had no regard for truth and was a liar." Held that the letter as innuendoeed was more than a reply to the pursuer's charge, and that the pursuer was entitled to an issue whether the statement in the defender's letter represented that the pursuer had no regard for truth and was a liar.

Milne v Walker, 1893, 21 R. 155; 31 S.L.R. 149; 1 S.L.T. 332.

STATUTES.

Act 1886—The Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886 (49 & 50 Vict. c. 29).

Act 1887—The Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 24).

Act 1911—The Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911 (1 & 2 Geo. V. c. 49).

Act 1919—The Land Settlement (Scotland) Act, 1919 (9 & 10 Geo. V. c. 97).

I. UNDER THE CROFTERS HOLDINGS ACTS, 1886 and 1887.

1. JURISDICTION AND PROCEDURE.

(1) JURISDICTION.

Jurisdiction of courts with regard to arrears of rent.

Held, on a construction of the Act 1886, particularly sec. 6, sub-sec. (5), thereof, that the jurisdiction of the ordinary courts of law to grant decree for payments of arrears of rent is not suspended by the presentation of an application to the Commissioners under the act to fix a fair rent and to deal with arrears.

Question (per Lord Rutherford Clark), whether the landlord is entitled to do instant diligence on such a decree for recovery of the full sum named therein, and whether his remedy, pending the determination of the Commissioners, is limited to diligence in security.

Held (per Lord Wellwood, Ordinary), upon a construction of the Acts 1886 and 1887, that a decree for payment of arrears of rent may be pronounced against a crofter notwithstanding the dependence of an application to the Commissioners to have a fair rent fixed.

Declarator that applicant was a crofter in sense of Act—Competency.

An application to the Crofters' Commission contained a prayer for a bare declarator that the applicant was a crofter in a certain holding within the meaning of the Crofters Holdings Act, 1886. Held that the application was incompetent, in respect that the Act did not empower the Commission to issue such declarators.

Declarator as to crofter's right of pasturage.

Held that the jurisdiction of the Court of Session to entertain an action by a proprietor for declarator and interdict against crofters whose holdings adjoined his lands, and who asserted that at the date of the Act 1886 they had rights of pasturage over his property, was not ousted by an application made by the crofters prior to the raising of the action, and still pending, to have fair rents fixed for their holdings under the Act.

Question, whether tenant is crofter in sense of Act.

Observed (per Lord M'Laren)—“Unless the proprietor and the tenant are agreed that the tenant is a crofter in the sense of the Act, and is entitled to its benefits, it is only through the ordinary courts of the country that the dispute can be finally determined.”

Value of cause—Special case—Competency.

Special case as to the amount of rent payable by certain crofters dismissed on the ground that the value of the cause was under £25, sec. 63 of the Court of Session Act, 1868 not extending the jurisdiction of the Court of Session so as to enable it to decide in a special case questions not otherwise competent to it.

Finality of sheriff's judgment under Act 1886, sec. 16.

Question, whether the decision of a sheriff, finding that a person to whom a holding had been bequeathed was not one of the relatives to whom the deceased might legally bequeath his holding, was a final decision in the sense of the Act 1886.

Finality of determination of Crofters' Commission—Order fixing fair rent, but not determining whether applicant a crofter—Act 1886, secs. 21 and 25.

A person, who held as sub-tenant part of a farm, presented an application to the Crofters' Commission to have the fair rent of his holding fixed under the Crofters Holding Act, 1886. No question was raised before the Commission as to whether the applicant, being a sub-tenant, was a crofter within the meaning of the Act. The Commission pronounced an order fixing a fair rent, but did not in terms find that the applicant was a crofter in the sense of the Act. In an action by the landlord for reduction of the order fixing a fair rent, on the ground that the applicant, as a sub-tenant, was not a crofter in the sense of the Act, held that as the Commission had not considered the question whether the applicant was a crofter in the sense of the Act, their order was not final on that question, and that the landlord was entitled to have the decision of the Court on the question.

Question, whether if the Commission had determined that the applicant was a crofter in the sense of the Act, their determination would have been final.

Determination by Crofters' Commission that applicant a crofter—Reduction—Act 1886, secs. 20, 21, and 25.

In an application under sec. 20 of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886, the Commissioners found and declared that the applicant was a crofter and fixed a fair rent. Thereafter the landlord raised an action against the applicant concluding (1) for reduction of the order, and (2) in the event of reduction, for removal of the applicant from his holding on the ground that he was not a crofter. The defender pleaded, inter alia, that the action was excluded by sec. 25—the finality clause of the statute. Held (1) that the Commissioners were entitled, for the purpose of determining whether they had jurisdiction to entertain the application, to decide whether the applicant was a crofter; (2) that their decision in so far as it determined the matter committed to them by the Act, viz., the fixing of a fair rent, was not open to reduction; but (3) that their decision was not final on the question whether the applicant was a crofter, and so entitled to fixity of tenure, that being a question for the Court.

“Cottar”—Compensation for improvements.

Held that it is incompetent for a “cottar” to claim compensation for improvements, under the Act 1886, in the Court of Session.

M'Dougall v M'Alister, 1890, 17 R. 555; 27 S.L.R. 445.

(2) PROCEDURE.

(11)

Decree conform—Sheriff—No appeal.

Duke of Argyll v Cameron, 1888, 16 R. 139; 26 S.L.R. 96. SHERIFF, No. 16.

(12)

Suspension—Decree of removing—Caution—Juratory caution.

Interdict—Landlord refusing to accept legatee of deceased crofter—Act 1886, sec. 16.

Interdict between crofters on same estate as to taking seaware—Landlord not called.

In 1903 crofters, who were in the occupation of their crofts at the passing of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886, and whose rents were fixed by the Commissioners under the Act in 1889, brought an action against certain neighbouring crofters who held of the same landlord, for interdict against the defenders infringing rights which the pursuers averred that they possessed, as pertinents of their crofts, of taking seaware from the seashore (belonging to the common landlord) in the neighbourhood of the crofts. The defenders' crofts were not in existence at the passing of the Crofters Holdings Act, 1886, but were formed out of two farms under the powers of the Congested Districts (Scotland) Act, 1897. The pursuers averred that they were entitled to take seaware to the extent to which they had been in use to take it at the date when their rents were fixed; and that the defenders were not entitled to take it to any greater extent than the two tenant farmers had been in use to take it at that date. They averred that the defenders were now taking more than the farmers had been in use to take. The pursuers did not produce any written contract, estate regulation, or finding of the Crofters Commission defining the extent of seaware to which they were entitled. The defenders stated that they had the authority of the landlord for taking seaware as they had taken it, and pleaded "All parties not called," in respect that the landlord had not been called as a defender. The Court sustained the plea and dismissed the action.

Ejection and removing—Trustee in cession—Title to sue—Act 1886, sec. 1.

Mackenzie v Munro, 1894, 22 R. 45; 32 S.L.R. 43; 2 S.L.T. 290, No. 41, infra.

Order fixing fair rent for sub-tenant—No intimation to landlord—Landlord's title to reduce order.

Dalgleish v Livingston, 1895, 22 R. 646; 32 S.L.R. 347; 2 S.L.T. 564, No. 8, supra.

2. RIGHTS AND LIABILITIES OF LANDLORD AND CROFTER.

(1) "CROFTER" IN SENSE OF ACTS.

(17)

Sub-tenant.

Opinion (per Lord Kincairney) that a sub-tenant cannot be a crofter in the sense of the Act 1886.

Held that a sub-tenant was not a crofter within the meaning of the Act.

Condition as to residence—Act 1886, sec. 34.

Held that a person who, between 1885 and 1888, lived at a distance from his holding, visiting it only occasionally for a week or a fortnight at a time to do necessary farm work, the house being at other times during this period unoccupied—was not a crofter within the meaning of the Act, in respect that he had not complied with the condition as to residence.

Heir of crofter dying after passing of Act—Removing—Act 1886, secs. 1, 19, and 34.

A person, who, at the passing of the Act, was a crofter complying with the conditions of sec. 34 of the Act, 1886, died before the parish in which his croft was situated had been declared a crofting parish in terms of sec. 19 of the Act. In an action of removing by his landlord against his heir who was in possession and occupation of the croft, held that the defender was a crofter in the sense of the Act, and entitled to resist removing, subject to the conditions of sec. 1 of the Act.

Bequest of holding—Act 1886, sec. 16.

Held that the power conferred on a crofter under sec. 16 of the Act 1886, of bequeathing his holding, was validly exercised in favour of a niece, although there were in existence sons and daughters of the crofter.

Held that, under the 16th section of the Act 1886, a crofter is not entitled to bequeath his right to his croft to the son of his mother's sister.

Succession to croft—Abandonment—Mora
—Act 1886, secs. 3 and 34.

Circumstances in which the heir of a crofter who had not possessed or paid rent for the croft for seventeen years was held barred by acquiescence and delay from claiming the croft.

Observed (by Lord President Dunedin) that the heir of a crofter who does not come forward and take up the croft debito tempore must be held to have abandoned it, and if two years' rent remains unpaid the right of the heir is forfeited under sec. 3 of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886.

Opinion (per Lord M'Laren) that the heir must establish his claim within a reasonable time, and that such reasonable time could not exceed a year.

Renunciation by eldest heir portioner
—Act 1886, secs. 19 and 34.

A crofter died leaving five daughters, who at common law were his heirs portioners, the eldest of whom had children. The three eldest daughters renounced the succession to the croft by letter of renunciation addressed to the landlord, but the fourth claimed to succeed as her father's heir. Held that whether or not the renunciation by the eldest daughter had the effect of benefiting the landlord or the deceased's next heir the claimant could not succeed, as the next heir was the eldest son of the eldest daughter.

Balfour v Hutchison, (O.H.) 1899, 7 S.L.T. 82.

Legatee of crofter—Refusal of landlord to accept legatee—Interdict—Act 1886, sec. 16.

A crofter bequeathed his right to his holding to M, his mother's sister's son, who entered into occupation of the croft. The landlord having refused to accept him as legatee, M presented a petition to the sheriff for declarator that he was crofter in the holding. The Court having decided that M was not a legatee in the sense of the Crofters Holdings Act, 1886, the landlord applied for interdict against M continuing in possession. M pleaded that interdict was incompetent, as he had been up to the time of the decision in lawful possession of the croft under sec. 16, sub-sec. (f) of the Act. Held that as he had never been entitled to the character of legatee he had never been in possession of the holding, and that interdict was competent.

Colquhoun v Mackenzie, 1894, 22 R. 23; 32 S.L.R. 33; 2 S.L.T. 276.

(2) THE HOLDING.

(26)
Nature of crofter's right in holding—Property—March fence—Act 1861, c. 41.

Held that a crofter within the meaning of the Act 1886 is the tenant, not the proprietor, of his holding, and that, therefore, he has no title to insist, under the Act 1861, c. 41, upon the proprietor of lands adjoining his croft paying half the cost of the march fence.

MacDonald v Dalgleish, 1894, 21 R. 900; 31 S.L.R. 751; 2 S.L.T. 67.

Whether an inn a "holding"—Bankruptcy—Sequestration—Contingent debt.

On expiry of a charge by a landlord on an extract decree for payment of arrears of the rent of an inn the landlord's assignee presented a petition for sequestration of the tenant's estate under the Bankruptcy Act, 1856. The debtor objected, on the ground that the debt was contingent until the Crofters' Commission issued its determination on an application by him to fix a fair rent for the holding. Held that as the debt was constituted by a decree for payment of arrears of rent of an inn, it could not be held to be for the rent of a "holding" within the meaning of the Act; that the debt was not therefore contingent; and that sequestration must be awarded.

Holding including right of ferry.

Circumstances in which held that a small holding included a right of ferry and was accordingly not a holding within the meaning of the Crofters Holdings Act, 1886.

Marquess of Breadalbane v Orr, (O.H.) 1896, 4 S.L.T. 75.

Right of crofter to take seaware—Right in question with singular successors—Act 1886, sec. 12.

In 1894 the proprietor of lands within a crofting parish sold part of these lands, and thereafter the purchaser brought an action against crofters on the remaining portion of the seller's lands praying to have the defenders interdicted from gathering seaware on the seashore ex adverso of the lands sold. In defence the crofters averred that from time immemorial they and their predecessors in the crofts had been in use and had right to gather seaware from the seashore in question, and that in 1887 their rents were fixed by the Crofters' Commission on the footing that they had that right. Held that the defenders were entitled to proof of their averments as to their right to gather seaware.

Macdonald v Macdougall, 1896, 23 R. 941; 33 S.L.R. 705; 4 S.L.T. 73.

Legal right or pertinential privilege.

Question (per Lord Kyllachy), whether pertinential privileges of taking seaware held by crofting tenants at the passing of the Crofters Holdings Act were then or are now of the nature of legal rights or were not then and are not now rather privileges held necessarily at the landlord's pleasure, and subject always to estate regulations.

Right to cut peats.

The yearly tenant of a croft, with the right to cut peats in the moss of A, in 1867 obtained permission from the landlord to cut peats from the moss of B, said permission to continue during the pleasure of the landlord. The crofter thereafter got his peats from B and not from A. In 1887 the landlord withdrew the permission to cut peats in B. The crofter having continued to take peats from B, the landlord applied for interdict against him. The defender maintained that the right to cut peats from B formed part of his holding in the sense of the Act 1886, and that the application for interdict was therefore incompetent. Held that the landlord was entitled to withdraw the permission to cut peats conditionally given, and that interdict fell to be granted.

Right of tenant of farm to crops sown pending proceedings for enlargement of holdings.

In April, 1889, by order of the Crofters' Commissioners, certain lands—part of a farm held under a lease dated subsequently to the passing of the Act 1886—were assigned to certain crofters for the enlargement of their holdings. The landlord and tenant of the farm thereafter brought a suspension and interdict to have the crofters interdicted from entering upon the assigned lands, on the ground that they had no title, not having obtained decree conform to the order from the sheriff in terms of the Act, and obtained interim interdict. After certain procedure decree conform was pronounced on 3rd March, 1890, and the interim interdict was recalled. A second note of suspension and interdict against entering the lands was thereafter brought by the landlord and tenant on the ground that the order and all that had followed upon it was ultra vires of the Commissioners, the farm being held under the above lease. In July, 1890, the reasons of suspension were repelled. Meantime the tenant had sowed the assigned lands with the necessary seeds for crop 1890. In August, 1890, the crofters obtained a decree of ejection against the tenant, and claimed right to the crop sown. In a suspension by the tenant the Court held that in the circumstances the tenant had a right to sow the crop, and that the crop so sown by him belonged exclusively to him.

Question, whether the crofters might have a right to the profits of the crop.

Enlargement of holdings—Application of Act to lands under lease.

Held upon a construction of the Act 1886 (1) that it was not ultra vires of the Crofters' Commission to grant an application by crofters for a let of land for the enlargement of their holdings, although the land applied for was part of a farm let under a lease, the lease being dated subsequent to the Act, and the rent of the farm being above £100; and (2) that the effect of the order granting the application was not suspended till the termination of the lease.

Subdivision of holding—Act 1886, sec. 1, sub-sec. (4), and secs. 3 and 33.

Where a crofter had several years before the passing of the Act 1886 entered into an arrangement with a farm servant engaged yearly from Whitsunday to Whitsunday, to allow him to occupy a house and part of the arable ground on the croft, as part remuneration for his services, and had continued this arrangement after Whitsunday, 1887, held that, as the subdivision of the croft had taken place prior to the passing of the Act, the crofter had not by the mere continuance of the arrangement after that date subdivided his holding and so committed a breach of the statutory condition contained in sec. 1, sub-sec. (4), of the Act.

Right of crofter to build on croft for fish-curing—Act 1886, secs. 1, 8, 32, and 34.

Held that a crofter whose holding adjoined the seashore was not entitled under the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886, to erect or use buildings on his croft for the purpose of fish-curing.

Gilmour v Peterson, 1901, 3 F. 569; 38 S.L.R. 384; 8 S.L.T. 476.

Obligation to erect buildings—Whether buildings erected were in conformity with obligation.

The tenant of a small croft of ten acres, under a nineteen years' lease, bound himself in the lease to erect a house on the croft, for which he was to receive payment at the end of his lease "if built of stone and lime and slated." He built a house on the croft which was not of stone and lime, but was of stone and clay, and instead of being slated was partly tiled and partly thatched. Held that he was not entitled to receive payment for the house at the end of the lease.

Skinner v Lord Saltoun, 1886, 13 R. 823; 23 S.L.R. 595.

(37)

Valuation Acts—Fair rent—Crofter proprietor—Act 1886, sec. 6.

A crofter, the rent of whose farm had been fixed at a fair rent by the Crofters' Commission, purchased his holding. The assessor, assuming that the fair rent represented only the landlord's interest in the croft, added thereto, in fixing the valuation, a sum representing the annual value of permanent improvements on the holding. Held that the valuation was right.

Public burdens—Poor rate—Valuation roll.

In an action for payment of an assessment of poor rates laid upon the defender (1) as proprietor and (2) as occupier, in respect of tenants paying under £4 of rent, the defender maintained that the remedies for enforcing payment from her of these rates ought also to be suspended, because under an application made to the Crofters' Commission for reduction of rent her right of recovery had been suspended. Held that the defence was irrelevant.

Compensation for improvements — Improvements executed under "any specific agreement in writing"—Imperfect agreement perfected by rei interventus—Act 1886, sec. 8.

Under the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886, sec. 8 (c) a crofter renouncing his tenancy cannot obtain compensation for permanent improvements executed by him in fulfilment of "any specific agreement in writing." Held that the expression "specific agreement in writing" was not limited to probative agreements, but included an imperfect agreement made perfect by rei interventus.

Bankruptcy—Forfeiture of tenancy precluding renunciation—Compensation for improvements—Act 1886, secs. 1, 3, 7, and 8—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, sec. 81.

Where the estates of a crofter had been sequestered, but his landlord had taken no steps to remove him, held that the crofter having been made notour bankrupt, his tenancy was forfeited under sec. 3 of the Crofters Act, and consequently that he could not be called upon by the trustee to renounce a tenancy which no longer existed.

Ejection and removing—Trustee in cession—Title to sue—Act 1886, sec. 1.

The trustee in a process of cession against a crofter presented a petition for the summary removing and ejection of the crofter from his holding. The defender refused to grant a disposition omnium bonorum, and the pursuer had taken no means to compel him to grant it, or to convert the cession into a sequestration. Held (by Lord Kincairney, Ordinary) that as the defender, under the provisions of the Crofters Holdings Act, 1886, had no power to assign his tenancy, his right to the croft could not pass to the pursuer, even had a disposition omnium bonorum been granted.

Opinions (per Lord Trayner and Lord Kincairney, Ordinary), that at the time the petition was presented the pursuer had no title to sue.

Resumption by landlord—Statutory notice to treat by railway company—Act 1886, sec. 2.

The Crofters' Commissioners authorised the resumption of a croft by the landlord, on whom a railway company had served a notice to treat with a view to acquiring inter alia the croft for the purposes of a railway. Held that this was resumption for a reasonable purpose within the meaning of sec. 2 of the Crofters Act, 1886.

II. UNDER THE SMALL LAND-HOLDERS (SCOTLAND) ACT, 1911.

1. LAND COURT—JURISDICTION AND PROCEDURE.

(43)

Powers of Land Court—Sist of proceedings ripe for judgment—Competency—Review by Court of Session—Act 1911, sec. 25 (2).

In July, 1914, an application for the formation of small holdings on certain farms was presented to the Land Court by the Board of Agriculture. Answers were lodged by the proprietor, proof was led, the farms were inspected on behalf of the court, and counsel were heard on 11th January, 1916. On 21st March, 1916, judgment not yet having been pronounced, the Board of Agriculture presented a minute in which they stated that, owing to the altered circumstances arising out of the war, they did not wish to proceed further with the application meanwhile; and craved the court to sist proceedings in hoc statu. The proprietor having lodged answers craving the court to pronounce judgment, the Land Court heard parties, and thereafter sisted the proceedings as craved. Held (by a majority of seven judges) that the Land Court had not acted ultra vires in granting the sist, and accordingly that its decision could not be reviewed.

Appeal to Court of Session—Appeal against an order pronounced by one member of the Land Court—Competency—Act 1911, sec. 25.
A party aggrieved by an order pronounced by a single member of the Land Court may appeal to the Court of Session without first submitting the order to review by a court consisting of three or more members of the Land Court.

Procedure—Amendment by the Court—Application by landholders amended so as to apply to statutory small tenants—Competency—Act 1911, secs. 3 (12) and 32 (4).

Tenants of a holding presented to the Land Court, in the character of landholders, an application for the fixing of a fair rent, and parties were heard on the application. Thereafter the Land Court, being of opinion that the greater part of the improvements were not provided by the tenants, amended the application at their own hand so as to make it apply to proceedings at the instance of statutory small tenants, and, without hearing parties further, proceeded to fix an equitable rent and the period of renewal of the tenancy. Held that the amendment was competent, but that the Land Court were bound to give the landlord an opportunity of being heard on any objections he might have to state under sec. 32 (4) of the Small Landholders Act, 1911.

—Motion for rehearing pending requisition for special case—Act 1911—Rules of the Scottish Land Court, Nos. 90 and 102.

An application to the Scottish Land Court for an order declaring the applicant to be a landholder or a statutory small tenant was refused by the Land Court. The applicant required a special case to be stated for appeal to the Court of Session; and thereafter, while the case was being adjusted, he lodged an application for a rehearing. He refused to withdraw the requisition for a special case, and the Land Court refused the application for a rehearing, on the ground that it was incompetent pending the requisition for a special case. Held that the application for a rehearing was competent, and ought to have been dealt with by the Land Court on its merits.

Admissibility of evidence—Meaning of "landholder"—Evidence as to sub-letting to summer visitors—Act 1911, sec. 2.

In an application to the Land Court under the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911, by the occupier of a dwelling-house and garden and a quarter of an acre of agricultural land, for a finding that he was a "landholder" of the subjects within the meaning of the Act, the Land Court disallowed evidence regarding a practice of sub-letting the house to summer tenants and the revenue derived therefrom, which the landlord proposed to lead for the purpose of showing that the applicant was not a "landholder."

Held that the evidence was competent and that it ought to have been admitted; and cause remitted to the Land Court to take the evidence and state the facts which they found proved by such evidence.

2. CONSTITUTION OF NEW HOLDINGS.

(1) EFFECT OF ORDER BY LAND COURT.

Termination of tenancy—Notice to quit—Tacit relocation—Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908, sec. 18—Act 1911, sec. 7 (9) and (11).

A tenant occupied a farm on a lease which expired at Martinmas, 1913. On 9th November, 1912, the landlord duly gave him notice to quit at Martinmas, 1913, in terms of the Agricultural Holdings Act of 1908. In June, 1913, the tenant wrote a letter to the landlord stating that he was willing that, instead of the notice of termination taking effect at Martinmas, 1913, it should do so at Martinmas, 1914, "when my tenancy will accordingly cease and determine without further notice." This offer was accepted on behalf of the landlord. On 31st December, 1913, the Land Court pronounced an order empowering the Board of Agriculture to constitute small holdings on the farm up to Martinmas, 1915. This order was intimated to the tenant on 9th February, 1914. A few days later the tenant inquired of the landlord's factors whether they proposed to give him notice under the Agricultural Holdings Acts terminating his tenancy under the letter of June, 1913. The factors declined to give such notice, as it was uncertain that the Board would take possession at Martinmas, 1914. Ultimately the Board decided to take over the farm at Martinmas, 1914. Held (1) that the order of the Land Court did not debar the landlord from re-letting the farm, so long as the Board of Agriculture had not exercised their powers under the order; (2) that the tenant's letter of June, 1913, did not render it unnecessary for the landlord to give notice to quit at Martinmas, 1914, in terms of sec. 18 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1908; (3) that, no notice to quit at that term having been given, the tenancy was continued by tacit relocation until Martinmas, 1915, with the statutory rights of compensation.

(2) COMPENSATION TO LANDLORD.

Act 1911, sec. 7 (11).

Compensation for depreciation in selling value of estate owing to presence of small holdings.

The Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911, sec. 7 (11), provides that when small holdings are compulsorily constituted on an estate, compensation shall be paid by the Board of Agriculture for Scotland to the landlord "in respect of any depreciation in the value of the estate of which the land forms part in consequence of and directly attributable to the constitution of the new holding or holdings as proposed." Held that, under this provision, the Land Court or an arbiter, as the case may be, is entitled to award compensation to a landlord for any reduction in the selling value of his estate directly due to the establishment thereon of small holdings, although the rental of the estate may not be diminished.

Depreciation in value of estate—Depreciation "directly attributable to" constitution of holdings—Increase in rates due to new school.

The constitution of new holdings upon an estate made it necessary to erect a new school for the children of the small landholders. Held that depreciation in the value of the landlord's estate due to the consequent increase in the school rate could not be said to be "directly attributable to" the constitution of the new holdings within the meaning of the Small Landholders Act, 1911, sec. 7 (11), and, accordingly, that the landlord was not entitled to compensation therefor. Opinion that, as the depreciation occasioned by a rise in rates was not peculiar to the estate in question but affected all rateable lands in the parish, it was not depreciation of such a class as to entitle the landlord to compensation under the Small Landholders Act.

Compensation for damage to letting value—Set-off—Capital payment for buildings taken.

Held that an arbiter, in determining the compensation due to a landlord in respect of the formation of a small holding on his farm, was entitled to set-off against a sum awarded in respect of the reduction in the letting value of the farm an amount representing the capitalised value of a 4 per cent. return on a sum allowed to the landlord for the buildings on the small holding taken over from him.

Macdonald v Board of Agriculture, (O.H.) 1915 S.C. 1127; 53 S.L.R. 4; 1915, 1 S.L.T. 429.

(3) COMPENSATION TO TENANTS.

Act 1911, sec. 7 (11).

Where whole farm taken—Annual profits—Deductions—Compensation for realisation of stock.

The Board of Agriculture acquired the right to take over compulsorily, for the formation of small holdings, the whole of a farm which was let to two tenants on a lease of which sixteen years had still to run, with breaks in four years and eleven years in favour of either party. Held (1) that, in estimating the compensation payable to the tenants, compensation in respect of loss of annual profits was payable only for the period which might reasonably be expected to elapse before the tenants could acquire another farm of similar class and quality, and not for the whole remaining years of the lease, subject to deduction for the contingency of the lease being terminated at one of the breaks; (2) that in estimating annual profits the arbiter was entitled to deduct from receipts a sum representing the value of the tenants' labour on the farm without making any corresponding award in their favour in respect of possible loss due to their being deprived of their situations on their farm; (3) that from annual profits he was entitled to deduct interest at the rate of 5 per cent. on the amount of the tenants' capital embarked in the farm; (4) that the tenants were not entitled to a sum for estimated loss on realisation of stock if the Board should finally determine to go on with the scheme.

Interdict by Board of Agriculture against tenant selling straw—Tenant afterwards found entitled to tenancy subsequent to date of interdict—Action of damages by tenant—Jurisdiction of Court of Session.

The Board of Agriculture acquired a farm for the purpose of forming small holdings, and dispossessed the tenant at Martinmas, 1914, interdicting him from disposing of the straw and chaff of the 1914 crop. The tenant, who was legally entitled to remain until Martinmas, 1915, was awarded compensation in an arbitration under the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911, sec. 7, and thereafter raised an action against the Board of Agriculture for declarator that the straw and chaff was his own property and for damages. Held that the Court had jurisdiction to entertain the action, and that the claim did not fall to be determined by the Land Court or by an arbiter.

Glendinning v Board of Agriculture for Scotland, 1921, 1 S.L.T. 174.

(4) PROCEDURE IN ARBITRATION.

(56)

Alternative award—Competency of award—Action to enforce one alternative—Competency of action—Agreement between parties prorogating jurisdiction of Court—Act 1911, sec. 7 (11).

The Board of Agriculture having taken over a farm for small holdings as at Martinmas, 1914, the tenant of the farm claimed compensation, and an arbitration took place. A question having arisen whether the tenancy terminated at Martinmas, 1914, or at Martinmas, 1915, the parties lodged a joint minute stating that, if the arbiter was so advised, he should issue alternative findings, and that in the event of either party seeking to enforce his award no objection should be taken by the other party either to the form of the award, or to an action for enforcement, or the conclusions of such an action. In his award the arbiter found that the claimant's tenancy terminated at Martinmas, 1914, and assessed the compensation accordingly, but "alternatively, and in the event of it being hereafter held that the compensation payable to the claimant falls to be assessed on the footing that his tenancy of the said farm continues after Martinmas, 1914," he awarded additional compensation. The tenant brought an action against the Board of Agriculture in the Court of Session for declarator that his tenancy continued till Martinmas, 1915, and for payment of the additional sum awarded by the arbiter in the second alternative of his award. Held (1) that the arbiter's award was not a final decision that the tenancy terminated at Martinmas, 1914, but was an alternative award leaving the question open for the determination of the Court; (2) that, in the special circumstances (without finally deciding the competency of such proceedings), the House ought to entertain the action, in respect that, owing to the agreement between the parties, there had been no challenge of the competency; that the alternative award and the proceedings following thereon were not clearly invalid; and that similar proceedings had been entertained in Scott Plummer v Board of Agriculture, No. 50, supra.

Review—Case stated for opinion of Lord Ordinary—Competency of reclaiming note—Act 1911, sec. 7 (11)—Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908, second schedule, par. 9.

A reclaiming note against an opinion of the Lord Ordinary, pronounced in a case stated by an arbiter acting in an arbitration for the assessment of compensation under sec. 7 (11) of the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911, is incompetent.

Special case—Expenses—Act 1911, sec. 7 (11)—Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908, second schedule.

Held that the expenses of a special case stated for the opinion of the Lord Ordinary under the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911, sec. 7 (11), and the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908, second schedule, are not "expenses of and incidental to the arbitration" within the meaning of paragraph 14 of that schedule; and accordingly that they fall to be dealt with by the Lord Ordinary and not by the arbiter, unless remitted to him for his decision.

3. ENLARGEMENT OF HOLDINGS.

Available land for enlargement of holdings—Land owned by a different proprietor—Act 1886, sec. 13 (1)—Act 1911, sec. 16 (2) and 26 (2).

Held that, under the Small Landholders Acts, land belonging to one proprietor may be taken compulsorily for the enlargement of a holding on the estate of another proprietor.

5. QUALIFICATIONS OF LANDHOLDER.

(1) RESIDENCE.

(62)

Residence on or within two miles of holding—Heir succeeding to holding—Whether obligation continuing—Act 1911, sec. 2 (1) (ii.) and (2).

The existing yearly tenant of a holding having died, his heir continued the cultivation of the holding, but at no time resided on, or within two miles from, the holding. He renounced the holding as at the first term of Whitsunday ensuing after his predecessor's death, and claimed compensation for improvements executed by his predecessor. Held that the heir was not disqualified from being a landholder, and from claiming compensation, by the fact that he did not reside on, or within two miles from, the holding, in respect that the qualification of residence was not a continuing condition of the status of a landholder, but applied only at the commencement of the Small Landholders Act of 1911.

Tenant from year to year—Application to Land Court by tenant who, before passing of Act, received notice to quit after Act came into operation—Competency—Act 1911, sec. 2 (1) (ii).

A yearly tenant in possession of a holding at 1st April, 1912, when the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911, came into operation, had, before the passing of that Act, received notice to remove at Whitsunday, 1912. In an application by him to the Land Court for an order fixing the rent and the period of renewal of his tenancy, held that the service of the notice of removal did not exclude the application as incompetent.

(2) AUXILIARY OCCUPATION.

(64)

"Innkeeper"—Tenant holding licence for sale of porter and ale—Act 1886, secs. 1 (8) and 33—Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908, sec. 35 (1)—Act 1911, secs. 10 (1) and 26 (7).

At the commencement of the Small Landholders Act, 1911, the yearly tenant of a dwelling-house and 10½ acres of arable land held a licence for the sale of porter and ale, which he sold to occasional customers, the amount of trade done by him in this way being very small. The house was not larger than a suitable dwelling-house for the holding; no part of it was fitted up as an inn or public-house; and no travellers were received as lodgers there. Held (1) that the tenant was not an "innkeeper" within the meaning of the Small Landholders Acts, and therefore was not excluded as such from the benefits of the Acts; (2) that the subjects were not prevented, by reason of the trade carried on therein, from being a "holding" within the meaning of the Acts. Opinion (per Lord President Strathclyde) that the words in sec. 33 of the Crofters Holdings Act, 1886, "placed in the district by the landlord for the benefit of the neighbourhood," apply to "innkeeper" as well as "tradesman."

Taylor v Fordyce, 1918 S.C. 824; 55 S.L.R. 746; 1918, 2 S.L.T. 186.

(3) PROVISION OF IMPROVEMENTS.

(65)

Improvements provided by "predecessor in the same family"—Improvements by father-in-law and brother-in-law of tenant—Assignment of predecessor's interest in the lease—Act 1911, sec. 2 (1) (iii.) (a).

Held (1) that improvements provided by a tenant's father-in-law and brother-in-law, who were his predecessors in the holding, were not improvements provided by predecessors "in the same family" within the meaning of sec. 2 (1) (iii.) (a) of the Small Landholders Act, 1911; and (2) that the tenant could not, by means of an assignment from these predecessors of their interest in the lease, acquire a right in the improvements for the purpose of bringing himself within the operation of sec. 2 (1) (iii.) (a), and accordingly that the tenant was not a "landholder." Question, whether the word "predecessor" occurring in sec. 2 (1) (iii.) (a) could be read as including more than one predecessor.

Improvements provided by a sub-tenant—Act 1911, sec. 2 (1) (iii.) (a)—Act 1886, sec. 6 (1).

Held that, in determining whether a tenant was a landholder or a statutory small tenant, and in fixing a fair rent, the Land Court were not entitled to take into consideration, as tenant's improvements, improvements which had been executed by a member of the same family while only sub-tenant, in respect that a sub-tenant was not a "predecessor" in the holding.

Improvements provided without fair consideration—Proof to satisfaction of Land Court—Act 1911, sec. 2 (1) (iii.) (a).

In an application to the Land Court by a tenant, who had renounced his lease, for compensation in respect of the improvements executed or paid for by himself or his predecessors, circumstances in which held that the Land Court were entitled to find that it was proved to their satisfaction that payment or fair consideration had not been received from the landlord for certain permanent improvements made by a predecessor in the same family, and that the applicant was a landholder within the meaning of the Small Landholders Act, 1911.

6. CONDITIONS RELATING TO THE "HOLDING."

(1) "PRESENT RENT."

Period at which present rent falls to be ascertained—Act 1911, secs. 13 (c) and 26 (3) (a).

Held that, for the purpose of determining whether a tenant is excluded from the operation of the Small Landholders Act in respect that his "present rent" exceeds £50, the rent which has to be considered is the rent payable for the last year of his tenancy, and not the rent payable at the date of the commencement of the Act.

Tenant's share of fire insurance premium—Act 1911, secs. 13 and 26 (3) (a).

A tenant whose yearly rent was £50 also made to his landlord an annual payment of 1s. 10d., being his proportion of a premium of insurance over certain buildings on his holding. Held that this payment of 1s. 10d. did not fall to be taken into account in computing the tenant's "present rent" within the meaning of sec. 26 (3) (a) of the Act.

Marquis of Breadalbane v Robertson, 1914 S.C. 215; 51 S.L.R. 156; 1914, 1 S.L.T. 19.

(2) CHARACTER OF "HOLDING."

(70)

Subjects separately rented but worked together as one holding—Act 1911, sec. 26 (1) and (2).

A crofter, who in 1886 was tenant of a holding with a variable right of grazing on other land, acquired from his landlord in 1896 the tenancy of a barn and stable. Separate rents were paid, and receipts granted, for the original holding, the grazing right, and the barn and stable, but they were all worked together as one holding. Held that, in the circumstances, the grazing right and the barn and stable were separate tenancies and did not form part of the holding.

Separate subjects acquired under different tenancies—Act 1911, sec. 26 (1) and (2).

An application having been presented to the Land Court in respect of subjects consisting of a dwelling-house, offices, stable, and garden ground, with certain grazing rights in an adjacent pasture, and also a field of 3 acres situated less than 2 miles distant and held by the same tenants on a separate tenancy, held that the separate subjects had, in the circumstances, been worked as one holding, and accordingly formed a "holding" within the meaning of the Small Landholders Acts.

Subjects excluded—Heritages occupied by a sub-tenant—Act 1911, sec. 26 (6).

Opinions that a dwelling-house, erected on a small holding and let for twelve months to a sub-tenant who agreed to vacate it for summer letting by the landholder during two months in the year, was not excluded from the holding as being "occupied by a sub-tenant" within the meaning of sec. 26 (6) of the Small Landholders Act, 1911, in respect that the period of the tenancy was less than a year.

Land within "municipal boundary"—Burgh—Burgh boundaries—Act 1911, sec. 26 (3) (c).

Subjects outside the parliamentary and police boundaries of a royal burgh but within the boundaries of the royalty of the burgh held to be within the "municipal boundary" of the burgh in the sense of sec. 26 (3) (c) of the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911, and accordingly to be excluded by that section from the operation of the Act.

Subjects used as market garden—Act 1911, sec. 26 (3) (d) and (f)—Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908, sec. 35 (1).

A piece of ground measuring 10 acres or thereby was let to a tenant, who used it for the purpose of growing raspberries, which he sold mainly to jam makers, but occasionally to fruit dealers. The whole of the ground was planted with raspberry bushes permanently set out. In the lease of the ground it was stipulated that it was not let, and was not to be treated, as a market garden. Held that the subjects constituted a market garden, and were, therefore, excluded from the operations of the Landholders Acts by virtue of sec. 26 (3) of the Small Landholders Act, 1911, and sec. 35 (1) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1908. Opinions that the subjects, if they were not a market garden, would nevertheless be excluded from the operation of the Landholders Acts by sec. 26 (3) (f) of the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911, in respect that they would not fall within the definition of a "holding" in sec. 35 (1) of the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908.

Buildings not required for agricultural or pastoral purposes — Excision of buildings, leaving remainder a statutory "holding"—

Act 1911, sec. 26 (3) (f)—Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908, sec. 35 (1).

Held that where, at the date of the Small Landholders Act, 1911, coming into operation, there existed on land, held on such a tenancy that it would otherwise constitute a "holding," a dwelling-house or other building forming an integral and material part of the subjects of tenancy but not erected or required for agricultural or pastoral purposes, such dwelling-house or other building with the pertinents and site thereof might be excised from the land held on such tenancy, leaving the remainder a statutory "holding" under the Act.

Subjects consisting of a cottage with one rood of potato land and a share in common grazing—Act 1911, sec. 26 (3) (f)—Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908, sec. 35 (1).

Held that subjects consisting of a small thatched cottage in a village in Argyllshire, with a plot of garden ground and a byre, and one rood of potato land situated at a short distance from the cottage, and a one-fifteenth share in a common grazing extending to 58 acres for the grazing of one cow, all let to one tenant at a cumulo rent of £4 4s. 6d., were a "holding" within the meaning of the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911.

"Lotted" lands.

Commodious dwelling-house, with 3 acres of arable ground—Act 1911, sec. 26 (3) (f)—Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908, sec. 35 (1).

Held that subjects consisting of a commodious dwelling-house in Arran, having a byre and other offices, with 3 acres of arable land including garden ground, all let to one tenant at a rent of £30, of which the valuation roll disclosed £5 to be the value of the land and £25 to be the value of the buildings, were a "holding" within the meaning of the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911.

Subjects consisting of smithy and land—Subjects not wholly agricultural or pastoral—"Tradesman placed in the district by the landlord for the benefit of the neighbourhood"—Act 1911, secs. 26 (3) (f), (7), (10), and 32—Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908, sec. 35 (1)—Act 1886, sec. 33.

The yearly tenant of subjects consisting of a blacksmith's shop, a dwelling-house, and 5½ acres of land, applied to the Land Court under the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911, to fix the first equitable rent payable by him as statutory small tenant of the subjects. The house and shop were built and maintained by the landlord, and the shop had always been occupied as a smithy by the applicant and the previous tenants; but the applicant was under no obligation either to use the shop as a smithy or to do blacksmith work for the tenants of the landlord's estate, nor were these tenants bound to employ him. The value of the smithy to the applicant was less than that of the house and lands. Held that the subjects did not form a holding to which the provisions of the Small Landholders Acts applied, in respect (1) that they were not "wholly agricultural or wholly pastoral, or in part agricultural and as to the residue pastoral," and accordingly did not constitute a "holding" as defined in sec. 35 of the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908; and, further, (2) that they were let to "a tradesman placed in the district by the landlord for the benefit of the neighbourhood" within the meaning of sec. 33 of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886.

Subjects consisting of weaving mill and croft—Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911, sec. 26 (3) (f)—Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908, sec. 35 (1).

Held that subjects consisting of a carding, spinning, and weaving mill, and a house and steading with 9 acres of agricultural land and 3 roods of pasture, let to one tenant at a cumulo rent of £19 5s. (of which £10 5s. effeired to the mill and £9 to the rest of the subjects) did not constitute a holding as defined in the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908, and therefore were not a holding within the meaning of the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911.

Permanent grass park held for business not "primarily agricultural or pastoral"—Pasture tenanted by dairykeeper—Act 1911, sec. 26 (3) (g).

A dairykeeper was the yearly tenant of two fields of permanent pasture which he used for grazing and feeding five cows, whose milk he sold in his dairy business along with the milk, which he purchased, of ten other cows belonging to neighbouring farmers. Held that the subjects were held by him for the purposes of a business or calling which was "primarily pastoral," and accordingly did not fall within the provisions of sec. 26 (3) (g) of the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911, so as to exclude him from the benefit of the Act.

7. RIGHTS OF LANDHOLDERS.

(1) EXCLUSIVE POSSESSION.

Grazing rights of third party—Act 1911, secs. 10, 12, 24 (1) and (2).

Certain yearly tenants of holdings, which comprised buildings, arable land, and a right of common grazing, applied to the Land Court for orders declaring them to be landowners within the meaning of the Small Landowners (Scotland) Act, 1911, and fixing fair rents for their holdings. The winter grazing, both of the arable lands and of the common pasturage, was let by the landlord to the tenant of a neighbouring farm, and this fact was set forth in the applications in question. The Land Court having pronounced orders declaring the applicants to be landholders and fixing fair rents, they thereafter sought to interdict the farm tenant from grazing his stock upon the subjects, on the ground that, in virtue of these orders, they were entitled to the exclusive possession of their holdings. Held that the orders had no such effect, but applied only to the holdings as possessed at the time when the applications were made; and interdict refused.

(2) EQUITABLE RENT.

(83)

Considerations in fixing fair rent—Improvements executed by tenant in implement of obligations in lease—Act 1886, sec. 6 (1).

Held that, in fixing a fair rent for a small holding under sec. 6 (1) of the Crofters Holdings Act, 1886, the Land Court were not bound to exclude from consideration as tenant's improvements such improvements as were executed by the tenant or his predecessors in the same family in implement of a specific agreement in writing to execute them. Observed that it will be for the Land Court to consider in every case whether the tenant or his predecessor has received fair value for the improvements.

Houses yielding revenue from letting to summer visitors—"Circumstances of the case, holding, and district"—Act 1886, sec. 6 (1).

Held that revenue derived by a small landholder from letting houses situated upon his holding to summer visitors should be taken into account by the Land Court in fixing a fair rent for the holding, in respect that, in terms of the Small Landholders Acts, "all the circumstances of the case, holding, and district" had to be considered.

Risk of damage to crops by game—Act 1886, sec. 6 (1).

Held that, in fixing a fair rent for a holding, the Land Court is entitled to take into account the fact that the crops on the holding, by reason of its situation, are exposed to the risk of damage by game.

M'Kelvie v Duke of Hamilton's Trustees, 1918 S.C. 301; 55 S.L.R. 374; 1918, 1 S.L.T. 295.

(3) COMPENSATION FOR IMPROVEMENTS.

(86)

Landholder renouncing his tenancy—Discharge of claim for compensation—Discharge granted prior to creation of statutory right—Act 1886, sec. 8.

In an application to the Land Court by a tenant, who had renounced his lease, for compensation in respect of the improvements executed or paid for by himself or his predecessors, circumstances in which held that a certain discharge by the applicant's father, granted prior to the creation of the statutory right to compensation, of all claims for improvements did not preclude the Land Court from considering, and awarding compensation for, the improvements executed by him.

Death of landholder—Heir not residing on or within two miles of holding.

8. STATUTORY SMALL TENANTS.

(1) QUALIFICATIONS.

(88)

"Lotted" lands.

Held that the provisions of the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911, applied to "lotted lands," not equipped with buildings, which had been voluntarily laid out by the proprietor of an estate for occupation as agricultural subjects by householders in an adjoining village, and that a yearly tenant of three of these lots was a statutory small tenant within the meaning of the Act.

Joint tenants—Act 1911, secs. 2 (1) (iii.) (b) and 26 (8).

Held that the provisions of sec. 32 of the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911, as to statutory small tenants, applied to the case of a holding which at the commencement of the Act was held by joint tenants, and which continued to be held by the same tenants at the date of their application to the Land Court.

Carmichael v Maccoll, 1913 S.C. 916; 50 S.L.R. 693; 1913, 1 S.L.T. 480.

(2) EQUITABLE RENT.

(90)

Considerations in fixing rent—Tenant's previous loss in working—Act 1911, sec. 32.

Observed that, in fixing an equitable rent, the Land Court is not entitled to reduce the rent below what would otherwise be an equitable rent, for the purpose of recouping the tenant for loss incurred in working the holding or for the over-renting of the holding during the previous period of his tenancy.

Houses yielding revenue from letting to summer visitors—"Circumstances of the case, holding, and district"—Act 1911, sec. 32 (8).

Observed that revenue derived by a statutory small tenant from letting houses situated on his holding to summer visitors should be taken into account by the Land Court in fixing an equitable rent for the holding, in respect that, in terms of sec. 32 (8) of the Small Landholders Act, 1911, "all the circumstances of the case, holding, and district" had to be considered.

Improvements—Improvement executed by tenant in implement of specific agreement—Act 1911, sec. 32 (8).

Held that the Land Court, in fixing an equitable rent, was entitled to take into consideration improvements executed by the tenant, notwithstanding that they were improvements which he was bound by a specific agreement in writing to execute.

(3) RIGHT TO RENEWAL OF LEASE.

(93)

Determination of tenancy—Application to Land Court to renew lease and fix rent—Objection that tenancy not determined owing to tacit relocation—Act 1911, sec. 32 (4).

In August, 1912, a tenant in occupation of a holding, whose lease had expired at Whitsunday without notice of removal either on his part or on that of the landlord, applied to the Land Court as a statutory small tenant under the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911 (which came into operation in April, 1912), for an order renewing his lease and fixing an equitable rent. The Land Court fixed the period of renewal as from Whitsunday, 1912. In an appeal by special case the landlord contended that the Land Court could only renew the lease as from Whitsunday, 1913, in respect that under sec. 32 (4) of the Act, renewal could only be granted "on any determination of the tenancy," and that in the present case the tenancy did not terminate until Whitsunday, 1913, having been continued to that date by tacit relocation. Held that the determination of the Land Court was right, in respect that the Act itself, at the date when it came into operation, gave the tenant a right to a renewal of his tenancy at the expiry of his lease at Whitsunday, 1912.

Date of renewal—Date of commencement—Tenant sitting from year to year by tacit relocation—Act 1911, sec. 32 (4).

A tenant, who after the expiry of his lease in 1908 continued his tenancy by tacit relocation yearly from Martinmas to Martinmas, applied to the Land Court in December, 1913, for an order declaring him to be a statutory small tenant, renewing his tenancy, and fixing an equitable rent. Held that, as by sec. 32 (4) of the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911, it is only "on any determination of the tenancy" that a small tenant is entitled to a renewal of his tenancy, the earliest date from which the renewal could run was Martinmas, 1914, when the current year of tenancy was completed.

Appeal against refusal by Land Court of application for renewal—Action of summary ejection brought pending appeal—Competency.

A statutory small tenant, whose tenancy was about to expire, presented an application to the Land Court for a renewal of his tenancy at a reduced rent. An order refusing the application having been pronounced by a single member of the court, the landlord, during the days in which an appeal to the full court was competent but before such appeal had been actually taken, brought an action for summary ejection of the tenant, without having given him previous warning to remove. Held that the defender was not possessing without a title, and accordingly that the action was incompetent and fell to be dismissed.

Duty of Land Court in applications for resumption of holding—Assessment of tenant's claim to compensation—Act 1911, sec. 32 (15).

Held (1) that, where the Land Court is satisfied that the resumption of a holding is desired for a purpose specified in secs. 19 or 32 (15) of the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911, it is the imperative duty of that court, under the latter section, to authorise resumption at the earliest date reasonably possible, and it is not within the power of the court to postpone resumption beyond that date; (2) that under sec. 32 (15) the Land Court is not entitled to make actual payment of compensation to the tenant a condition precedent to resumption of the holding; and (3) that, as compensation falls to be assessed by arbitration and not by the Land Court, an order pronounced by the court requiring the tenant to lodge a statement of his claim for compensation was incompetent.

Appeal—Death of landlord—Right of his representatives to insist in appeal—Act 1911, sec. 32 (15).

The landlord of a small holding, who had obtained from the Land Court an interlocutor authorising him to resume the holding for the purpose of residing there, but only under certain conditions, died after initiating an appeal against the terms of that interlocutor. Held that his children, to whom he had bequeathed the holding, were entitled to insist in the appeal.

SPECIFICATIO.

Property in indivisible corporeal subject which is a joint production.

It is a general principle of equity that when the materials, skill, and labour of two or more persons are voluntarily and inseparably combined in the production of an indivisible corporeal subject, the same belongs to the contributors jointly, the interest of each being in proportion to the value of his contribution; and this principle will receive effect where there is no rule of positive law to the contrary.

A contracted to build for B a hearse for a specified sum, on condition that B should contribute certain portions of the materials and workmanship. B contributed his share, and the materials furnished by him were affixed to the hearse so that they could not be detached without injury to the general fabric. A became bankrupt before finishing the hearse, which was in his possession. Held, in a question between B and the trustee in A's sequestration, that the parties were joint proprietors of the subject in proportion to the value of their respective contributions.

Bona fide purchase of goods belonging to third party—Conversion into new species.

A purchased bona fide from B oil which

B had no right to sell, as it belonged to C. A paid for the oil and obtained delivery. With the oil and other materials A manufactured lard which was sold in the ordinary course of business to customers. In an action by C against A for delivery of the oil or payment of its value, held that the defender, by creating in the process of manufacture a new species, which could not be again resolved into its original element, became (under the doctrine of specificatio) proprietor of the substance manufactured, and was bound to pay to the pursuer a sum representing the value of the oil.

Where stolen goods are acquired by a bona fide purchaser and submitted to a manufacturing process so that restitution in forma specifica is no longer possible, the liability of the purchaser is to account to the owner of the goods for their value. Where a quantity of stolen type came into the possession of a typefoundry company by bona fide purchase and was converted by them into new type, held that the company were bound to pay to the owners the value of the type.

I. CONSTRUCTION.

1. EFFECT OF PREAMBLE, HEADINGS, &c.

(1)

Preamble—Sunday and Ragged Schools (Exemption from Rating) Act, 1869.

In the preamble to the Sunday and Ragged Schools (Exemption from Rating) Act, 1869, it is stated that "it is expedient" that such schools should be exempted from liability for poor and other rates. By sec. 1 of the same Act a power is conferred upon local authorities to exempt such schools from liability for rates. Held that the words of the preamble could not be read as constituting an absolute right in all such schools to exemption from assessment, and that, in the absence of any exercise of the power conferred by sec. 1 of the Act, such schools were liable to assessment.

Reference to preamble and other sections of Act—United Parishes Act, 1876, sec. 4.

Held that, in construing sec. 4 of the United Parishes Act, 1876, regard must be paid to the preamble and to other sections of the Act.

Minister of Brydekirk v Minister and Heritors of Hoddam, 1877, 4 R. 798; 14 S.L.R. 509.

Title.

Observations as to the extent to which the title of an Act of Parliament may be called in aid in construing its provisions.

Millar & Lang v Macniven & Cameron, (O.H.) 1908, 16 S.L.T. 56.

Headings—Factors Act, 1889, secs. 3 and 9—Factors (Scotland) Act, 1890, sec. 1.

The Factors Act, 1889 (extended to Scotland by the Factors (Scotland) Act, 1890), in the series of sections embraced under the heading "dispositions by mercantile agents," enacts by sec. 3, that "a pledge of the documents of title to goods shall be deemed to be a pledge of the goods." Held that sec. 3 did not apply to the case of an owner of goods pledging the documents of title, but only to pledges effected by mercantile agents.

Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, sec. 104.

Opinions (per Lord Justice-Clerk Macdonald and Lord Kyllachy) that a heading in a statute, as distinguished from a marginal rubric, was part of the statute, and was to be taken into account in construing the section.

M'Ewan v Magistrates of Perth, 1905, 7 F. 714; 42 S.L.R. 456; 12 S.L.T. 846.

(7)

Rubric.

The rubric is no part of a statute.

Farquharson v Whyte, 1886, 13 R. (J.) 29; 1 White, 26; 23 S.L.R. 360.

(8)

Schedule — Variation between enacting clauses and schedule—Clyde Navigation Consolidation Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. cxlix.), sec. 98 and schedule (H).

The terms of a schedule cannot extend the enactment in a body of the statute.

Variation between enacting clauses and schedule—Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864.

Where language used in a schedule varies from that of the enacting clause to which it relates, the language of the enacting clause prevails.

Jacobs v Hart, 1900, 2 F. (J.) 33; 3 Adam, 131; 37 S.L.R. 648; 7 S.L.T. 425.

2. PRINCIPLES OF CONSTRUCTION.

(1) PENAL, TAXING AND REMEDIAL STATUTES.

(10)

Penal enactment—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 430.

Held, on a construction of sec. 430 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, read as a whole, that a contravention may be committed either by a person who has exposed for sale articles that are incorrectly weighed, measured, or numbered, or by a person who has incorrectly weighed, measured, or numbered articles with a view to sale—dissenting Lord Stormonth-Darling, on the ground that as the concluding clause of the section, empowering the magistrates to impose a penalty, grammatically required that the person to be sentenced should have both exposed for sale and incorrectly weighed, measured, or numbered, it was not permissible in construing a penal enactment to extend the concluding clause by reference to the earlier part of the section.

Penalty—Construction in meliori sensu.

A statute enacted for contravention of certain of its provisions "a penalty not exceeding £10, and an additional penalty of 10s. for each salmon taken," &c. Held that the words "not exceeding" qualified the additional penalty of 10s. as well as the penalty of £10.

Johnston v Robson, 1868, 6 M. 800; 40 J. 512; 1 Coup. 41; 5 S.L.R. 537.

Remedial statute—Ambiguous words—Intestate Moveable Succession Act, 1855, sec. 1.

The Intestate Moveable Succession Act, 1855, sec. 1, provides that "in all cases of intestate moveable succession in Scotland accruing after the passing of this Act, where any person who, had he survived the intestate, would have been among his next of kin, shall have predeceased such intestate, the lawful child or children of such person so predeceasing shall come in the place of such person." Observed (per Lord President Inglis)—"But if the words are not clear in themselves, we are quite entitled to resort to a canon of construction applicable to this case, because this is a remedial statute, and a remedial statute is always to be construed with reference to the mischief intended to be remedied."

—Favourable construction—Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, sec. 60.

Observed (per Lord President Inglis)—"A remedial statute is not to be strictly construed . . . A remedial statute ought to receive a benign and favourable construction, and is often applied ad comiles casus."

Robb v Logiealmond School Board, 1875, 2 R. 417; 12 S.L.R. 286.

Taxing statutes—Liberal or strict interpretation—Exemption.

Observed (per Lord Ardmillan)—"We have been told that a taxing statute must be construed liberally and favourably to the subjects. In one sense that is true, and the remark is well founded; but, on the other hand, equality and impartial justice in the incidence of taxation is of greater moment, and the statute should be construed so as to promote that equality and that impartiality of justice. There is no presumption in favour of the exemption of the few from the incidence of the general tax. I think the presumption is for equality, and rather against the partiality which is involved in special exemptions. Therefore, in deciding any case I would consider the question on the statutes according to their true meaning."

Edinburgh Life Assurance Co. v Solicitor of Inland Revenue—Scottish Widows' Fund v Solicitor of Inland Revenue, 1875, 2 R. 394; 12 S.L.R. 275.

—Words occurring in statute applicable to whole kingdom—Non-technical construction—Succession Duty Act, 1853, sec. 2.

Observed (per Lord President Inglis)—"This Act of Parliament has been framed designedly and carefully, so that everything contained in it shall be expressed in what may be called popular, or at least untechnical language, and it was very desirable and right that that should be so, because it is an Act of Parliament applying to all the three parts of the United Kingdom, and if the technical words of one system of jurisprudence had been used in any of the clauses of this Act of Parliament, there might have been great difficulty in applying them to another part of the United Kingdom, where a different system of jurisprudence prevails. It has always appeared to me that this is an example of very excellent legislation in that respect, and that the statute is very carefully and well prepared, and I quite assent to the proposition that we are not to construe this statute as if it contained any technical words whatever, but are to ascertain by the ordinary rules of construction what is the fair meaning and intention of the legislature."

—Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, sec. 44.

Observed (per Lord Young)—"I think it proper to say that, in dubio, I should deem it the duty of the Court to reject any construction of a modern statute which implied the extension of a class privilege of exemption from taxation, provided the language reasonably admitted of another interpretation."

Hogg v Parochial Board of Auchtermuchty, 1880, 7 R. 986; 17 S.L.R. 687.
Cf. Renfrewshire County Council v Trustees of Orphan Homes of Scotland, 1898, 1 F. 186; 36 S.L.R. 143; 6 S.L.T. 229, No. 1, supra.

(2) LOCAL AND PERSONAL ACTS.

(17)

Acts declared public—Operation.

Local Acts declared to be public (as to which see Interpretation Act, 1889, sec. 9) must be judicially noticed and must have all the operation of public Acts.

Aiton v Stephen, 1876, 3 R. (H.L.) 4; 1 App.Cas. 456; 13 S.L.R. 734.

Inconsistency between public and private Acts—Jurisdiction of High Court or Court of Exchequer—Parliamentary Deposits and Bonds Act, 1892.

The Parliamentary Deposits and Bonds Act, 1892, enacts that where any moneys have been deposited to secure the completion of any undertaking authorised by Parliament, and the undertaking has not been completed within the time limited in that behalf the "High Court may" make orders as to the application of the deposited moneys; and "High Court" is defined as meaning, in Scotland, the Court of Session in either Division. A private Act (obtained in 1904) provided that the moneys deposited in respect of the undertaking thereby authorised should be applied in payment of compensation to persons whose property had been interfered with as to the Court of Exchequer in Scotland might seem fit, or under other circumstances "applied in the discretion of the Court" or repaid to the depositors. Held that as the private Act was later in date than the Parliamentary Deposits and Bonds Act, 1892, and in respect that the provisions of that Act were merely permissive, an application by the depositor for power to uplift the deposited moneys was competently presented to the Lord Ordinary in Exchequer Causes.

Effect of clause in local Act upon general provisions in public Acts—General Turnpike Act, 1831, sec. 91—Aberdeen Corporation Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. cxxiv.), sec. 8.

A clause in a local Act which is entirely general in its nature and which repeals all laws, &c., which are inconsistent with its provisions must be carefully scrutinised before it can be held to apply in any particular case.

Effects of public Act on rights created by previous private Act—North British Railway Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. clxiii.), sec. 47—Railway Companies (Accounts and Returns) Act, 1911, sec. 4 (1).

The North British Railway Co., in exercise of powers conferred by a private Act of 1888, created certain preferred and deferred ordinary stocks, the terms of the Act providing that a non-cumulative dividend of 3 per cent. should be payable out of the available profits of each half-year to the preferred stockholders, and that the balance of such profits should go to the deferred stockholders. By the Railway Companies (Accounts and Returns) Act, 1911, every railway company was relieved of any obligation to prepare or submit to their shareholders or auditors accounts or balance sheets oftener than once a year. Held that the later Act did not relieve the railway company of the duty of calculating the dividends due to the preferred and deferred stockholders on the basis of the profits of each half-year.

Transference of statutory obligations—Roads and Bridges Act, 1878, sec. 32—Great Western Road Act, 1836 (6 & 7 Will. IV., c. cxxxviii.), secs. 14 and 23.

Held that sec. 32 of the Roads and Bridges Act, 1878, in providing that county road trustees to whom a road is thereby transferred shall be liable in all the debts, liabilities, claims and demands in which the trustees of such road "are or were liable under any general or local Act then in force," does not continue and transfer to the county road trustees the statutory powers and duties conferred and imposed by such prior Acts upon the trustees from whom the road is transferred, as distinct from the powers and duties imposed upon them by the above Act as trustees for the general roads of the country.

Persons prejudiced—Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (28 & 29 Vict. c. cclxxiii.), sec. 366.

Observed (per Lord President Kinross)—"It appears to me that the Act of 1866 should be construed in accordance with the rules applicable to private Acts, in the case of which the benefit of any doubt is given to persons who might be prejudiced by the imposition of exceptional restrictions."

Exclusion of public—Ferry and piers at Queensferry—Bye-laws—II. Geo. IV. and I. Will. IV. c. 115, sec. 20—Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway (Queensferry) Act, 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. cxxxvii.), secs. 31, 33, and 34.

By the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway (Queensferry) Act, 1863, the North British Railway Co. were empowered to acquire from trustees, in whom they were then vested, the ferry and piers at Queensferry. By sec. 33 of the Act the railway company were given power to make bye-laws and regulations for the use and control of the ferry, and by sec. 34 it was made illegal for the public to use the piers save in the manner prescribed by the bye-laws or with the written authority of the company. Held that the effect of the statute and of the previous statute II. Geo.

IV. and I. Will. IV. c. 115, which vested the ferry in trustees, was to operate an exclusion of the public from all the piers connected with the ferry save as permitted by the bye-laws, or by the written authority of the company, thus abrogating the common law of navigation.

Construction contra proferentem — Kirkcaldy and Dysart Waterworks Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. cxxxix.).

Observations on the construction of local and personal Acts.

Countess of Rothes v Kirkcaldy Waterworks Commissioners, 1882, 9 R. (H.L.) 108; 7 App.Cas. 694; 19 S.L.R. 907.

Grant of powers.

Observed (per Lord Herschell) that when a private Act is obtained by a company incorporated for purposes of profit, to confer upon them rights and powers which they would not have at common law, the provisions of such a statute must be somewhat jealously scrutinised, and that they ought not to be held to possess any right unless it be given in plain terms, or arises as a necessary inference from the language used.

Scottish Drainage and Improvement Co. v Campbell, 1889, 16 R. (H.L.) 16; 14 App.Cas. 139; 26 S.L.R. 790.

Impossibility of performing duty under private Act—Contract—Reparation.

In an action by shipowners against harbour trustees for damages in respect of the detention of a ship in harbour owing to a strike of harbour employees, question whether persons on whom a duty is laid by a private Act of Parliament can plead impossibility of performance of that duty as relieving them of liability for non-performance.

Reparation for injury occasioned in execution of statutory works—Glasgow City and District Railway Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. ccxvi.).

A railway company, with powers of opening up the streets of a town for the construction of an underground railway, were bound by their Act of Parliament to restore streets so opened up by them within three months, under a penalty of £20 for every day exceeding that period during which the streets were not restored. Held that the statute, in imposing this penalty, did not by implication deprive persons injured by the closing of a street beyond the legal period of the common law right to damages.

Reservation of rights — North British Railway (Waverley Station, &c.) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. cxcii.), sec. 35, sub-sec. (22).

A railway company by private Act was authorised to take certain land in Edinburgh. Sec. 35 of the Act provided that "nothing contained in this Act shall prejudice or affect the rights of servitude or other rights of the corporation, or of the vassals of the corporation, in virtue of their title deeds." Held that this provision could not be construed as restricting the powers expressly given to the railway company by the Act.

MacGregor v North British Railway Co., 1893, 20 R. 300; 30 S.L.R. 404.

Private Acts declared to be granted salvo jure cujuslibet—Onus of proof—Adjudication—Office held jure sanguinis not adjudgeable—Act 1681, c. 192.

In April, 1902, an action was brought by the Earl of Lauderdale for declarator that he had right to the hereditary office of Royal Standard Bearer for Scotland. The pursuer averred that by the Act 1600, c. 44, the right to the office was confirmed to Sir James Scrymgeour and his heirs-male; that in 1661 the heir-male and successor was John Scrymgeour, Earl of Dundee, and that on his death in 1668 the office became extinct; that in July, 1670, a charter under the Great Seal of the office was granted to an ancestor of the pursuer on the narrative that the office had fallen to the Crown as ultimus hæres; that parliamentary sanction to the grant was given by, inter alia, the Act 1681, c. 72; that the office was possessed on a personal title by his successors till 21st February, 1761, when the heir made up a title by getting an adjudication (upon his own bond) assigned to him, in virtue of which he obtained a charter of adjudication, and was infeft. The defender, Henry Scrymgeour Wedderburn, who claimed to be the heir-male of Sir James Scrymgeour, founded on the Act 1681, c. 192, by which private Acts were declared to be granted salvo jure cujuslibet, and contended that therefore it was necessary for the pursuer to prove that there was no heir-male of the Scrymgeours existing; and that, as he had failed to do so, the action fell to be dismissed. In an appeal, the House of Lords, in respect that the office was held jure sanguinis and was not adjudgeable, and that the pursuer had failed to prove that there was no existing heir-male of the Scrymgeours, sustained the defence.

3. PRESUMPTIONS.

(1) AGAINST THE ABOLITION OF EXISTING JURISDICTIONS.

(30)

General rule.

Observed (per Lord Salvesen)—"A general rule applicable to the construction of statutes is that there is not to be presumed, without express words, an authority to deprive the Supreme Court of a jurisdiction which it had previously exercised, or to extend what was once the privative jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to the inferior courts."

Sheriff—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, secs. 447, 454, 508, and 509.

The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, does not deprive the sheriff of a county of jurisdiction to try persons for offences committed within a burgh in the county.

Cameron v Macniven, 1894, 21 R. (J.) 31; 1 Adam, 346; 31 S.L.R. 338; 1 S.L.T. 467.

Justice of peace—Transference of powers to magistrates—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 38.

Held that the right of granting, refusing, renewing, and transferring certificates, under the Public-houses Acts, for premises within police burghs has not been transferred under the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 38, from the county justices to the magistrates of such burghs.

(2) AGAINST THE ALTERATION OF RULES OF PRACTICE.

(33)

Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864.

Observed (per Lord Ardmillan)—"When we have a uniform and long continued rule of practice, we must be very careful not to construe a new Act in such a manner as to introduce an alteration not plainly intended by the legislature."

Kinnear v Whyte, 1868, 6 M. 804; 1 Coup. 56; 40 J. 435; 5 S.L.R. 538.

No specified remedy—Forms of process.

Observed (per Lord Justice-Clerk Moncreiff) "that where a well-known and recognised jurisdiction is invoked by the legislature for the purpose of carrying out a series of provisions which are important to the public without any specific form of process being prescribed, the presumption is that the ordinary forms of that court are to be followed in carrying out the provisions. . . ."

Magistrates of Portobello v Magistrates of Edinburgh, 1882, 10 R. 130; 20 S.L.R. 92.

4. REFERENCE TO INTENTION IN CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTES.

(35)

Reference to general intention of statute to explain meaning of particular section—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 38.

In an action against the magistrates of a police burgh who claimed, under sec. 38 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, to be the licensing authority for the sale of exciseable liquors within the burgh, held that sec. 38 not being a self-contained section, it was necessary to construe it by reference to the general intention of the legislature as indicated in the other sections and preamble to the Act, and, accordingly, that the powers claimed by the magistrates had not been transferred to them.

Reference to general intention of section—Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907.

Observed (per Lord President Dunedin)—"It is not very difficult to get at the general idea which was underlying the draftsman-ship, and I think in these cases it is our duty, however inaccurate in terms we may find the Act, to give effect to what we consider the spirit, so long, of course, as the words do not absolutely preclude us from so doing."

Restrictive construction—Court of Session Consignation (Scotland) Act, 1895, secs. 2, 3 and 5—Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868, sec. 122.

Held that the Court of Session Consignation Act, 1895, which, notwithstanding the generality of certain of its provisions, should be read prima facie as an Act dealing with consignations in judicial proceedings, did not apply to surplus moneys deposited by a bondholder under sec. 122 of the Titles to Land Act, 1868, and was not intended to alter or repeal the provisions of that section.

Literal meaning opposed to intention of statute — North British Railway (Dundee and Arbroath Joint Line) Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. clv.), sec. 6.

Observed (per Lord Chancellor Selborne) that the more literal construction of a section of a statute ought not to prevail if it is opposed to the intention of the legislature as apparent by the statute, and if the words are sufficiently flexible to admit of some other construction by which that intention will be better effectuated.

Caledonian Railway Co. v North British Railway Co., 1881, 8 R. (H.L.) 23; 6 App.Cas. 114; 18 S.L.R. 341.

Whether prohibition in one section controls proceedings under another section or another Act.

Held that sec. 87 of the Companies Act, 1862, which enacted that "no suit, action or other proceeding" shall be proceeded with or commenced against a company in liquidation except with the leave of the Court did not limit the effect of sec. 163 of the same Act or of sec. 3 of the Companies Act, 1886, so as to authorise the Court to sanction diligence declared to be void by secs. 163 and 3 of these Acts respectively.

Whether generality of one enactment limited by other enactments in the same statute.

Held that sec. 111 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, was a general prohibition against all persons not holding a licence from the Board of Trade, or otherwise qualified, from engaging seamen for any ship (British or foreign) in the United Kingdom, and that secs. 260 and 261 did not affect its generality.

Whether generality of enactment limited by terms of earlier Act.

Opinion (per Lord Kyllachy, Ordinary) that there is nothing in the Sea Fisheries Act, 1883, or relative international convention, to limit the generality of sec. 9 of the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1899, which prohibits the landing in Scotland of fish caught in contravention of the Act, and that sec. 9 applies to foreigners as well as British subjects.

Poll v Lord Advocate, 1899, 1 F. 823; 35 S.L.R. 637; 5 S.L.T. 167.

Effect of subsequent section of ambiguous meaning on rights expressly conferred by earlier sections.

Observations upon construing statutes with regard to the difficulty of inferring from a later section of ambiguous meaning the repeal of definite rights expressly conferred by earlier sections.

Moss' Empires v Assessor for Glasgow, 1917 S.C. (H.L.) 1; 54 S.L.R. 12; 1916, 2 S.L.T. 215.

Implied exceptions and qualifications.

The General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862, sec. 363, provides that where the police commissioners of a burgh have provided and established shambles or slaughter-houses within the burgh, "no person shall thereafter slaughter any cattle or beasts . . . within the boundaries of the burgh in which such slaughter-houses are provided, or within a distance of two miles beyond such boundaries, elsewhere than within the said slaughter-houses." A butcher who carried on business in the burgh of Kirkcaldy, where a slaughter-house had been provided in terms of the above enactment, slaughtered certain animals in the legalised slaughter-house of the burgh of Dysart, which was within two miles of Kirkcaldy, and was convicted of a contravention of the Act. In an appeal the accused contended that there was an implied exception of the legalised slaughter-houses of an adjoining burgh. Held that no such exception was implied, but that the words "no person" fell to be construed as "no person carrying on the business of a butcher within the burgh," and that in that view the butcher had contravened the enactment, and was liable in the penalties provided.

General terms limited by purpose of Act—Glasgow Court Houses Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. lvi.), sec. 13.

Terms of a local statute empowering the Glasgow Court Houses Commissioners to apportion, assess, and charge sums of money borrowed by them under the Act upon three public bodies, the Corporation of Glasgow, the County Council of the county of Lanark, and the magistrates of Rutherglen, "in proportion to the gross valuation for the year ending on the 15th May, 1890, of the lands and heritages situated within the respective areas under the jurisdiction of such public bodies." By sec. 13 it was provided that the County Council of Lanark, "as representing the lower ward thereof," should pay to the Glasgow Court Houses Commissioners the sum chargeable against the County Council. In an action by the Commissioners against the County Council of Lanark for £7669 as their proportion of the sum chargeable under the Act against the three bodies, the sum sued for being arrived at by taking the gross valuation of all lands and heritages within the county as the area within the jurisdiction of the County Council, the defenders maintained that the valuation should have been limited to the Lower Ward of the county, which was alone liable for the assessment. Held that the words in sec. 13, "the respective areas under the jurisdiction of such public bodies," were to be read as referring only to areas which were under their jurisdiction for purposes connected with the Glasgow court houses, and that the Commissioners were not entitled to take the valuation of the whole county, but only the valuation of the Lower Ward, as the basis of assessment.

Reference to series of related statutes—Interpretation clause.

Observations (per Lord McLaren) on the construction of a series of statutes which are to be construed as one Act.

—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894.

Opinion (per Lord Kyllachy) that the courts are not entitled in construing a particular Act of Parliament to do so with reference to previous legislation or to inferences which they may be disposed to draw from previous statutes, as to the probable intentions of the legislature, but that their duty is to interpret, in its natural sense, the language of the particular enactment which is before them.

—Reference to earlier repealed statutes to explain ambiguity in subsequent statute—Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, secs. 22 and 31.

Held competent to refer to the provisions of earlier statutes, all of which were repealed by the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, in order to explain ambiguities arising under the terms of secs. 22 and 31 of that statute.

Same words occurring in modern and ancient statute—Words to be construed in their ordinary meaning — “Merchants’ accounts” — Debts Recovery (Scotland) Act, 1867—Triennial Prescription Act, 1579.

Sec. 2 of the Debts Recovery Act, 1867, provides that it shall be competent for the sheriff to try all actions of debt for “house malls, men’s ordinaries, servants’ fees, merchants’ accounts, and other the like debts,” provided the debt does not amount to more than £50 sterling. The words “merchants’ accounts,” as occurring in the Triennial Prescription Act, had already been judicially construed prior to the passing of the Debts Recovery Act. Held that the Debts Recovery Act must be construed without reference to the Act of 1579, which was not to be read as taxative of the Debts Recovery Act or as controlling its meaning. Observed (per Lord Neaves)—“Some of the language certainly appears to be provincial, or, as I should rather say, peculiar to Scotland. But the words ‘merchants’ accounts’ are not. I think it is safe in construing an imperial Act, unless the contrary is expressed, to read words in their present and ordinary meaning, in so far as they have such a meaning. It is different with words unintelligible to English ears. But the words ‘merchants’ accounts’ are perfectly intelligible as English words, though in a wider sense than what is generally held to be their sense in the Scotch Act of 1579. Are we to go back upon words which are not technical, and to go into an antiquarian discussion as to their meaning three hundred years ago, when the words are still used in ordinary life?”

Sandys v. Lowden & Rowe, 1874, 2 R. (J.) 7; 3 Coup. 43; 12 S.L.R. 104.

Reference to proceedings prior to the passing of the Act—Trade Union Act, 1871, sec. 4.

Sec. 4 of the above statute is as follows:—“Nothing in this Act shall enable any court to entertain any legal proceeding instituted with the object of directly enforcing or recovering damages for the breach of any of the following agreements, namely . . . any agreement for the application of the funds of a trade union . . . to provide benefits to members.” Opinions that, in view of the terms of the statute and of the history of previous proceedings in the report of a commission on the subject, it was the intention of the legislature that the taint of illegality in respect of the restraint of trade was to be absolutely removed, but that one of the things which trade unions were not to be allowed to enforce in a court of law was an agreement to provide benefits to members.

—Clauses in special Act interpreted by reference to general Act—City of Glasgow Union Railway Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. clxxxix.)—Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, sec. 16.

A railway company obtained powers under a special Act to “stop up and divert” a portion of a public road, according to certain deposited plans upon which a proposed deviation road was shown. The result would have been to cut off all access to and from a property which had been previously bounded by the public road. Held, in an application for interdict by the injured owner, that the proposed operations must be dealt with as ejusdem generis with the operations mentioned in the 16th section of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and that, accordingly, the 46th and 49th sections of that Act applied to the effect that the company was bound to supply the petitioner with a substitute road “equally convenient as the former road, or as near thereto as circumstances will allow.”

—“Let off . . . any firework whatsoever”—General Turnpike Act, 1831, sec. 96.

Power to break open "sewers, drains, or tunnels" — Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, sec. 28.

Sec. 28 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, enacts—"The undertakers . . . may open and break up the soil and pavement of the several streets and bridges within the limits of the special Act, and may open and break up any sewers, drains, or tunnels within or under such streets or bridges, &c." Held that the "tunnels" referred to in the section must be ejusdem generis with sewers or drains, and that it was ultra vires of public water commissioners to break open the brickwork forming the arch of the bridge or roof of a railway tunnel.

"Other building"—Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1832, sec. 11.

Held that the words "other building" in the enumeration in sec. 11 of the Representation of the People Act, 1832, of "any house, warehouse, counting-house, shop, or other building" within a burgh, were to be construed as including only such buildings as were ejusdem generis with the buildings specially enumerated.

"Any matter or thing"—Aberdeen Police and Waterworks Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. cxlii.), secs. 140-145.

Held that the words "any matter or thing whatever injurious to health or offensive to" the occupiers of adjoining premises in sec. 140 of the Aberdeen Police and Waterworks Act, 1862, were to be read as meaning any matter or thing ejusdem generis with those specified, and did not apply to goods stored for commercial purposes, although they might be injurious to health and offensive to the neighbourhood.

Resumption for "building, planting, feuing, or other purposes"—Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908, sec. 18 (1) and (5).

Under the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908, sec. 18, in leases from year to year six months' notice of termination must be given, except where there is a stipulation entitling the landlord to resume land for "building, planting, feuing, or other purposes." Observed that as building, planting, feuing, did not form a genus, no question of ejusdem generis construction could arise under the section.

5. CONTEMPORANEA EXPOSITIO—USAGE.

Contemporanea expositio — Ancient and recent statutes.

Observed (per Lord Watson)—"When there are ambiguous expressions in an Act passed one or two centuries ago, it may be legitimate to refer to the construction put upon these expressions throughout a long course of years, by the unanimous consent of all parties interested, as evidencing what must presumably have been the intention of the legislature at that remote period; but I feel bound to construe a recent statute according to its own terms, when these are brought into controversy, and not according to the views which interested parties may have hitherto taken; and in determining the true import of such a statute it appears to me to be quite immaterial to consider whether it was passed in the year 1858 or in 1883."

Usage—Unambiguous enactments—Emoluments of heritable office—Treaty of Union, 1706, article 20—Act of Union, 1707.

The Treaty of Union, 1706, ratified by the Act of Union, 1707, provided—"20. That all heritable offices, superiorities, heritable jurisdictions, offices for life, and jurisdictions for life be reserved to the owners thereof as rights of property in the same manner as they are now enjoyed by the laws of Scotland, notwithstanding of this treaty." At the time of the union the holder of the office of Principal Usher in Scotland was entitled to fees from all Scotsmen, and also from Englishmen in Scotland who received honours from the King as sovereign of Scotland. Held that as article 20 of the Act of Union did not enlarge the rights of the office, but merely reserved existing rights unchanged, its holders were not entitled to fees from recipients of honours whose titles were not purely Scottish but were titles of the United Kingdom, and that, as the terms of article 20 were unambiguous, no consideration could be given to the fact that from 1766 to 1904 the holders of the office had claimed and received such fees.

6. EXPRESSIO UNIUS EST EXCLUSIO ALTERIUS.

Proviso—Publicans' Certificate (Scotland) Act, 1876, sec. 4.

Observed that where a proviso such as that in the Publicans' Certificate (Scotland) Act, 1876, sec. 4, was attached to an enacting or exegetical section of an Act of Parliament, it did not necessarily fall to be construed on the principle expressio unius est exclusio alterius.

Extension of burgh boundaries—Apportionment of debts and obligations—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 11.

Held that, as the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act of 1892 qualified the transfer of an area from a county to a burgh by express provisions as to the apportionment of certain of the county debts, it must be held to have excluded all other county debts from apportionment.

7. RETROSPECTIVE AND PROSPECTIVE.

Declaratory enactment—Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867, sec. 2—Trusts (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1884, sec. 2.

Opinion (per Lord Kincairney) that sec. 2 of the Trusts (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1884, to the effect that, in the recited Acts, "trustee" shall include tutor, curator and judicial factor, and that "judicial factor" shall mean curator bonis, was declaratory, and therefore retrospective in its effect.

Retrospective effect — Conveyancing and Land Transfer (Scotland) Act, 1874, secs. 38 and 39.

Observations on the cases in which statutory enactments should be construed retrospectively. Held that the enactments contained in secs. 38 and 39 of the Conveyancing and Land Transfer Act, 1874, regarding the execution of deeds were not retrospective in their operation so as to affect deeds executed prior to the date when the Act came into operation.

Conveyancing (Scotland) Acts (1874 and 1879) Amendment Act, 1887, sec. 1.

Sec. 1 of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Acts (1874 and 1879) Amendment Act, 1887, is not retrospective in its operation.

(67)

Market Gardeners' Compensation (Scotland) Act, 1897, sec. 4.

Held that sec. 4 of the Market Gardeners' Compensation Act, 1897, is not retrospective, and does not entitle tenants under leases current at the date of the Act to compensation in respect of improvements executed prior to the commencement of the Act.

Observed (per Lord Trayner) that an Act of Parliament will not be held to be retrospective in its operation unless this construction is warranted either expressly or by necessary implication, and that there was nothing in the Market Gardeners' Compensation Act, 1897, sec. 4, to justify the belief that it was intended to be retrospective.

Callander v Smith, 1900, 2 F. 1140; 37 S.L.R. 890; 8 S.L.T. 132. (See rubric of this case in the House of Lords, No. 67, supra).

Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, secs. 28 and 40 — Statutory notice — Validity of notice given before Act came into force.

The Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, received the royal assent on 25th August, 1883, and came into force on 1st January, 1884. It provides (sec. 28) that "notwithstanding the expiration of the stipulated endurance of any lease, the tenancy shall not come to an end unless written notice has been given by either party to the other of his intention to bring the tenancy to an end . . . (b) in the case of leases from year to year, or for any other period less than three years, not less than six months before the termination of the lease. Failing such notice by either party the lease shall be held to be renewed by tacit relocation for another year, and thereafter from year to year." Held that six months' notice was necessary to enable a landlord to bring a yearly tenancy to a termination at Whitsunday, 1884, although the Act had not at that date been in force for six months. Opinion that a notice given to terminate the lease at Whitsunday, 1884, would have been valid if given after the Act had been passed but before it came into operation.

Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868, sec. 117.

Sec. 117 of the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868, enacts that, after 31st December, 1868, heritable securities, whether executed before or after that date, in whatever terms expressed, are to be held to be moveable as regards the succession of the creditor, unless executors are expressly excluded. In June, 1868, a creditor, holding a bond and disposition in security in ordinary form, died intestate, survived by her son, who died in 1869 without having served heir to his mother or made up a title to the bond. Held, in a competition between the heir at law of the mother and the executors of the mother and son that the statute had not a retrospective effect, and therefore did not regulate the succession, and that the heir at law had a right to the bond.

Conjugal Rights (Scotland) Act, 1861, sec. 16.

Held that sec. 16 of the Conjugal Rights Amendment Act, 1861, which entitles a wife, in certain circumstances, to a reasonable provision out of property to which she has succeeded, is retrospective in its effect, and applies to property to which the wife succeeded prior to the date of the Act.

(75)

Proviso attached to enacting or exegetical section.

Stevenson v Hunter, 1903, 5 F. 761; 40 S.L.R. 534; 10 S.L.T. 754, No. 60, supra.

Enactment followed by proviso—Administration of Justice and Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1808, sec. 9.

Opinion (per Lord Cowan), that "as a matter of general construction, it is certain that, when an enactment is followed by a proviso, the terms of the latter are construed always with due regard to the subject of the enactment. The proviso may be held to explain this enactment, and to state the instances or cases to which it is not to be applicable. But, unless the contrary be explicitly declared, no proviso will enlarge the scope and operation of the enacting words."

Substantive enactment in form of proviso—Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1832, sec. 11.

The clause beginning "provided also" in sec. 11 of the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1832, which, while in form a proviso, was held to be in reality a substantive enactment, and to create a separate and distinct ownership franchise, subject to no conditions other than those expressed in the enactment itself.

Davidson v Johnston, 1903, 6 F. 239; 41 S.L.R. 171; 11 S.L.T. 503.

Whether qualifying words limited the whole or only a portion of a clause—General Turnpike Act, 1831, sec. 96.

Opinion (per Lord Justice-Clerk Macdonald) that upon a proper construction of sec. 96 of the General Turnpike Act, 1831, which made it an offence to let off fireworks or to play games on the side of or adjacent to a turnpike road, the words "to the annoyance of any passenger or passengers" should be read as applicable to the whole section, and that a complaint which did not state that the act complained of was to the annoyance of passengers was irrelevant.

Murray v Keith, 1894, 22 R. (J.) 16; 1 Adam, 511; 32 S.L.R. 70; 2 S.L.T. 328.

9. IMPERATIVE, DIRECTORY, OR PERMISSIVE WORDS.

(79)

Words imperative or directory—Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864, sec. 18 and schedule (K).

Sec. 18 of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, provides that: "In cases of conviction and judgment against the respondent in prosecutions and proceedings under this Act, the sentence of the court may be in one or other of the forms contained in the schedule (K) to this Act annexed, or as nearly as may be in such form, according to the nature and circumstances of the complaint, viz. . . .

(2) In complaints for the contravention of any Act of Parliament under which the accused is or shall be liable on summary conviction to be imprisoned, or to be imprisoned or fined in the discretion of the court, the sentence of the court awarding imprisonment shall be in the form No. 2 in the said schedule." Opinions that the expressions used in the section were merely directory and not imperative, and that a departure from the forms prescribed in the schedule did not involve the penalty of nullity.

Dunkeld Bridge Act, 1803 (43 Geo. III. c. xxxiii.).

A statute conferred upon a proprietor the right to erect a bridge and to levy pontage dues, "provided always, and be it further enacted, that the said 'proprietor' and his heirs shall be, and he and they is and are hereby required to keep, or cause to be kept, an exact account" of the expenditure, "and also an account" of receipts, "and shall cause the same to be laid before the Justices of the Peace and Commissioners of Supply . . . at their annual meeting in the month of April." Held that the clause as to the lodging of accounts was not to be construed as an imperative enactment, but that it was merely directory, and that failure to comply with it did not infer a forfeiture of the right to levy pontage dues.

Campbell, &c. v Duke of Atholl, 1869, 8 M. 308; 42 J. 142; 7 S.L.R. 186.

Rules for guidance of voters—Ballot Act, 1872, secs. 2 and 28, sched. 1, rules 22, 25 and 28.

Sec. 2 of the Ballot Act, 1872, lays down the method in which votes shall be taken at elections. Sec. 28 enacts that "the schedules to this Act, and the notes thereto, and directions therein, shall be construed and have effect as part of this Act." Sched. 1 contains rules for the guidance of those taking part in elections. Observed (per Lord Justice-Clerk Moncreiff) that, in so far as the rules concerned were mere matters of form such as, e.g., the form of the writs to be used, their words were directory and would be complied with by as exact an adherence as circumstances would permit, but that directions given to the elector or the returning officer were of a different class, and were of the nature of injunctions or prohibitions which must be as specifically complied with as if they had been specially provided in the body of the statute.

Thirlage Act, 1799.

The Thirlage Act, 1799, provides for the recording of an abbreviate of the decree of commutation within sixty days after the verdict of the jury. Held that this provision was directory merely, and did not infer nullity of the decree if not complied with.

Bankruptcy Act, 1856, sec. 150.

Sec. 150 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, enacts that in certain circumstances the creditors may present a petition to the Lord Ordinary or to the sheriff, and that, "if no cause be shown to the contrary, decree shall be pronounced accordingly." Held that the words "if no cause be shown to the contrary" did not confer a discretionary power upon the court before which the matter was brought to refuse to act upon the petition.

Negative and prohibitory words—Court of Session Acts, 1850 and 1868.

Observed (per Lord President Inglis) regarding sec. 11 of the Court of Session Act, 1850—"Now, it has not been suggested that this enactment has been repealed, and the words used are negative and prohibitory, a form of expression which, when it occurs in a statute, must always be read as imperative."

Imperative or permissive words—Straightening marches—Act 1669, c 17.

By the Act 1669, c. 17, it is provided that when a person intends to enclose his ground "it shall be leisome to him to require the next sheriff or other officer to visit the marches." Held that the above quoted words are imperative, and that even of consent the visit of the sheriff cannot be superseded by a remit to a man of skill.

Lord Advocate v Sinclair, 1872, 11 M. 137; 45 J. 86; 10 S.L.R. 82.

Words permissive in form imperative in effect—Highway (Scotland) Act, 1771, sec. 1.

Held that looking to the context and general scope of the Act, and to the fact that the powers therein conferred were to be exercised for the benefit of the public, the words of sec. 1 of the Highway (Scotland) Act, 1771, which empowers those responsible for the upkeep of statute labour roads to provide 20 feet of clear passable road, though permissive in form, is in effect imperative.

Gray v St. Andrews and Cupar District Committees of Fife County Council, 1911 S.C. 266; 48 S.L.R. 409; 1910, 2 S.L.T. 354.

Act 1889—Interpretation Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 63).

"Month"—Act 1850, sec. 4.

The word "month" is to be deemed and taken to mean a calendar month in all Acts of Parliament of whatever date, unless words be added showing lunar month to be intended.

Opinions that by the common law of Scotland "month" means a calendar month.

Farquharson v Whyte, 1886, 13 R. (J.) 29; 1 White, 26; 23 S.L.R. 360.

"Person"—Body corporate—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, secs. 13 and 33.

The Interpretation Act, 1889, sec. 2, sub-sec. (1), enacts:—"In the construction of every enactment relating to an offence . . . the expression 'person' shall, unless the contrary intention appears, include a body corporate." Held that the word "person" as used in sec. 33, sub-sec. (1), of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, did not include the corporation of a burgh, the contrary intention appearing from the Act, and therefore that such a corporation had no title to prosecute for a contravention of the Act.

Singular to include plural—Act 1850, sec. 4.

The 4th section of the Act 1850 enacts that, "in all Acts words importing the masculine gender shall be deemed and taken to include females, and the singular to include the plural, and the plural the singular, unless the contrary as to gender or number is expressly provided." Observed (per Lord Mure and Lord Shand) that the provisions of that section applied to the language of the 88th section of the Roads and Bridges Act, 1878, and that therefore the words "county" and "burgh," as there used, must be held to include "counties" and "burghs." Opinion contra (per Lord President Inglis).

(90)

Act 1889, sec. 1 (b)—Insurance by one policy for a number of vessels—Stamp—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1867, sec. 1, sched. B, and sec. 4.

The Customs and Inland Revenue Act,

1867, sec. 1, enacts that there shall be charged the several duties respectively specified in schedules A, B, and C to the Act. Sched. B, inter alia, sets forth: "For every policy of sea insurance for time in respect of every full sum of £100 and in respect of every fractional part of £100 thereby insured, where the insurance shall be made for any time not exceeding six months, 3d." Sec. 4 defines sea insurance as meaning, inter alia, "any insurance . . . made upon any ship or vessel." Sec. 1 of the Interpretation Act, 1889, provides that in any Act passed after 1850 "unless the contrary intention appears . . . (b) words in the singular shall include the plural and words in the plural shall include the singular." Held that a time policy of insurance embracing a number of vessels with separate sums insured on each was properly stamped at the duty corresponding to the aggregate sum insured.

"And" construed as "or"—Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, sec. 3 (3) (b) and (c).

Held that sub-secs. (b) and (c) of sec. 3 (3) of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, are to be read disjunctively, the word "and" between them being equivalent to "or"; and, accordingly, that it is an offence to use a name which contravenes sub-sec. (b) although it does not also contravene sub-sec. (c).

Assessment "in use to be paid in each county"—County General Assessment Act, 1868, sec. 3, sub-secs. (2) and (3)—Rogue Money Act, 1724, sec. 12—Administration of justice—Procurator-fiscal.

The County General Assessment (Scotland) Act, 1868, sec. 3, enacts that, inter alia, "(2) the salaries or fees and necessary outlays of procurators-fiscal" in the sheriff court, "in so far as such salaries, fees, and outlays are at present in use to be paid by each county"; "(3) the expenses incurred in searching for, apprehending, subsisting, prosecuting, or punishing criminals" may be defrayed out of the county general assessment, which was substituted for "rogue money," created by the Rogue Money Act, 1724. In 1899 the Procurator-Fiscal of the Lower Ward of Lanarkshire raised an action against the County Council of Lanark (which had come in place of the Commissioners of Supply), concluding for declarator that the defenders were bound to provide reasonable remuneration for work done by him in the administration of the criminal law, in so far as not covered by the salary paid to him from Exchequer. Held that the Commissioners of Supply under the County General Assessment Act were neither bound nor entitled to pay other fees to the Sheriff Court Procurator-Fiscal than were "in use" to be paid to him at the passing of the Act in the particular county; and that as fees of the character in question were not in use to be paid to the Procurator-Fiscal of Lanarkshire at the passing of the Act, the pursuer was not entitled to payment thereof from the defenders.

13. INCORPORATION OF STATUTES AND DOCUMENTS.

Incorporation of statutory provisions—General Act incorporated "except where expressly varied by or inconsistent with" special Act—Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845—Glasgow District Subway Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. clxii.), sec. 73.

Held (following the rule laid down by Lord Westbury in Vicar of St. Sepulchre's, in re Westminster Bridge, 1864, 33 L.J. Chanc. 372) that "if the particular Act gives in itself a complete rule on the subject, the expression of that rule would undoubtedly amount to an exception of the subject-matter of the rule out of the general Act." Circumstances in which, applying the above rule, it was held that where the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, had been incorporated "except where expressly varied by or inconsistent with" the special Act, the provisions of the former Act were not superseded by those contained in the special Act.

Conditional incorporation—Education (Scotland) Act, 1878, sec. 31—Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, sec. 127.

The Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, is generally incorporated with the Education (Scotland) Act, 1878, but subject to the condition that, before any of the powers of the former Act are to come into operation, a provisional order and a confirming Act following thereon must be obtained. Held that, where the above procedure had not been followed, the conditions necessary for the operation of sec. 127 of the Lands Clauses Act did not exist.

Limitation of meaning of general words in incorporating clause.

The Bankruptcy, Frauds, and Disabilities (Scotland) Act, 1884, sec. 4, enacts that a person doing certain things shall be guilty of a crime and offence, and may be dealt with and punished as if he had been guilty of a crime and offence under the Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880, "and the provisions of that Act shall apply to proceedings under this section." Question, whether the Act of 1880 was incorporated with that of 1884 except as regarded the mode of trial and the punishment to be awarded.

Limitation of meaning of general words in incorporating clause.

Sec. 36 of the Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862, enacts that "the provisions and enactments contained in the recited Acts (including the Home Drummond Act), so far as not repealed, shall extend and be construed, deemed, and taken to extend to and form part of this Act, in the same manner and as fully and to all intents and purposes as if the said provisions and enactments were herein repeated and set forth at length." Held that sec. 13 of the Act 1828 was not incorporated with the Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862, except with reference to matters falling within the scope of the Home Drummond Act, and consequently, as the granting of search warrants was not a matter which fell within the scope of that Act, that a magistrate, although a licence holder, might competently grant a search warrant.

Act, 1899, sec. 6, incorporates, inter alia, sec. 56 of the Tramways Act. Held that sec. 56 applied to bye-laws made in pursuance of the Act of 1899.

—Contract with local authority on footing of adoption of Act.

Where the requisite majority required by the Burghs Gas Supply Act, 1876, sec. 20, of the shareholders of an unincorporated joint stock company supplying a burgh with gas had entered into an agreement with the police commissioners of the burgh to sell the property of the company to the commissioners, the agreement bearing to proceed on the footing that the Act was to be adopted by the burgh, held that the Act was to be taken as having been adopted by the burgh at the date of the agreement, even in a question with shareholders not consenting to the agreement; and that such shareholders had no right to object to the sale, either under their contract of copartnery or at common law.

II. APPLICABILITY OF STATUTES.

1. APPLICATION TO CROWN.

(108)

The doctrine that Crown rights are not affected by any statute in which the Crown is not named has no application to statutes not affecting the patrimonial interests or the prerogatives of the Crown, but regulating procedure in causes relating to public revenues under the control for public purposes of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue or the Commissioners of Customs.

Post Office Acts Consolidation Act, 1837, secs. 25, 35, and 36.

Held (per Lord Justice-Clerk Moncreiff) in an objection to an indictment libelling on the 35th and 36th sections of the above Act to the effect that the word "misdemeanour" as occurring in these sections was unintelli-

Vagrancy Act, 1824, sec. 4—Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, sec. 15.

Sec. 4 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, enacted that any person committing one of a variety of offences should be deemed to be a rogue and vagabond within the meaning of the Act, and should be liable to a certain punishment. The Act was declared not to extend to Scotland. Sec. 15 of the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, made certain alterations in regard to the evidence necessary to prove one of the offences above referred to, and then proceeded:—"And the provisions of the said 4th section (of the Vagrancy Act), as amended by this section, shall be in force in Scotland." Held that under the 15th section of the Prevention of Crimes Act the whole of the 4th section of the Act of Geo. IV. was made applicable to Scotland.

The 9th section of the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, provides as follows:—"The rules contained in the 116th section of the Act of the Session holden in the 24th and 25th years of the reign of Her present Majesty, c. 96, intituled 'An Act to consolidate and amend the statute law of England and Ireland relating to larceny and other similar offences' in relation to the form of and the proceedings upon an indictment for any offence punishable under that Act committed after previous conviction, shall, with the necessary variations, apply to any indictment for committing a crime, as defined by the Act, after previous conviction for a crime, whether the crime charged in such indictment, or the crime to which such previous conviction relates, be or be not punishable under the said Act of the Session of the 24th and 25th years of the reign of Her present Majesty, c. 96." The Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, applies to Scotland; the Larceny Act, 1861, does not. Held that the section above quoted does not apply to Scotland with the effect of altering the practice of the Scottish courts with regard to proving previous convictions.

Whether statutory provision pleadable by individual—Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. cxxxii.), sec. 163—Ventilating area.

Held that the arrangements as to the ventilation of a new house are, under sec. 163 of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act of 1879, matters in the discretion of the dean of guild, and that the Court will not interfere with his judgment unless gross error can be proved. Opinion (per Lord Shand) that neighbours have no title to take objection to the plans of a new building on the ground that the provisions of sec. 163 have not received effect.

Edinburgh Municipal and Police Amendment Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. cxxxvi.), sec. 50—Open space—Ventilation.

An application for warrant to convert the ground and basement storeys of a house into business premises and for the erection of a saloon of two storeys for the manufacture of tobacco on an existing "open space" behind, was opposed by the proprietor of adjoining premises. The dean of guild granted the warrant. In an appeal held that as the dean of guild was satisfied in regard to the ventilation of the new premises, the objector had no title under sec. 50 of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Amendment Act, 1891, to interfere with the discretion vested in the dean.

Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. cl.) secs. 60 and 62—Height of buildings—Dean of guild—Lining.

The Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1900, imposes restrictions on the height to which buildings may be erected, but gives the corporation power to consent to such height being exceeded. In a petition for lining for the erection of buildings to a height beyond the statutory limitations, held that neighbouring proprietors who had an interest to object to the height of the buildings had a title to plead contravention of the statutory restrictions as an objection to the petition for lining.

Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. cl.), sec. 60—Height of buildings—Consent of corporation—Appeal to dean of guild.

The Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1900, provides, by sec. 60, inter alia, that whenever the corporation consents to any building being erected beyond the height specified in the section, "the owner or lessee of any lands or heritages within one hundred yards of any intended building who may deem himself aggrieved by the grant of such consent may . . . appeal to the dean of guild, who shall have power to deal with the case as shall seem to him just." Held that in disposing of such an appeal the dean of guild is not limited to the consideration of whether the corporation, in giving their consent, were acting capriciously or ultra vires, but must also take into consideration whether the individual owner appealing is, as a result of his proximity, unduly prejudiced by the increased height; and that the dean of guild should not take into account the invasion of any legal rights of the individual owner, such legal rights falling to be vindicated in the petition for lining.

Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. cl.), sec. 38—Prohibition of class of buildings—Dean of guild—Lining.

In a petition for lining presented to the dean of guild in Glasgow, objection was taken by the proprietors of subjects adjoining those of the petitioner on the ground that the buildings which it was proposed to erect would be in contravention of the statutory restrictions on the erection of buildings in the back ground of a hollow square contained in sec. 38 of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1900. The dean of guild found that the objector's property would not be injuriously affected in any way by the proposed buildings, repelled the objection and granted the lining. In an appeal the Court, accepting this finding as a finding in fact, held that as the objectors had no interest they had no title to enforce the restrictions of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act, and refused the appeal.

—Statutory board—Title to sue—
Salmon Fisheries Act, 1862—Salmon Fisheries Act, 1868.

Under the Salmon Fisheries Acts of 1862 and 1868 fishery boards have power to sue for penalties for offences under the Acts and to apply summarily to the sheriff for the enforcement of rules and regulations made by them. In a note of suspension and interdict brought by a fishery board at common law to prevent persons fishing in a manner alleged to be illegal, held that the complainants, being merely a statutory board with statutory remedies, had no title to sue. Opinion that the remedy sought was incompetent, because the only competent remedy was that provided by the statute.

Whether breach of statutory obligation involves civil liability—Scope and purpose of statute—Penalty—Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, secs. 49 and 50.

The Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, by sec. 49, lays down certain general rules for the conduct of coal mines, and by sec. 50 makes every contravention of or non-compliance with the general rules an offence against the Act punishable by a fine. A workman injured through breach of one of these rules was held entitled to claim reparation at common law.

The Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Act, 1888, sec. 1, by sub-sec. (1) enacts that a person shall not be entitled to describe himself as a patent agent unless he is registered, and by sub-sec. (4) enacts that if any person knowingly describes himself as a patent agent in contravention of this section, he shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding £20. An action for declarator that the defender was not entitled to describe himself as a patent agent so long as he was not registered, and for interdict against him so describing himself dismissed as incompetent on the ground that the statute, in making the use of the designation "patent agent" by a person not registered a criminal offence, and subjecting the person so using it to a penalty, did not confer any civil right upon other persons to prevent him from using it.

Chartered Institute of Patent Agents v Lockwood, 1894, 21 R. (H.L.) 61; [1894] A.C. 347; 11 R.P.C. 374; 31 S.L.R. 942; 2 S.L.T. 106.

Whether statutory remedy exclusive—
Passenger steamer—Survey—Board of Trade—Ultra vires—Merchant Shipping Acts, 1854, secs. 307, 312, and 318; 1872, sec. 13; 1876, secs. 14 and 15.

The Merchant Shipping Acts provide for the survey of passenger steamers, and by the Act of 1876, sec. 14, provision is made "if a shipowner feels aggrieved," inter alia, by the declaration of a surveyor respecting a passenger steamer or by the refusal of a surveyor to give such a declaration, for appeal to a court of survey instituted by that Act. A surveyor having refused to give a statutory declaration relating to a certain steamer, her builders and owners brought an action for declaration that the instruction given by the Board of Trade to their surveyors, under which the declaration was refused, was ultra vires of the Board. Held that, whether the Board had gone beyond their powers or not, the matter was one for which the Act of 1876, by secs. 14 and 15, had provided a remedy, and that the jurisdiction of the Court of Session was in hoc statu excluded.

—Railway rates—Undue preference—
Repetition of alleged overcharges—Interdict—
Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, secs. 2, 3, 6—Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, secs. 1 and 6.

A trader complained that a railway company had for years charged higher rates for his goods than for those of a neighbour. In an action for repetition of the alleged overcharges held that the only remedy open under the Railway and Canal Traffic Act was by application to the Railway and Canal Commissioners (under the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873) for interdict, and that the action as brought was incompetent.

Adjustment of debts under order of Boundary Commissioners—Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, secs. 49 and 50.

By the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, sec. 49, the Boundary Commissioners acting under the Act are empowered to provide for the adjustment and disposal of the property, debts and liabilities of the various authorities affected by the orders pronounced by the Commissioners, and they are further (sec. 50) empowered to state a special case for the opinion of the Court of Session on any question of law. The Commissioners having, in pursuance of the Act, pronounced an order detaching a portion of one parish and annexing it to another parish, and the parochial boards of the parishes having applied to the Commissioners to adjust their respective liabilities consequent on this change, the Commissioners presented a special case for the opinion of the Court regarding the liabilities of the two parishes for the parochial relief of persons who were resident in the transferred portion at the date of the transference. The Court dismissed the case, holding that it presented no question of law.

Opinions that the question was one for the determination of the Commissioners.

The West Highland Railway Guarantee Act provided that, so long as the Government guaranteed interest or dividend on the undertaking, the valuation of the railway should not be placed higher than the value of the lands had been before the railway was constructed. The Act did not, however, provide any means for ascertaining the value of the lands. Held that the Court of Session had no jurisdiction to ascertain the value by proof or otherwise.

Mill dam—Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1862, secs. 6 and 29.

The Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1862, enacts by sec. 29 that "in the event of any person refusing or neglecting to obey any bye-law made by the commissioners . . . the clerk (to the district board) may apply to the sheriff by summary petition in ordinary form praying to have such person ordained to obey the same . . ." Held that a bye-law made by the commissioners with reference to mill dams could only be enforced by proceedings taken under sec. 29, and that an action by a proprietor of salmon fishings, which was in substance a proceeding for the enforcement of such a bye-law, was incompetent.

Bursary—Educational Endowments (Scotland) Act, 1882, sec. 46.

The Educational Endowments (Scotland) Act, 1882, by sec. 46 provides that if the governing body of any educational endowment fail to give effect to the provisions of any scheme approved under the Act it shall be lawful for the Scotch Education Department upon the application of, inter alios, "any person or persons having a vested interest in the endowment" to require the governing body to give effect to the scheme, and that if the governing body fail to comply they may be summarily compelled to do so by the Court of Session in a petition and complaint at the instance of the Lord Advocate. Certain pupils of a school brought an action of suspension and interdict against the Perth Educational Trust seeking to interdict them from awarding certain bursaries until the parties entitled thereto had been ascertained by a competitive examination duly intimated in accordance with a scheme under the said Act. Held that the complainers were persons having a vested interest in the endowment and that they were not entitled to the remedy sought.

Invasion of common law right.

A railway company which had powers of opening up the streets of a town were bound by their Act of Parliament to restore the streets opened up by them within three months, under a penalty of £20 for every day exceeding that period for which the streets disturbed by them should not be restored. Held that the statute did not deprive persons injured by the closing of a street beyond the legal period of their common law right to damages.

IV. DESUETUDE.

(152)

Profanation of the Sabbath—Act 1661, c. 18—Act 1696, c. 31.

Held that while the Acts 1661, c. 18, and 1696, c. 31, "and the other Acts anent the profanation of the Sabbath" are largely in desuetude, they are not in desuetude in so far as they prohibit the keeping of open shop on the Sabbath. The general law as to when and under what circumstances a statute falls into desuetude discussed.

(155)

Held that, even if the Acts prohibiting Sunday labour were not in desuetude, they, and in particular the Act 1579, c. 70, did not apply to such employment as that of a watchman. Question, whether the Act 1579, c. 70, is in desuetude.

V. REPEAL.

1. GENERALLY.

(159)

Reference to practice under repealed statute.

Question, whether a repealing statute can be construed by reference to the practice which prevailed under the statute which it repeals.

Society formed in pursuance of statute subsequently repealed — Winding up—Building Societies Act, 1894, sec. 25—Companies Act, 1862, secs. 4, 199—Interpretation Act, 1889, sec. 38.

In a petition by a creditor for the winding up, under sec. 199 of the Companies Act, 1862, of a building society (unincorporated and not registered under this Act), consisting of more than 20 persons, and established and certified in 1873 under the Building Societies Act, 1836, held that, in virtue of sec. 38 of the Interpretation Act, 1889, the repeal of the Act of 1836 by the Building Societies Act, 1894, did not affect rights or liabilities acquired or incurred by the society under the repealed Act.

Complaint founded on repealed section—Statute Law Revision Act, 1892.

A complaint labelled a contravention of sec. 26 of the Excise Licences Act of 1825, "as altered or amended by the 8th and 9th sections of the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1853." The 8th and 9th sections of the Act of 1853 were repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1892. Held that the complaint was irrelevant, in respect that it was founded on sections of a statute which had been repealed.

Morison v Stubbs, 1897, 24 R. (J.) 61; 2 Adam, 321; 34 S.L.R. 672; 5 S.L.T. 32.

2. REPEAL BY LATER AND INCONSISTENT STATUTE.

(162)

Repeal of statute in so far as inconsistent with repealing statute—Court of Session (Scotland) Act, 1810, sec. 36—Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1853, sec. 24.

Sec. 24 of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1853, states what interlocutors may or may not be competently brought under review by the Court of Session. Held that any provision of an earlier Act of Parliament allowing an interlocutor not falling within one of the definitions set forth in the above section is inconsistent therewith, and is therefore impliedly repealed.

Appeal without leave—Inconsistency—Court of Session (Scotland) Act, 1810, sec. 36—Sheriff Courts Act, 1853, sec. 24.

By sec. 36 of the Court of Session Act, 1810, it is enacted that bills of advocacy from sheriffs and other inferior judges shall be allowed, inter alia, with respect "to an interim decree for partial payment," "provided that leave is given by the inferior judge." By the 24th section of the Sheriff Courts Act, 1853, it is enacted that it shall be competent to take to review of the Court of Session "any interlocutor of a sheriff giving interim decree for payment of money." By the same section it is enacted that the provisions of the Court of Session Act, 1810, "are, in so far as inconsistent with this enactment, hereby repealed." Held that it was competent to appeal against an interlocutor of the sheriff giving interim decree for payment of money, without obtaining his leave.

Ballot Act, 1872, sec. 22—Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862, secs. 48 and 50.

Sec. 48 of the Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862, is repealed by the fifth sched. of the Ballot Act, 1872, "so far as their provisions are inconsistent with the provisions of this Act." Sec. 50 of the Police and Improvement Act is not directly repealed by the Ballot Act. Held that, the object of the Ballot Act being merely to introduce a new mode of voting, when it enacted that "all municipal elections shall be conducted in the same manner in all respects in which the elections of councillors in 'certain royal burghs' are directed to be conducted by the Acts in force at the date of the passing of this Act, as amended by this Act," it only prescribed the mode of conducting the election in the sense of taking the votes, adding them up, and declaring the result, and did not repeal the provisions of secs. 48 and 50 of the Police and Improvement Act, 1862, as to the mode of dealing with an equality of votes and fixing the day of election of police commissioners.

Hamilton v Police Commissioners of Dunoon, 1875, 2 R. 299; 12 S.L.R. 257.

General Act adopted at a date subsequent to passing of a local Act—Police and Improvement Act, 1862, sec. 35—Forfarshire Roads Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. cxlvii.).

By the 35th section of the General Police Act, 1862, it is provided that "any general or local police Act within such burgh shall be repealed, excepting in so far as it may relate to matters not provided for in this Act." The 1862 Act was adopted by the burgh of Kirriemuir in 1875, a year subsequent to the passing of the Forfarshire Roads Act, 1874, which imposed certain burdens upon police commissioners. Held that the repealing clause did not apply to the provisions of the Forfarshire Roads Act, and that the enactments must be read together, and consistently with each other.

Effect of repealing clause in local Act upon general provisions in public Acts—General

Turnpike Act, 1831, sec. 91—Aberdeen Corporation Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. cxxiv.), sec. 8.

A clause in a local Act which is entirely general in its nature and which repeals all laws, &c., which are inconsistent with its provisions must be carefully scrutinised before it can be held to apply in any particular case. Held that in a case of inconsistency between the provisions of sec. 91 of the General Turnpike Act, 1831, and those of sec. 133 of the Aberdeen Municipality Extension Act, 1871, a general repealing clause in the Aberdeen Corporation Act, 1891, was not sufficient to repeal the provisions of sec. 91 of the General Turnpike Act, 1831.

Russell v Magistrates of Aberdeen, 1899, 1 F. 792; 36 S.L.R. 510.

3. IMPLIED REPEAL.

Adulteration Acts, 1860 and 1872.

By sec. 1 of the Adulteration Act, 1860, it is made an offence for any person to sell "as pure and unadulterated any article of food or drink which is adulterated or not pure." . . . Sec. 2 of the 1872 Act repeals this enactment with the omission of the italicised words. Held that the section in the later Act did not supersede sec. 1 of the Act of 1860 and that it was still competent to bring a complaint under that section. Observed (per Lord Justice-Clerk Moncreiff)—"In the first place, the repeal of one statute by another subsequently passed by mere implication is not easily to be presumed; and, secondly, before such repeal can be inferred by implication, repugnancy between the provisions of the two statutes must be proved in whole or in part."

Bain v Mackay, 1875, 2 R. (J.) 32; 3 Coup. 134; 12 S.L.R. 490.

Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 347—Burgh Sewerage, Drainage, and Water Supply (Scotland) Act, 1901, secs. 1, 2 and 3.

Sec. 347 of the Burgh Police Act, 1892, enacts that the lands and premises therein enumerated shall be assessed on one-fourth of their annual value, but adds the proviso that, where such lands and premises were, prior to the passing of the Act, liable to be assessed under any general or local Police Act or under the Public Health Acts or the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, on the annual value thereof, and money had been borrowed on the security of the assessments so authorised, they are to be assessed on their annual value, and in the same manner as heretofore, until the borrowed moneys have been repaid. The Burgh Sewerage Act, 1901, merged the special water supply districts in the larger area of the burgh, and put an end to differential rating. Held that the proviso of sec. 347 of the Burgh Police Act, 1892, was impliedly repealed by the Burgh Sewerage, Drainage and Water Supply Act, 1901, and that lands and premises to which the proviso would have applied now fall to be assessed on one-fourth only of their value, as provided in the unrepealed portion of the section, and not on their full value.

Dundee and Arbroath Railway Act, 1836—Poor Law Amendment Act, 1845—Mode of assessment of railways for poor rates.

The Dundee and Arbroath Railway Act, 1836, enacted that, when the railway company acquired a portion of the lands of any proprietor, the portion so acquired should not have any liability for "any public or parish burden whatever, but the same shall be paid by the original proprietor of such lands." At the date of the passing of the Act poor rates were levied from railway companies only qua owners and occupants of the lands held by them in each parish respectively, but in 1845 the Poor Law Amendment Act prescribed a special mode for the assessment of railways, requiring each railway to be valued as a composite subject, and directing the total annual value to be apportioned among the parishes through which it passed, according to the number of miles of railway in each. Held that the assessment of poor rates of a railway as a composite subject was a new assessment introduced for the first time by the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1845, and that previous statutes, in so far as they exempted railways from assessment, were abrogated.

Revenue from granting a retail licence to the holder of a theatre licence to sell beer, wine, and spirits in his theatre without the production by him of such a certificate.

Held that the exemption, in sec. 372 of the Glasgow Police Act of 1866, of corner buildings from the provisions requiring a certain amount of free space for air, was not repealed by sec. 33 of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act of 1892, the purpose of the latter section being merely to define the character of the requisite free space in the case of buildings which under the principal Act were required to have free space, but not to enact that buildings which had previously been exempt should for the future comply with the provisions regarding free space.

The Glasgow Police Act, 1866, contains a variety of provisions with respect to "stage carriages." The Glasgow Tramways Act, 1870, and the Glasgow Corporation Act, 1893, contain provisions empowering the Corporation to issue bye-laws for the regulation of tramways. The driver of a tramway car, for which the Corporation of Glasgow as owners held a licence under the Act of 1866, was charged with having contravened that Act. He pleaded in defence that the Act of 1866 had been superseded quoad tramways by the Acts of 1870 and 1893. The magistrate repelled the objection, and convicted the accused. Held, in an appeal, that the objection had rightly been repelled.

Inconsistency between local and general Acts—Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, secs. 45 and 46—Glasgow Police Acts, 1862 and 1866.

The provisions of the Glasgow Police Acts, 1862 and 1866, dealing with underground dwellings, enact certain requirements from which such dwellings as are registered in pursuance of the Acts are exempted. The Public Health Act, 1867, contains similar but enlarged provisions regarding underground dwellings, but does not contain the exemption clause. Held, in a prosecution for contravention of the provisions of the Public Health Act, in the case of an underground dwelling in Glasgow, that while the provisions of the Police Acts were not repealed by the Public Health Act, it was not a good defence that the dwelling was registered under the Glasgow Police Acts, in view of the fact that the Glasgow Act was in the minds of the legislature when the Public Health Act was enacted and that the latter Act was intended to apply to places having local Police Acts.

Aberdeen Harbour Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. lxxxviii.), schedule A — Aberdeen Harbour Act, 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. cxxvi.), sec. 10.

Under sched. A of the Aberdeen Harbour Act, 1879, the Harbour Commissioners were not entitled to levy harbour rates upon additional voyages of a certain class of ships which had completed ten voyages during the year. This schedule was repealed by sec. 75 of the Aberdeen Harbour Act, 1895, which by sec. 10 provided:—"Notwithstanding the repeal of the recited Acts . . . and except only as is by this Act otherwise expressly provided, everything before the commencement of this Act done or suffered under or confirmed by the recited Acts . . . shall be as valid as if such Acts . . . were not repealed, and the repeal thereof and this Act respectively shall accordingly be subject and without prejudice to everything so done or suffered or confirmed, and to all rights, liabilities, debts, claims and demands, both present and future, which, if the recited Acts . . . were not repealed, and this Act were not passed, would be incident to or consequent on any and everything so done, suffered, or confirmed . . ." In an action for rates against the owners of a vessel in class 3, which had made ten voyages prior to 1st October, 1895, and several voyages between that date and the end of the year, the defenders denied liability for rates for the voyages between 1st October and the end of the year on the ground that the Act of 1879 conferred a right of exemption from such rates, which was saved by sec. 10 of the Act of 1895. Held that no right of exemption had been conferred by the Act of 1879, but that the non-liability for further rates merely arose from the rating powers of the commissioners being restricted to ten voyages, and that the rating powers of the commissioners under the new Act being unrestricted, the exemption no longer existed.

The Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, sec. 11, enacts that "subject to the provisions of this Act there shall be transferred to and vested in the council of each county," inter alia, "the whole powers and duties of the commissioners of supply," and that "the provisions of any Act of Parliament conferring, imposing, or regulating the powers and duties by this Act transferred, or regulating the proceedings under any such Act, shall remain in full force and effect, except in so far as they are repealed by or are inconsistent with the provisions of this Act." Secs. 26 and 27 empower county councils to impose rates within the county to meet the deficiency in the county fund in respect of each branch of expenditure, declaring that "the rate in respect of each branch of expenditure for which provision is made under an Act of Parliament in force at the passing of this Act shall be deemed to be imposed under the powers and subject to the provisions of that Act, except in so far as these are inconsistent with the provisions of this Act," the sum of such rates to be the "consolidated rates." Held (1) that by secs. 26 and 27 of the Local Government Act, 1889, the whole assessing powers derived by a county council from prior Acts were merged in the power given to assess for consolidated rates, and that a county council had no other power to assess; and (2) that a county council's power to assess being limited to lands and heritages within the county as defined by the Act, they were not entitled to assess lands or heritages within a royal or parliamentary burgh.

Division of parish—Procedure—Order by Secretary for Scotland—Ultra vires—Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, sec. 51—Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1894, secs. 1 and 46.

The Local Government (Scotland) Acts, 1889 and 1894, empower the Secretary for Scotland to make orders altering the boundaries of parishes. Sec. 51 of the 1889 Act gives him power to divide any parish which it seems, for various reasons, to be expedient to divide and for uniting any such subdivision with other parishes. Sec. 1 of the 1894 Act provides that that Act shall be read with the Act of 1889 as one Act. Sec. 46 of the 1894 Act provides with regard to orders made by the Secretary for Scotland altering the boundaries of parishes, inter alia, as follows:—"Before making any such order the Secretary for Scotland shall consult with the authorities concerned, and upon the application of any one or more of such authorities shall cause a local inquiry . . . to be held, and shall cause the proposed order to be published in the 'Edinburgh Gazette' . . . and shall consider all objections and representations respecting such order." A county council applied to the Secretary for Scotland for an order altering the boundaries of one of their parishes. The parish council opposed the application, and a local inquiry was held under sec. 46 of the 1894 Act, after which the Secretary for Scotland intimated that he was not "at present" prepared to grant the application. The application was subsequently renewed and, without holding a further inquiry, but after receiving a representation from the parish council, the Secretary for Scotland published a "proposed order" in the 'Edinburgh Gazette.' Held that the statutory procedure had been sufficiently complied with and that the order was legal and regular.

Bathing—Ultra vires—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 300.

By the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, provision is made for bye-laws, made in pursuance of powers therein conferred, being confirmed by the sheriff and by the Secretary for Scotland, for notice being given to the public of the intention to apply for such confirmation, and for the hearing and disposal of objections. The magistrates of a burgh, professing to exercise the powers conferred by sec. 300 of the Act, made certain bye-laws, one of which was in these terms—"4. No person shall bathe on or from any part of the seashore within the burgh except at such places as may from time to time be appointed by the magistrates." The bye-laws were confirmed by the sheriff and by the Secretary for Scotland, and thereafter the magistrates, by minute of meeting, fixed certain places for male bathers, and certain other places for female bathers. Held that the bye-law was ultra vires.

Paving of common areas—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 316 B (8).

Sec. 316 of the Burgh Police Act, 1892, enacts that "the commissioners may from time to time make bye-laws as they think fit for the purposes after mentioned, viz.:—B (8) . . . and also for paving private courts, common passages, and common areas other than bleaching greens." Held that under the section it was competent for the burgh commissioners to make a bye-law requiring the owner of a common area, in addition to paving the area, to provide proper and sufficient means for taking off the surface water, and that a common area behind a tenement of houses in a burgh, which was set apart for drying clothes, but was not laid down in grass, did not come within the statutory exception of "bleaching greens."

Valuation roll—Resolution of county council—"Regulation"—Approval of Treasury—Local Government Act, 1889, sec. 83.

Sec. 83 of the Local Government Act, 1889, provides that "where the assessor is an officer of Inland Revenue, any regulations made by the county council with respect to his duties shall be subject to the approval of the Treasury." A county council passed a resolution that the valuation roll of the county should be printed for a period of five years. Held that this resolution and the subsequent instruction to the assessor to have the valuation roll printed did not amount to a "regulation" in the sense of the above-quoted section.

After the passing of the Local Government Act, 1889, but before the date at which the Act came into operation, the Board of Supervision recalled a determination with respect to the territories of certain local authorities, issued by the Board under the Public Health Act, 1867, thereby depriving the defenders of a right to claim partial exemption from assessment to which they would otherwise have been entitled. Held that the recall must receive effect.

Held that the powers conferred by the Edinburgh Provisional Order, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 58), on the magistrates of Edinburgh to make bye-laws for omnibuses and other carriages for the conveyance of passengers extended to the regulation of all omnibuses and other public carriages running within the burgh, though on their way to or from places beyond the jurisdiction of the magistrates.

Held that the Motor Car Act has not superseded the said sections of the Burgh Police Act as regards motors plying for hire, and that it was competent for the defenders to make bye-laws requiring persons in charge of motor omnibuses plying for hire partly, though not wholly, within their jurisdiction to obtain licences from them.

Motor car traffic—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 270—Applicability.

Sec. 270 of the Burgh Police Act, 1892, authorises magistrates to license "hackney coaches, omnibuses, or carriages of any kind or description, adapted to the carriage of persons," to ply for hire. Question, whether bye-laws made under this section were applicable to the case of motor cars.

Omnibus traffic—General Police Act, 1862, sec. 309—Standing and starting of omnibuses.

The magistrates of a burgh, in virtue of the powers conferred by sec. 309 of the General Police Act, 1862, enacted a bye-law for the regulation of omnibuses, which enacted that "all omnibuses shall stand in and depart from County Square." Held that, although the magistrates might fix by a bye-law a stance at which omnibuses should stand, and from which they should start, it was ultra vires to compel all omnibuses to stand at the stance so fixed before starting when the proprietors desired that they should start from another place.

Edinburgh Municipal and Police Amendment Act, 1901 (54 & 55 Vict. c. cxxxvi.), sec. 65.

By sec. 65 of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Amendment Act, 1901, the magistrates and council are empowered to make bye-laws for the regulation of omnibus traffic within the city. A bye-law was passed prohibiting drivers and conductors of omnibuses from delivering bills or canvassing for passengers. Held that the bye-law must be read in the light of the circumstances to which it was meant to apply, and that, being one of a series of bye-laws for regulating omnibus traffic, it was to be read as applying only to such traffic in the streets, and that, so read, it was not ultra vires.

Regulation of hackney carriages — Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. cxxxii.), sec. 304.

Sec. 304 of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879, empowers the magistrates to make "orders and bye-laws" for (1) regulating the conduct of owners and drivers of hackney carriages, and (2) regulating all matters relating to the safety, comfort, or convenience of persons hiring or using hackney carriages and of the public. The magistrates issued a bye-law in the following terms:—"The driver of a hackney carriage shall not stand with the same longer than is necessary for taking up or setting down passengers on any part of the public streets not allotted as a hackney carriage stance, except at the dismissal of the theatres, assemblies, public meetings, and the like." A hackney cab driver, upon orders from the manager of the hotel, drove to a hotel and then awaited a hire. He waited an hour without getting a hire, and was then discharged by the boots of the hotel. Held that the bye-law was not ultra vires of the magistrates, and that the cab driver was rightly convicted of having contravened it.

Lights on vehicles — Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878, sec. 104.

The Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878, sec. 104, empowers road trustees to make bye-laws with respect to any road within their jurisdiction, inter alia, "for the general regulation of traffic on highways." Held that a bye-law requiring vehicles to exhibit lights at night was within the powers conferred by the above enactment.

Use of locomotives on highway—Effect of confirmation by Secretary of State—Locomotives Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1878, secs. 6 and 7.

By sec. 6 of the Locomotives Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1878, the road authority is given power to make bye-laws for regulating the use of locomotives upon highways. By sec. 7 the sanction of the Secretary of State is necessary for the validity of such bye-laws. Held that it was not ultra vires of road trustees to make bye-laws affecting the construction of conveyances attached to locomotives, having regard to the special circumstances of the roads with which they were concerned.

Opinion (per Lord McLaren) that the Court had no power to review bye-laws framed by road trustees when confirmed by the Secretary of State in terms of the Act, and that this confirmation gave them the authority of an Act of Parliament.

General order—Ultra vires.

The road trustees for the county of Aberdeen made a bye-law prohibiting any wagon drawn by a locomotive carrying more than five tons on any road within their jurisdiction, except with the consent of the surveyor. Held that the bye-law was ultra vires, as sec. 6 of the Locomotives Amendment Act, 1878, authorised bye-laws for exceptional cases only.

Necessity of setting forth Act under which bye-law passed—Locomotives Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1878, sec. 8.

A bridge on a highway may be closed for locomotive traffic by the road authorities of the district by a bye-law relating to it passed under the powers given by the Locomotives Amendment Act, 1878, and, after the advertisement specified in that Act, duly confirmed; and, therefore, a complaint alleging a contravention of such bye-law does not require to libel the Locomotive Act, 1861, or to set forth that, as required by sec. 6 of that Act, a notice was placed at the bridge itself that it was insufficient for the ordinary traffic of the district.

Enforcement—Traffic regulations—General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862, sec. 308.

Sec. 308 of the General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862, empowers magistrates to make bye-laws "for regulating the conduct of the proprietors and drivers of hackney carriages plying within such prescribed distance in their several employments . . ." The magistrates of Leith made a bye-law in the following terms:—"Every driver shall, during the hours of divine service on Sundays, or other days set apart for public worship by lawful authority, drive at a walking pace while passing any place of public worship." Held that this bye-law only applied to drivers of hackney carriages which were licensed in Leith and that it was ultra vires of the magistrates to attempt to enforce it against the driver of a hackney carriage which was licensed in Edinburgh.

Reasonableness—Tramway regulations.

A tramway company issued a bye-law to the effect that passengers on a journey, part of which was performed in one of their omnibuses, and the latter part in a tramway car, should have the ticket for the whole distance checked at the place where the change from one vehicle to the other was made. A person who was aware of this bye-law took a ticket for the whole journey, but did not, though warned to do so, have it checked. The tramway conductor refused to accept the unchecked ticket and demanded the fare applicable to the tramway part of the journey. This was refused, and the passenger was subsequently taken in charge by the police. Held that the bye-law was a reasonable one, and that the passenger, who was aware of it, was bound to conform to it.

(211)

Regulations made under statutory powers—Secretary for Scotland—Direction that regulation to be laid before Parliament—Effect of non-compliance with direction—Locomotives on Highways Act, 1896, sec. 6.

Held that in a prosecution for a contravention of a regulation made by the Secretary for Scotland in virtue of sec. 6 of the Locomotives on Highways Act, 1896, it is not incumbent on the prosecutor to prove that the regulation has been laid before Parliament. Held, further, that a prosecution is competent even if the regulation has not been laid before Parliament, in respect that the enactment does not import that presentation to Parliament is a condition precedent of the regulation coming into force.

Order—Ultra vires — Permanent regulations—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 385.

Under sec. 385 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, the magistrates of a burgh may make "bye-laws and issue notices and orders," inter alia, "regulating the traffic, or any particular traffic, in streets within the burgh." The Act further provides that such bye-laws shall be confirmed by the sheriff and the Secretary for Scotland, but contains no such provision with regard to notices and orders. Held that an "order," made by magistrates in pursuance of this section, by which omnibuses were forbidden to turn in certain streets of the burgh was invalid, in respect that, as the regulation was intended to be permanent, it could be competently made only by bye-law.

Ice-cream and aerated water shops—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, secs. 316, 317 and 318—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903, sec. 82—Ultra vires.

By secs. 316, 317 and 318 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, and sec. 82 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903, town councils are empowered "to make bye-laws in regard to the hours of opening and closing" of ice-cream and aerated water shops, "the hours for business not being more restricted than fifteen hours daily." The town council of Partick passed a bye-law prohibiting ice-cream and aerated water shops in the burgh from being open except between seven o'clock in the morning and ten o'clock at night. Certain ice-cream dealers in the burgh brought an action for reduction of the bye-law on the ground that the bye-law did not give them the statutory minimum of fifteen "hours of business." Held that the bye-law was not ultra vires or unreasonable and that the Court had no power to interfere with what the town council had done in the bona fide exercise of their discretion.

—Respective powers of town and county councils to make bye-laws and impose penalties—Burgh Police (Scotland) Acts, 1892, 1903 and 1911—Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, sec. 57.

Held that, whereas under the Burgh Police (Scotland) Acts, 1892, 1903 and 1911, town councils are empowered to make bye-laws in regard to the hours of opening and closing ice-cream shops and other places of public refreshment in burghs, and to impose a penalty not exceeding forty shillings for each breach, county councils under the same Acts and under the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, may make similar bye-laws for counties, and may impose a penalty not exceeding £5 for infringement.

—Conditions attached to licence—Ultra vires—Edinburgh Corporation Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. cxxxiii.), sec. 80.

By sec. 80 of the Edinburgh Corporation Act, 1900, as amended by sec. 57 of the Edinburgh Corporation Order, 1901, the magistrates were empowered to grant licences to persons selling ice-cream, and any person selling ice-cream at a place or time not authorised by the magistrates was subjected to a penalty. The magistrates proposed that the licences issued by them should contain certain restrictions regarding the times and occasions upon which premises might be kept open or ice-cream sold, and should also contain a power to the magistrates to suspend or revoke licences granted by them at any time. Held in an action for a declarator that the magistrates were not entitled under the Act to issue licences containing the above conditions, that it was ultra vires of the magistrates to insert the conditions in the licences issued by them.

Rossi v Magistrates of Edinburgh, 1904, 7 F. (H.L.) 85; [1905] A.C. 21; 42 S.L.R. 79; 12 S.L.T. 435.

Licensing regulations—Hours of opening and closing licensed premises—Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862, sec. 2—Ultra vires.

The Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862, contains in a schedule forms of certificates for the sale of exciseable liquors which specify the hours of opening and closing to be 8 a.m. and 11 p.m. respectively. By sec. 2 it is provided "that in any particular locality within any county or district or burgh requiring other hours for opening and closing . . . than those specified in the forms of certificates in said schedule applicable thereto, it shall be lawful for such justices or magistrates respectively to insert in such certificates such other hours, not being earlier than six of the clock or later than eight of the clock in the morning for opening, or earlier than nine of the clock or later than eleven of the clock in the evening for closing the same, as they shall think fit."

The magistrates of a certain burgh passed a general resolution that in a particular locality within the burgh, which included all the hotels and public-houses within the burgh, the hours of closing should be ten o'clock, and granted certificates accordingly. Held that the magistrates had only power to alter the general rule laid down by the schedule in exceptional cases and in particular portions of the district under their control, and that they had accordingly acted ultra vires in changing the statutory hours of closing all the licensed houses in the burgh, and remit made to the clerk to alter the certificates in accordance with the schedule.

—Order by Secretary for Scotland—Ultra vires—Public-house—Jurisdiction—Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, sec. 109.

The Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, which repeals all previous Licensing Acts, came into force on 1st January, 1904. The Act, by sec. 109, provides that the Secretary for Scotland may, by order before the date of the first general half-yearly meeting of a licensing court constituted by the Act, prescribe the statutory duties to be performed before such date by members and clerks of such courts, and otherwise provide for bringing the Act into full operation, and that any such order shall have effect as if enacted in the Act. The Licensing (Scotland) Act (Interim Provisions) Order, 1903, issued by the Secretary for Scotland on 21st December, 1903, under sec. 109 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, enacts—Sec. 2. "No justice or magistrate shall after the 31st day of December, 1903, exercise any powers of trying offences vested in a justice or justices or in a magistrate or magistrates under the existing Acts." A publican was charged in a justice of peace court with a breach of his certificate alleged to have been committed on 5th December, 1903. The complaint was presented on 30th and served on 31st December, 1903. It was called on 11th January, 1904, and was tried on 28th January, 1904, on which latter date the accused was convicted of the contravention charged. Held that sec. 2 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act (Interim Provisions) Order, 1903, issued by the Secretary for Scotland, was not ultra vires, and that in view of its terms the justices had no jurisdiction to try and convict the accused in January, 1904, for an offence against the Licensing Acts in force in December, 1903.

—Order of Central Control Board (Liquor Traffic)—Ultra vires—Statutory order imposing penalty of imprisonment on master for crime of servant.

An order of a board, acting under statutory authority, made it a criminal offence, involving a maximum penalty of six months' imprisonment, with hard labour, for a publican either himself or "by any servant" to supply liquor after certain hours. Held that the order was not ultra vires, although it imposed a severe penalty on one who was not the actual wrongdoer.

Sub-sec. (2) of sec. 1 of the Defence of the Realm (Amendment) Act, 1915, gives power to His Majesty in Council to issue regulations for giving prescribed Government authorities right to regulate the power of "selling or supplying or controlling the sale or supply of" intoxicating liquor. Regulation 2 of the Defence of the Realm (Liquor Control) Regulations, 1915, was pronounced as an Order in Council under the above power, and prohibited the sale or supply of intoxicating liquor in certain circumstances in any area to which the regulations were applied. In pursuance of this Order in Council the central control board of a certain area pronounced an order prohibiting, inter alia, "consumption" of spirits in licensed premises or clubs. Held that the regulation above referred to did not confer on the central control board power to prohibit the consumption in licensed premises of liquor obtained by the consumer elsewhere.

Question, whether the order pronounced was intra vires of the central control board.

5. EDUCATION.

(222)

Deliverances of Board of Education—Ultra vires—Education Act, 1872, sec. 9.

Sec. 9 of the Education Act of 1872 enacts that "any question or dispute regarding the area of any parish or burgh for the purposes of this Act shall be settled by the Board of Education, or by the sheriff of the county in which the same or the greater part thereof is situated, on an application by the school board authorised by the Board of Education, and the determination of the Board of Education or of the sheriff, as the case may be, shall be final." In a question between two parishes, in one of which a school board had not been constituted at the date of the deliverance, the Board of Education made a deliverance under this section. Held (1) that the deliverance was not final, as all parties interested had not been heard, and (2) that the Court could not pronounce upon the merits of the question, the decision of it being exclusively committed to the Board of Education or the sheriff.

Ordinances of statutory commissioners—Procedure—Ultra vires—Universities (Scotland) Act, 1889, secs. 15, 16, 19, and 20.

Sec. 15 of the Universities (Scotland) Act, 1889, permits the commissioners appointed under the Act "to make ordinances to extend any of the universities by affiliating colleges to them." Sec. 16 gave the commissioners power under certain conditions to affiliate the University College, Dundee, with the University of St. Andrews. Secs. 19 and 20 regulate the procedure to be followed by the commissioners in issuing ordinances. The commissioners issued an ordinance under sec. 16, but did not follow the procedure laid down in secs. 19 and 20. Held that the ordinances so pronounced were ultra vires and fell to be reduced.

Harbour commissioners—Harbours, Docks and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, secs. 33 and 83—Ultra vires.

Sec. 83 of the Harbours, Docks and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, enacts that harbour commissioners "may from time to time make such bye-laws as they shall think fit for all or any of the following purposes:—That is to say . . . for regulating the use of the harbour, dock or pier . . . Provided always that such bye-laws shall not be repugnant to the laws of that part of the United Kingdom where the same are to have effect, or the provisions of this or the special Act." Harbour commissioners passed a bye-law prohibiting steamers from certain ports from landing passengers on Sunday. Bye-law reduced (1) as inconsistent with the provisions of sec. 33 of the Harbours, Docks and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, which provided that, upon the payment of rates, &c., the harbour, dock and pier should be open to all persons for the shipping and unshipping of goods and the embarking and landing of passengers; and (2) as ultra vires in respect that it differentiated between different ports.

Sec. 93 of the Greenock Port and Harbours Act, 1866, authorises the harbour trustees to make bye-laws, inter alia, "for regulating the conduct of the owners, masters, and crews of vessels propelled by steam with regard to the rate of speed at which they may proceed within the port and harbours." Sec. 83 of the Harbours, Docks and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, authorises harbour trustees to make bye-laws for the purpose of "preventing damage or injury to any vessel or goods within the harbour or dock, or at or near the pier." The Greenock Harbour Trustees made a bye-law for the purpose of regulating the speed of vessels in the fairway of the navigable stream of the river Clyde ex adverso of the harbour works. Held that as the fairway of the navigable channel of the river Clyde ex adverso of the harbour works was not within the harbour, the bye-law was ultra vires of the trustees.

7. NUISANCES AND OFFENSIVE TRADES.

(233)

Ultra vires—Nuisance—Billsticking—Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, sec. 57.

Sec. 57 of the Local Government Act, 1889, empowers county councils to make bye-laws "for the administration of the affairs of the county, for the prevention of vagrancy, and for prevention and suppression of nuisances not already punishable in a summary manner by virtue of any Act in force throughout the county . . ." A county council made a bye-law imposing penalties upon any person who, inter alia, "affixes or causes to be affixed . . . without the consent of the owner or occupier, to any other building, or to any wall, fence, hoarding, door, gate, pillar, post, tree, or notice board lawfully exhibited, any bill or other notice." Held that billsticking is not necessarily a nuisance, and that, accordingly, the terms of the bye-law were too wide, and that it was ultra vires of the county council.

——— Public health — Offensive trades — Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897, secs. 32 (3) and 185.

A local authority acting under sec. 32 (3) of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897, made the following bye-laws:—“(1) Every tallow melter shall cause all material used, or offensive material or refuse from the boiling pans, and all refuse, residue, or other matter from which any offensive effluvia, vapour, or gas is evolved, or is liable to be evolved, to be placed in properly closed receptacles, or to be otherwise dealt with in such manner as to prevent any such effluvia, vapour, or gas escaping into the external atmosphere. (2) Every tallow melter shall cause every process of his business in which any offensive effluvia, vapour, or gas is generated to be carried on in such manner that no offensive effluvia, vapour, or gas shall escape into the external air; and he shall cause all such offensive effluvia, vapour, or gas to be effectually destroyed.” Those bye-laws were duly confirmed by the Local Government Board. Held (1) that the bye-laws, being in conformity with the purposes of the statute were not invalid in respect of their being repugnant to the general law of Scotland; (2) that they were not unreasonable; (3) that they were not invalid in respect that they regulated matters regarding which there was already specific provision in the statute; and (4) that they were not ultra vires as being beyond the powers conferred by sec. 32 (3).

——— Reasonableness — Nuisance—Animal matter as manure—Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, sec. 57 (1).

The Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, sec. 57 (1), gives power to a county council, under certain conditions, to make bye-laws for the “prevention and suppression of nuisances not already punishable in a summary manner by virtue of an Act in force throughout the county.” No. 3 of a series of bye-laws passed by a county council, for “regulating the application of animal matter to land as a fertilising agent,” provided “no flesh or offal shall be applied to land as a top dressing.” “Top dressing” was defined (bye-law No. 1) as “the application of flesh, blood, and offal which have not been mixed with other material or treated in such a way as to prevent the exhalation of noxious smells therefrom, to land as fertilising agents by merely applying those to the surface of the ground without afterwards ploughing or digging them into the ground.” Held that bye-law No. 3 was ultra vires of the county council, in respect that in itself it was too absolute in its terms, and amounted to an unreasonable restriction on agriculture, and that, if read along with bye-law No. 1, it was too vague for enforcement.

——— Reasonableness—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 316, A (1)—Nuisance.

In virtue of powers conferred by the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 316, on commissioners of burghs to make bye-laws for the prevention of nuisances, the commissioners of a burgh passed a bye-law that “no person shall convey material of any description along the streets or courts in the burgh in carts or carriages so loaded that any part of the load fall on any street or court within the burgh.” Held that the bye-law was not invalid as being ultra vires or unreasonable.

9. CLASSIFICATION OF LANDS FOR POOR RATE.

Classification of lands by parochial boards.—Jurisdiction of Court of Session—Powers of Board of Supervision—Poor Law Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1845, sec. 36.

Held that while the Court had no jurisdiction to set aside a classification of lands and heritages for occupants' rates, under sec. 36 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1845, on the ground that it was inequitable, or to order a parochial board to adopt a new classification, it had jurisdiction to declare a classification to be invalid on the ground that it was not exhaustive of the lands and heritages in the parish.

Opinion that the Board of Supervision, which has power under the statute to give or refuse assent to classifications, is not entitled to initiate proposals with regard to classifications, but may only use its discretion in approving or rejecting schemes submitted to it by parochial boards.

Abandonment of classification — Approval of Board of Supervision—Poor Law Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1845, secs. 34 and 36—Poor Assessments Act, 1861, sec. 1.

Held that a parochial board, which had, under sec. 36 of the Poor Law Act, 1845, with the concurrence of the Board of Supervision, adopted, for purposes of assessment to poor rates, a classification of lands and heritages, was entitled to abandon the classification without obtaining the concurrence of the Board of Supervision.

(240)

Fishery Board — Ultra vires — Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889, sec. 7.

Sec. 7 of the Herring Fishery Act, 1889, enacts that "the Fishery Board may, by bye-law or bye-laws, direct that the methods of fishing known as beam-trawling and otter-trawling shall not be used within a line drawn from Duncansby Head, in Caithness-shire, to Rattray Point, in Aberdeenshire, in any area or areas to be defined in such bye-law." Held (overruling Green v Leith, 1896, 23 R. (J.) 50) that it was within the powers of the Fishery Board to issue a bye-law prohibiting beam-trawling in the entire area within the lines specified in the section.

Bye-law imposing penalties for fishing outside the three-mile limit — Foreign vessel — Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889 — Sea Fisheries Regulation (Scotland) Act, 1895 — Bye-law of Fishery Board for Scotland.

A foreigner objected to the jurisdiction of the Scottish courts and to the validity of a bye-law in a prosecution in which he was charged with fishing within an area defined by bye-law in accordance with the powers conferred upon the Fishery Board for Scotland by the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889. Part of the said area was outside the three-mile territorial limit but was in the Moray Firth within a line drawn from Duncansby Head to Rattray Point. Held that the Moray Firth being within territorial waters, notwithstanding that part of it is situated outside the three-mile limit, foreigners were bound by the aforesaid bye-law and were, accordingly, in prosecutions arising thereunder, subject to the jurisdiction of the Scottish courts.

12. BETTING.

(242)

County council—Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, sec. 57 (1)—Ultra vires.

Sec. 57, sub-sec. (1), of the Local Government Act, 1889, gives the county council power to make bye-laws "for the administration of the affairs of the county, for the prevention of vagrancy, and for prevention and suppression of nuisances not already punishable in a summary manner by virtue of any Act in force throughout the county," and to enforce these bye-laws by penalties. A bye-law was made by a county council forbidding persons to frequent or use roads or public places "for the purpose of book-making or betting, or wagering, or agreeing to bet or wager with any person, or paying or receiving or settling bets." Held that the words "for the administration of the affairs of the county" were wide enough to cover this bye-law, and that it was, accordingly, not ultra vires.

Secretary for Scotland—Ultra vires—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 45.

Under sec. 45 of the Burgh Police Act, 1892, the commissioners are empowered to apply to the Secretary for Scotland for a provisional order for certain purposes. Where the boundaries of a burgh had been extended the magistrates applied to the Secretary for Scotland for a provisional order to enable them to communicate the benefit of the common good belonging to the old burgh to the extended burgh. Opinions that such an application was not contemplated by the section above referred to, and that it was not competent for the Secretary of Scotland to grant it.

Interdict—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, secs. 45 and 46.

In an application for a provisional order embracing two proposals, the Secretary for Scotland directed the sheriff to hold an inquiry. In a note of suspension and interdict the Court, sitting in the Bill Chamber, having held that the note should be passed to have the competency of one of the proposals determined, granted interim interdict against the inquiry proceeding to any extent, on the ground that a limited inquiry would be different from that ordered.

14. MISCELLANEOUS.

Vaccination—Regulations by Board of Supervision—Ultra vires—Vaccination (Scotland) Act, 1863.

By sec. 5 of the Vaccination Act, 1863, the Board of Supervision (afterwards the Local Government Board) is "authorised and required to make and issue regulations to which parochial boards must conform." Sec. 13 provides for the issue every six months by the registrar of each district to inspectors of poor of lists of names and addresses of persons who have failed to lodge certificates of vaccination under the Act, upon receipt of which lists the inspectors of poor were instructed to lay them before parochial boards which thereupon were to issue a vaccination order upon the persons named in the list. The Board of Supervision issued regulations regarding proceedings under the 18th section of the Act, in which it was provided that if any child named in the list had left the parish and gone to reside elsewhere in Scotland before a vaccination order had been pronounced, the inspector of poor should give immediate notice of the facts and circumstances to the inspector of poor of the parish to which the child had gone, whose duty it would then be to arrange for the child's vaccination. Held that this regulation, which had been in operation since the year 1864, was not ultra vires of the Board of Supervision.

National Health Insurance—Regulations made by Commissioners—Regulations not submitted to Parliament—Jurisdiction of Court—National Insurance Act, 1911, sec. 65.

Sec. 65 of the National Insurance Act, 1911, authorises the Insurance Commissioners to make regulations to carry into effect part I. of the Act, and provides that such regulations shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament, and shall have effect as if enacted in the Act, unless annulled by His Majesty in Council on an address presented by either House. Held that regulations made by the Commissioners which had not yet been laid before Parliament, could not be challenged in a court of law as being ultra vires of the Commissioners, provided they dealt with matters falling within the scope of part I. of the Act, but could be set aside only by means of the parliamentary procedure prescribed in the section.

Patent agents—Registration—Rules of Board of Trade—Ultra vires—Rules under Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Acts, 1883 and 1888—Parliamentary confirmation—Tax.

Under the Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Acts, 1883 and 1888, the Board of Trade had power to make general rules regulating the registration of patent agents. These rules were to be laid before Parliament, and, if not annulled, were to be of the same effect as if contained in the Act. The Board of Trade made certain rules known as the "Register of Patent Agents' Rules, 1889," which were laid before Parliament, and were not annulled. They provided a mode by which a patent agent practising before the Act should be entered in the register of patent agents on proving to the satisfaction of the Board of Trade that he had bona fide practised before the Act. They also provided for the payment of a fee of £5 5s. on being entered on the register, and of an annual fee of £3 3s. by all patent agents on the register, and for erasure of the name from the register if these were not duly paid. The Second Division (1893, 20 R. 315) held that the rules imposing fees were ultra vires of the Board of Trade, since they imposed, without statutory authority, a tax as a condition of the right to be on the register. In an appeal opinions (the judgment proceeding on another ground) that the rules were ultra vires of the Board of Trade.

Opinions (per Lord Herschell, L.C., Lord Watson, and Lord Russell of Killowen) that by sec. 101 of the Act of 1883 the rules formed part of the statute, and that it was not competent for any court of law to entertain any question as to their validity.

Opinion (per Lord Morris) that the rules had only statutory effect in so far as they were made "for giving effect" to sec. 1 of the Act of 1888, and that the question whether they were so might competently be raised in and determined by a court of law.

Chartered Institute of Patent Agents v Lockwood, 1894, 21 R. (H.L.) 61; [1894] A.C. 347; 11 R.P.C. 374; 31 S.L.R. 942; 2 S.L.T. 106.

Rules of Volunteer corps—Ultra vires—Retrospective or prospective—Volunteer Act, 1863, sec. 24.

The rules of a volunteer corps, made in terms of the Volunteer Act, 1863, were dated 26th March, 1885, and provided, inter alia, that subscriptions of members to the regimental funds should fall due on the 31st October in each year for the twelve months preceding; and that all members of the corps should be liable for the full year's subscription, provided they had been members of the corps for one calendar month of the year. Held that the passing of rules regulating the raising of subscriptions was authorised by the statute, and that a subscription was due for the year ending 31st October, 1885, although four months of that year had elapsed when the rules were made.

In an appeal against a conviction under a summary complaint charging an offence against the Shop Hours Act, 1904, and a duly confirmed order purporting to have been made thereunder, held that the sheriff at the trial under the complaint had rightly excluded evidence to prove that certain steps preliminary to the making of the order had not been taken as required by the Act.

A complaint charged a person with a contravention of "the Foot-and-Mouth Disease Order of 1892, and the Regulations of the Local Authority of the County of Caithness, dated 9th March, 1892." Held that the order and regulations following thereon having the force of an Act of Parliament, and there being no dispute as to their terms, they need not be proved as matter of evidence.

STOCK EXCHANGE.

Right to close customer's account by selling out against him, where customer has misrepresented means.

Held that where a stockbroker has incurred personal responsibility by purchasing stock for a client on the faith of representations made by him as to his means, which proved not to be correct, and the client has refused to give satisfactory explanations or references, the stockbroker is entitled to realise the stock held for his client, and close the account.

Carrying over.

An ordinary contract for settlement on a day named does not imply either a right in or an obligation on the broker or dealer to "carry over."

Newton v Cribbes, 1884, 11 R. 554.

Implied authority to carry over.

Circumstances in which held that a stockbroker had implied authority to carry over certain shares which he had purchased for a client.

Lamond, Macquisten & Co. v Inglis, (O.H.) 1903, 11 S.L.T. 10.

Retention—Stockbroker's right to retain share transfer in security of general balance due by client.

Held that a firm of stockbrokers in Edinburgh had a general lien on an uncompleted share transfer, handed to them for delivery to a client who had purchased and paid for the shares, which entitled them to retain the transfer until a claim by them against the client, arising out of a subsequent broking transaction between them, had been satisfied.

Agent and principal—Dealings between stockbrokers—Bankruptcy.

Stockbrokers in Edinburgh wrote to stockbrokers in Glasgow requesting them to buy certain shares for them. The latter, in reply, wrote that they had purchased the shares "on your order and on your account." The name of a client as transferee was subsequently sent by the brokers in Edinburgh to the brokers in Glasgow, that the transfer might be made out in time for settling day. It was so completed and transmitted to the Edinburgh brokers, who delivered it to the transferee, and in exchange got his cheque for the amount of price, commission, &c. The Edinburgh brokers then granted their own cheque for a sum in excess of the price of the shares, so as to cover a balance then standing against them, and delivered it to the Glasgow brokers. Before payment the Edinburgh brokers failed, their client's cheque remaining in their hands uncashed, and their estates were afterwards sequestrated. Held that the Edinburgh brokers had bought the shares as principals and not as agents, and that the Glasgow brokers had no claim but as ordinary creditors.

Contract for differences.

A stockbroker, in carrying over at the settlement £10,000 "Trunk Thirds" stock bought for a client, sent his client a continuation note in these terms—"I have continued for you as under. Sold 10,000 Trunk 3rds at £50 3s. 3d. com. in a/c." In reality the broker had not bought that amount of stock at the price stated, but had bought a much larger quantity in different parcels and at different prices. These he lumped together and divided among those of his clients who had given him orders for Trunk Thirds, charging as the price the average of the different prices. This average price was that stated in the above continuation notes, and it corresponded to none of the individual prices. In an action by the stockbroker against the client for payment of the differences on a series of such transactions, held that in so purchasing the stock the pursuer was to be regarded as having bought it on his own account, and not as agent for the defender, and that the defender, having employed the pursuer merely as a broker, was not responsible, no special custom of trade in regard to brokers on the Stock Exchange having been averred or proved.

Agent taking up shares—Custom of Stock Exchange.

Held that on a client refusing to pay to his stockbroker a balance due in respect of the purchase and carrying over of certain shares the stockbrokers were entitled, after intimation of their intention to take that course, to take over the shares themselves at a price fixed in accordance with the rules of the Stock Exchange.

Lamont, Macquisten & Co. v Inglis, (O.H.) 1903, 11 S.L.T. 10.

(8)

Purchase of shares—Privity of contract.

Held that a stockbroker who had instructions from a number of customers to buy the same class of shares was entitled to purchase them all in the same transaction, and afterwards allocate them, and that he was not bound to establish a privity of contract between each client and some one selling to him.

Lamond, Macquisten & Co. v Inglis, (O.H.)
1903, 11 S.L.T. 10.

(9)

—Compensation.

The rule that a purchaser of goods from one whom he knows to be acting as agent for another, whose name is not disclosed, cannot plead compensation in respect of a debt due to him by the agent against a demand by the principal for the price of the goods, held to apply to a transaction on the stock exchange.

Matthews v Auld & Guild, 1873, 1 R.

(10)

A law agent bought shares in his own name on the employment of a person who neither paid for the shares nor would give instructions for re-selling them on the settling day. The agent, after giving notice that he would sell the shares, carried them over in his own name through his London brokers, and some time afterwards sold them without loss. He then claimed the difference between the price at which he had purchased the shares for his principal and the market price on the settling day. The claim was disallowed, on the ground that the claimant could not, while acting as agent for the owner of the shares, become the purchaser thereof, and that no loss had accrued upon the transaction.

Cunningham v Lee, 1874, 2 R. 83; 12

(11)

Concealment by constituent of material fact.

Where a mistake on the part of the stock-broker, occasioned by his employer having failed to disclose a material fact of which he knew that the broker was ignorant, led to loss, held, in the circumstances, that the employer was liable in the price of the stock and the broker's commission.

Mackenzie v Blakeney, 1879, 6 R. 1329;

(12)

Expulsion of member—Rule of Stock Exchange—Breach—Arrangement with creditors—Disqualification by interest of members of committee.

A rule of a stock exchange provided that, when a member made any "arrangement" with his Stock Exchange creditors, the committee should be entitled after certain procedure, if they saw fit, to declare him to be no longer a member. A member who had large liabilities agreed to settle these by paying differences on the next settlement day as at the date of the agreement, and these payments were duly made. Held (by the First Division) that this was not an "arrangement" in the sense of the rule. Opinions that a decision of the committee on the matter was not challengeable on the ground that members of the committee were parties to the "arrangement."

Filshill v Glasgow Stock Exchange Association, 1915, 1 S.L.T. 314. The House of Lords reversed the interlocutor of the First Division, allowed the pursuer to amend his record, and allowed a proof, 1915, 2 S.L.T. 115.

I. SUCCESSION AB INTESTATO.

1. ORDER OF LEGAL SUCCESSION.

(1)

Widow.

A widow is not one of her husband's heirs in mobilibus, and accordingly has no right to a share of a legacy left to such heirs.

Inglis v Inglis, 1869, 7 M. 435; 41 J. 234; 6 S.L.R. 271.

Intestate Husband's Estate (Scotland) Act, 1911, secs. 1 and 2—Partial intestacy.

The Intestate Husband's Estate Act, 1911, does not apply to cases of partial intestacy. Held, accordingly, that a widow was not entitled, under sec. 2 of that Act, to payment of £500 out of the residue of the estate of her husband who had died leaving a will which purported to dispose of his whole estate, but which, in the event which happened, had left the fee of the residue undisposed of.

Nephews and nieces—Per capita or per stirpes.

When the nearest surviving relations of an intestate are his nephew and nieces, the intestate succession falls to be divided among them in their own right as his next of kin per capita, and not as representatives of their deceased parents per stirpes.

Observed that the representation in moveables introduced by the Intestate Moveable Succession Act, 1855, sec. 1, applies only to the case where some of the next of kin have predeceased the intestate leaving issue, who but for the remedy provided by the statute would have been excluded from participating in the succession.

Turner, 1869, 8 M. 222; 42 J. 97; 7 S.L.R. 130.

Period when heirs determined—Resulting intestacy.

Where intestacy results from the failure of a testamentary provision, the persons entitled to take are the heirs ab intestato of the testator at the time of his death.

Heir at law—Accumulations struck at by Thellusson Act.

Trustees were directed to accumulate the rents of certain lands until the death of the last survivor of several persons, and on that event to purchase with the accumulated fund lands to be entailed, along with the original lands, on a series of heirs described. The accumulation having been stopped by operation of the Thellusson Act, and the future rents accruing until the entail came to be executed having been held to fall into intestacy, held further that each term's rent as it accrued belonged to the person holding at that time the character of heir at law of the testator.

Heir at law—Heirs in mobilibus—Accumulations struck at by Thellusson Act falling into intestacy.

Heir at law or heirs in mobilibus—Testator directing lands to be sold—Resulting partial intestacy.

Thomas v Tennent's Trustees, 1868, 7 M. 114; 41 J. 59; 6 S.L.R. 113, No. 895, infra.

Heritage—Right of succession—Alien ancestor—Papist ancestor.

Opinion (per Lord Justice-Clerk Patton) (1) that a right of succession to landed estates in Scotland might be transmitted through an alien who died prior to the passing of the Aliens Act, 1844 (now repealed by the Naturalization Act, 1870, sec. 18); and (2) that to establish the incapacity of a Papist to inherit landed estates in Scotland, under the Act 1700, c. 3, required a declarator of irritancy and the completion of a title by the next Protestant heir.

Earl of Perth v Lady Willoughby de Eresby's Trustees, 1869, 7 M. 642; 41 J. 413; 6 S.L.R. 335.

Intestate Moveable Succession Act, 1855—Representatives of grandaunt.

A man who died intestate leaving moveable property was survived by the children of a paternal granduncle and the grandchildren of a paternal grandaunt. The father of these grandchildren, who was the son of the grandaunt, had predeceased the intestate. Held that the children of the granduncle were entitled to succeed to the whole moveable property, as the grandchildren of the grandaunt did not represent their father under sec. 1 of the Intestate Moveable Succession Act, 1855.

Macmillan v Macmillan, (O.H.) 1909, 1 S.L.T. 35.

(10)
—Nephews and nieces consanguinean.

The issue of nephews and nieces consanguinean take by representation in terms of sec. 1 of the Intestate Moveable Succession Act, 1855.

Finlayson's Executor v Hastie, (O.H.) 1916, 1 S.L.T. 123.

Heirs-portioners — Præcipuum — Mansion-house — Necessary adjuncts — Subjects conducive merely to amenity—Ornamental grass parks.

Where the mansion-house of a landed estate falls to the eldest of heirs-portioners as a præcipuum, it carries with it such additional subjects only as are necessary adjuncts of the mansion; and, in determining what adjuncts are necessary, the amenity of the mansion is not an element which can be taken into consideration. Ornamental grazing parks, extending to about 25 acres, which enhanced the beauty and privacy of a mansion-house, but which had at times been let separately to outside tenants, held not to form part of the præcipuum.

Callander v Harvey, 1916 S.C. 420; 53 S.L.R. 344; 1916, 1 S.L.T. 176.

Limitation of liability for ancestor's debts —Transmission to heir of personal obligation in heritable bond over heritage—Act 1874, secs. 12 and 47.

A, who was personally liable under bonds affecting his heritable estate for payment of the sums thereby secured, died leaving a disposition and settlement, whereby he disposed his whole estate, real and personal, to B, whom he appointed his executor and universal legatee. Held that under the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, secs. 12 and 47, the personal obligation contained in the bonds transmitted against B, but that his liability for the debts of the deceased (including the bonds) was limited to the value of the estate to which he succeeded.

Lease excluding assignees.

A nineteen years' lease of an urban subject was granted to a tenant and his heirs, but excluding assignees and sub-tenants without the consent of the lessor. On the death of the tenant, his heir took up the lease. Held that the heir did not incur passive representation for the debts of his predecessor, in respect that he took the lease, not as representing his ancestor, but in his own right under the lease.

Bain v Mackenzie, 1896, 23 R. 528; 33 S.L.R. 375; 3 S.L.T. 283.

Heir not renouncing succession—Estate adjudged.

Question, whether an heir who has incurred a passive title, by not renouncing his ancestor's succession when charged to enter, is entitled to renounce after the estate has been adjudged.

Dingwall v Burns, 1871, 9 M. 582; 43 J. 354; 8 S.L.R. 385.

Legacy declared to be real burden—Heir at law making up title by service.

A testator by mortis causa settlement disposed his whole estate to his wife in life-tenant and to his heirs in fee. By a codicil the testator bequeathed to his wife a legacy of £600, which, he declared, should form a real burden on his heritable estate, and he also gave her a power to sell the heritage. The wife survived, but did not exercise the power of sale, and the legacy of £600 was not paid during her life. The testator's heir at law made up a title to the heritage by service, passing over the disposition. Held that, although the legacy had not been made a real burden on the heritage, so as to be effectual in a question with creditors and singular successors, yet there was conferred on the wife a right to make her legacy effectual out of the heritable estate, and that the heir at law, having taken up the succession gratuitously, was bound to pay the legacy to the wife's executors.

Marriage contract—Provision to younger children—Liability of heir.

The heir of a marriage who took an estate under the provisions of a marriage contract held liable as his father's heir to implement an obligation in his marriage contract in favour of younger children—the father's executry funds not being sufficient to meet it—but that only intra valorem of the estate.

Act 1661, c. 24—Debt of apparent heir in competition with debt of ancestor.

A bond and assignation in security granted by an heir in possession for an instant advance, more than one year, but less than three years, after his ancestor's death, held not reducible at the instance of a creditor of the ancestor under the Act 1661, c. 24.

Macalpine v Lang, &c., 1885, 12 R. 604; 22 S.L.R. 401.

Act 1695, c. 24—Rational provisions by apparent heir.

Held that rational provisions made in a trust settlement by an heir who died after possessing an estate for three years upon apparenacy, in favour of his widow and children, were chargeable under the Act 1695, c. 24, against the next heir completing a title to the property.

Orr, 1871, 9 M. 500; 43 J. 264; 8 S.L.R. 354.

Onerous deed of apparent heir—Ratification of ancestor's null deed—Prescription.

A, who was duly infeft in certain heritable subjects, executed a disposition in his own favour of one-ninth share of the subjects pro indiviso, and disposed the other pro indiviso shares to his brothers and sister. He died on 1st July, 1836, without being infeft under his own disposition, leaving a disposition of his share to his wife. This disposition, however, was invalid, being unsigned and executed by one notary only, and four witnesses. Next day B, his immediate younger brother and heir at law (who afterwards survived A for upwards of three years), executed a ratification, written at the end of the deed, whereby he ratified, approved of, and confirmed it, and for himself and his heirs renounced all objections thereagainst. The ratification contained no words of conveyance. The widow proceeded to take infeftment under the assignation contained in her husband's disposition to her, and the procuratory and precept in A's disposition to himself, and possessed her husband's share of the subjects for thirty-three years, when she died, leaving a conveyance to trustees. Her trustees possessed for twelve years more, when C, as then heir at law of A, served to him, passing over B, and, raising a reduction of the various deeds, claimed the subjects. Held (1) in conformity with Adamson v Inglis, 11 S. 40, that the deed of ratification by the apparent heir must be presumed to have been granted, and was granted, for onerous causes; (2) following Yule v Ritchie, Mor. 5299, &c., that the possession of the widow during the heir-apparent's life was to be regarded as his possession; and therefore (3) that, under the Act 1695, c. 24, the deed of ratification was a burden on the succeeding heir serving to A. Opinion (per Lord Young) that the unexecuted disposition, though null ab initio, was, in virtue of the deed of ratification by the apparent heir, equivalent to a disposition by him, and—although proceeding a non habente potestatem—a sufficient title to found prescription. Opinion (per Lord Craighill) contra.

Deed in fulfilment of ancestor's unfulfilled intention.

A, on the narrative of the unfulfilled intention of his late father, whose heir at law he was, and of his wish to implement it, granted and delivered to certain persons a disposition of heritable subjects which had belonged to his father, in trust for behoof of his mother in life-tenant, and of himself and his brothers and sisters and their heirs in fee. The trustees entered upon and administered the trust property for the purposes of the trust for ten years, when A died, leaving a pupil son and heir at law. No title to the subjects conveyed had, however, been made up in the person either of the trustee or of his trustees, the truster's title remaining that of apparent heir to his father as last infeft therein. In a question between A's trustees under the above-mentioned disposition and his pupil son as heir at law of his grandfather, held that the trust disposition in question was delivered and enforceable, and was therefore a deed in the sense of the Act 1695, c. 24, to which the heir at law was bound to give effect.

Possession on apparenecy.

Observed (per Lord President Inglis) that, in consequence of the 9th section of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, possession on apparenecy is no longer known to the law.

M'Adam v M'Adam, 1879, 6 R. 1256; 16 S.L.R. 761.

Discussion of executors.

In an action at the instance of creditors of an heir who had possessed for three years on apparenecy, against the next heir, who had served to a remoter ancestor, held that the defender was not entitled to insist on the creditors in the first instance discussing their debtor's trust disponees and executors.

Morris v Beveridge, 1867, 6 M. 60; 40 J. 40; 5 S.L.R. 63.

Relief—Heir of line and provision.

The heir of line and not the heir of provision is the primary debtor in the heritable debts of the ancestor, but an heir of provision will be primarily liable if the granter has expressed his desire to that effect.

Park's Curator v Black, 1871, 9 M. 1078; 43 J. 590.

(2) VITIOUS INTROMISSION.

Next of kin—Act 1695, c. 41.

Next of kin charged under the Act 1695, c. 41, by a creditor of the deceased, having neither confirmed as executors nor renounced the succession, were pursued as vitious intromitters. The Lord Ordinary pronounced decree against them, but enforceable only to the extent of the succession devolving on them. In the Inner House the defenders gave in a minute renouncing the succession. The Court decerned against them cognitionis causa tantum, and found them liable in the expenses of process under deduction of the expense of the minute of renunciation.

Davidson v Clark, &c., 1867, 6 M. 151; 40 J. 82; 5 S.L.R. 119.

Onus.

A farmer, after the death of his uncle who lodged with him and assisted him on the farm, took from his uncle's repositories a cheque in his uncle's favour for £46, and in exchange for it got from the granter a cheque in his own favour. In an action by a creditor of the uncle against the nephew as a vitious intromitter with the uncle's estate, after a proof, the Court held (1) that the uncle had no interest in the stock of the farm, and that the cheque represented the price of three bulls, part of the stock sold by him in the management of the farm, (2) that the pursuer had failed to prove that the uncle had any claim against the farm which would have entitled him to retain the cheque, and (3) that the defender was not liable as a vitious intromitter even to the extent of the sum in the cheque. Opinion (per Lord Low) that, even if the uncle had been joint owner of the bulls along with the nephew, the nephew, by acting as he did with regard to the cheque, would not have made himself liable as a vitious intromitter.

6. COLLATIO INTER HÆREDES.

(26)

Obligation to collate—Thellusson Act, 1800—Income of heritable and moveable estate falling into intestacy.

Where by the operation of the Thellusson Act the income of a testator's heritable and moveable estate falls into intestacy, the heir in heritage, who is also one of the next of kin, is not entitled to share in the income from the moveable estate without collation.

Where the accumulation of the revenue of a trust estate consisting of both heritage and moveables was struck at by the Thellusson Act, held that as each term's rents accrued, the person holding the character of heir at law of the truster at that time was entitled to elect whether or not he would collate that term's rents so as to share in the income of the moveable portion of the estate, and that he had the right of choice irrespective of whether the previous term's rents had or had not been collated.

Hunter's Trustees v Edinburgh Chamber of Commerce and Manufactures, (O.H.) 1911, 2 S.L.T. 287.

(28)

Where by the operation of the Thellusson Act the rents of a testator's heritage fell as they accrued to his heir at law at the time, and the income of his moveable estate to his next of kin, and where the heir at law was one of the next of kin, held that the heir at law was entitled to a share of the income of the moveable estate without collating.

Logan's Trustees v Logan, 1896, 23 R. 848; 33 S.L.R. 638; 4 S.L.T. 57.

Legacy to heirs of testator's son—Son's heir succeeding testator under entail.

The heir of entail in possession of an estate bequeathed a third of the residue of his means to his son (who was then heir-apparent to the entailed estate), "partly in consideration of the burdens he will be subjected to on his succeeding me" in the entailed estate, "and to his heirs, executors, and successors." The son predeceased, leaving three children, the eldest of whom succeeded to the entailed estate on the death of his grandfather. In a question between him and the son's other two children as to whether he could take a share of the grandfather's bequest without collating his life interest in the entailed estate, held that there was no room for the doctrine of collation, as the heir of entail was entitled to a share of the residue in consequence of the expressed will of the testator.

———Bequest of moveables to "next of kin as the law directs"—Heir ab intestato in heritage required to collate.

A testator, who died in 1899, left his moveable estate to his mother in liferent, and provided that on her death the residue was to be divided among his "next of kin as the law directs." Quoad heritage he died intestate. The heir in heritage was A, the son of the immediate younger brother of the testator's father. The next of kin as at the date of the liferentrix's death in 1905, when the residue vested in them, were A, B, a sister of A, and the surviving children of the younger brothers of the testator's father. A died in 1907 intestate, leaving a son, C, who was his heir in heritage, and seven other children. C maintained that he was entitled to a share of the moveables as one of the testator's next of kin without collating the heritage, on the ground that the case must be taken as if he was claiming heritage as the heir of his father, A, and his share of the moveables as one of the testator's next of kin. Held that the question must be determined as if it had arisen in the lifetime of A after a share of the moveable estate had vested in him, and, as in that event, A would have had to collate, so must C.

Cochran v Purves, (O.H.) 1908, 16 S.L.T. 99.

———Heir in heritage taking heritage under settlement—Collation as condition of claiming legitim.

A testator left a trust disposition and settlement by which he directed his trustees to pay two-thirds of the residue to his said son, and to hold the remaining third in trust for his daughter. The trust disposition and settlement did not expressly put his children to their election between the testamentary provisions and legitim. The daughter claimed legitim. The son was alioqui successurus to the heritable estate. The daughter sought to have it declared that the son having succeeded to the heritable estate, she was entitled to one-half of the free moveable estate as her legitim; or in the event of her brother claiming to share in the legitim, that he was bound to collate the heritage, and the pursuer was then entitled to claim as legitim one-half of both the heritable and the moveable estate. Held that if the defender claimed legitim he was bound to collate the value of the heritage to which he succeeded under the will, and that whether the will operated constructive conversion of the heritage or not.

Dawson v Dawson's Trustees, (O.H.) 1913, 2 S.L.T. 210.

Provision of qualified liferent of half estate consisting partly of heritage—Claim of legitim—Duty of heir accepting provision to collate.

Smith's Trustees v Smith, (O.H.) 1912, 1 S.L.T. 484, No. 91, infra.

Right to collate—Heir not one of next of kin—Intestate Moveable Succession (Scotland) Act, 1855, secs. 1 and 2.

Held that secs. 1 and 2 of the Intestate Succession Act, 1855, must be read together, and accordingly that the proviso contained in sec. 1, that no representation should be admitted among collaterals after brothers' and sisters' descendants, also applied to sec. 2, and excluded a deceased cousin's son, who was the heir in heritage of an intestate, from collating the heritage and claiming from a surviving cousin, who was the sole next of kin, a share of the moveable succession. Observed (per Lord President Strathclyde) "(1) that the first and second sections of this statute are not to be regarded as separate and independent enactments, but are to be read together as comprehending the whole scheme of representation in moveables introduced by the Act of Parliament; (2) that the proviso in the first section is applicable to the whole scheme of representation in moveables introduced by the statute; and (3) that the object of the second section of the statute is to apply, in the case of mixed successions, the rule of representation which is applied by the first section to estates consisting of moveables alone."

An intestate, leaving heritable and moveable estate, was survived by an aunt, his sole next of kin, and was predeceased by his uncle, who, had he survived, would have been his heir in heritage and one of his next of kin. Held that the only child of the uncle, being heir in heritage of the intestate, was entitled under sec. 2 of the Intestate Moveable Succession Act, 1855, to call upon the next of kin to collate, although in consequence of the proviso in sec. 1 of that Act she would not have been entitled under that section to a share of the moveable estate.

Held that persons who were heirs in heritage by reason that they represented heirs-portioners, but who were not next of kin of the deceased nor entitled to a share of the deceased's moveable estate by virtue of the representation introduced by sec. 1 of the Intestate Moveable Succession Act, 1855, were entitled to collate under sec. 2 of the Act.

Robertson v Robertson, (O.H.) 1907, 15 S.L.T. 249.

—Sale of heritage by heir—Collation excluded.

A testator, who left heritable and moveable estate, by his settlement made certain provisions for his younger son, who was insane, and for his two daughters, and gave the residue of his moveable estate and the heritage to his elder son. The elder son accepted these provisions, and subsequently sold part of the heritage. On the death of the elder son, twelve years after his father, the curator bonis of the younger son claimed legitim for his ward. The curator bonis contended that the ward was entitled to one-third of the legitim. The representatives of the elder son contended that, as he would have been entitled to claim a share of legitim on collating the heritage, they were entitled to do so; that the legitim fund fell to be divided into four parts; and that the ward's share was one-fourth. Held that part of the heritage having been sold by the elder son, the heir at law, collation was excluded, and that the ward was entitled to one-third of the legitim.

—Right of representatives of party predeceasing who would have been heir—Intestate Moveable Succession (Scotland) Act, 1855, secs. 1 and 2—Heir not collating—"Child"—"Parent."

The owner of heritable and moveable estate died intestate, without issue, and predeceased by his only brother and by that brother's eldest son. The intestate was survived by sisters, and the issue of deceased sisters, by the younger children of his deceased brother, and by a grandnephew and two grandnieces, the children of his brother's eldest son. The grandnephew was the intestate's heir in heritage, and declined to collate. An action of multiplepoinding having been brought to determine questions with regard to the succession to the intestate's moveable estate, held (1) that the children of the intestate's brother took no share in the intestate's estate, either (a) under sec. 1 of the Intestate Moveable Succession (Scotland) Act, 1855, as representing their father, in respect that their father, being heir in heritage, was not entitled to any share of the moveable estate except on condition of collating the heritage, which condition, owing to his predecease, he was unable to fulfil; or (b) under sec. 2 as the brother and sisters of an heir entitled to collate, in respect that, as their brother had not survived to become heir, he was never in a position to collate. Held (2) that the intestate's grandnieces were not entitled, under sec. 2, as the sisters of an heir in heritage who had not collated, to the share of the moveable estate which their grandfather would have taken on collation had he survived, in respect that "child" meant immediate issue, and did not include grandson, and that "parent" meant father, and did not include grandfather. Opinion (per Lord Justice-Clerk Scott Dickson) that "the person predeceasing" in sec. 2 referred to the person predeceasing as used in sec. 1. Opinion reserved (per Lord Ormisdale).

—Right of representatives of heir—Heritage not available for collation.

An intestate who left heritable and moveable estate was survived by her brother T, who was her heir at law, and by two sisters who were her heirs in mobilibus. T died without collating and without making up a title to the heritage, and his son P thereupon became heir-apparent to his aunt, the intestate. P was decerned heir-general to the intestate, and made up a title to the heritage. Held that the personal representatives of T who were unable to collate the heritage were not entitled to claim any share of the moveable estate of the intestate. Opinion (per Lord Ardmillan) that the right of an heir who is one of the next of kin is not that of a person primarily entitled to both moveable and heritable estate, but is a primary right to heritage which he may extend by collation so as to obtain a share of the moveables.

Newbigging's Trustees v Steel's Trustees, 1873, 11 M. 411; 45 J. 285.

Whether collated fund to be added to legitim fund or to gross estate.

Held that, where an heir claims legitim and collates heritage, the value of the collated heritage falls to be added to the legitim fund, and not to the gross estate of the deceased.

Gilmour v Gilmour's Trustees, (O.H.) 1920, 2 S.L.T. 369.

Heir collating—Intestate Moveable Succession (Scotland) Act, 1855, sec. 2—Rule of division with heir—"Other issue of predeceaser."

A, the heir in heritage of a person who had died intestate and the eldest son of a person who, had he survived the intestate, would have been the heir in heritage of the intestate, resolved to collate, and his right to do so was admitted by the next of kin of the intestate, of whom there were two. The value of the heritage was £2485, and of the moveables £21,685—together £24,170, one-third whereof was £8056 13s. 4d. The other issue of the predeceaser claimed to share equally with A the £8056, on the ground that after collation the whole fell to be divided as moveable estate; or, otherwise, they claimed to share equally with A £7228, being the third of the intestate's moveable estate. Held that the other issue were entitled to shares only of £5571—the difference between the value of the heritage and one-third of the mixed estate—as being the sum gained by A on collation.

Held further, that the words "other issue of the predeceaser" in sec. 2 of the Intestate Moveable Succession Act, 1855, were not limited to the predeceaser's immediate issue.

II. LEGAL RIGHTS OF SPOUSES AND CHILDREN.

1. AFFECTING HERITABLE ESTATE.

(1) COURTESY.

(43)

Subjects—Entailed estate—Burgage subjects—Superiorities—Lands held in trust.

Courtesy extends (1) to lands in which a wife dies infert under an entail, unless it is expressly excluded by the deed of entail; and (2) to burgage subjects and superiorities; but not (3) to lands held by trustees for behoof of a wife.

Lord Clinton, 1869, 8 M. 370; 42 J. 168; 7 S.L.R. 200.

Conquest — Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, sec. 37.

Held that, by virtue of sec. 37 of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, a husband's right of courtesy attaches to his wife's conquest.

Conquest—Heirs-portioners — Mortis causa conveyance to heir-portioner.

A father, who possessed several heritable properties, by his settlement distributed them among his four daughters, who were his heirs-portioners. One of the daughters, to whom the estate of G had been disposed, made up her title under the settlement. After her death her husband drew the rents for twenty years. After his death one of his children (who, on their mother's death, succeeded to the estate) raised an action against his executor, calling upon him to account for three-fourths of the rents drawn by the husband, on the ground that his right of courtesy did not extend to more than that pro indiviso fourth of the estate of G to which his wife was alioquin successura. The defence was that the courtesy extended to the whole of G, as the share of heritage which the daughter took under the settlement did not exceed the fourth pro indiviso share of the testator's heritage, which she would have taken as an heir-portioner had there been no settlement. Held that the courtesy did not extend to more than a fourth of the estate of G.

Observations (per Lord President Inglis) as to the rules applicable to questions of courtesy.

(2) TERCE.

(46)

(Per Lord Adam)—"The husband's sasine is the measure of the widow's right (to terce), and no proceedings which have not the effect of evacuating the husband's sasine can preclude her right."

(48)

Heritable security—Sale of security subjects—Disposition not granted.

A bondholder infert sold the security subjects under his bond, but died before granting a disposition. His widow maintained that the bond formed part of her husband's moveable estate at the date of his death, subject to jus relictæ. Held that the bond had not been rendered moveable in a question between the executor and the widow, but that the widow was entitled to terce out of the bonds.

 ————Act 1681, c. 10—Provision that wife should have right to terce.

The Act of 1681, c. 10, provides "when a particular provision has been granted by the husband in favour of his wife in a contract of marriage, the wife is thereby excluded from a terce out of any lands belonging to her husband unless it be expressly provided in the contract of marriage . . . that the wife shall have right to a terce by and at the particular provision." An antenuptial marriage contract after making provision for the wife contained a declaration that the provision "shall not in any way be held as in full of terce." Held that this clause satisfied the exception contained in the Act.

Douglas v Douglas's Trustees, (O.H.) 1906, 13 S.L.T. 749.

 ————Gifts during marriage—Act 1681, c. 10—Amount of terce.

Held that sums of money gifted by a husband to his wife during marriage did not constitute a provision within the meaning of the Act 1681, c. 10, and did not exclude her right to terce. Held also that in calculating the amount of a widow's terce and ius relictæ sums gifted by a husband to his wife during the marriage should not be taken into consideration.

 ————Abandonment of right to terce.

A widow survived her husband for ten years and died intestate, without having made an express election between her provisions under her husband's will and her terce. The trustees consigned the amount of the testamentary provisions in bank and intimated this to the lady. They also called her in an action of multiplepounding which they brought for the purpose of dividing the husband's estate, but she did not appear. Held that she had abandoned her right to terce and that her representatives were not entitled to claim arrears.

 ————Brieve—Appeal—Competency—Act 1503, c. 77—Act 1681, c. 10.

The heir at law is not entitled to obtain a sist of the proceedings under a brieve of service and cognition to terce on the ground that he is about to bring a declarator of the invalidity of the marriage, or on the ground that he is about to raise an action for declarator that the widow is barred from claiming terce by reason of having accepted a conventional provision out of heritage abroad belonging to the deceased. Opinion (per Lord McLaren) that under a brieve of terce it is competent for the inquest to consider whether the widow is barred from claiming terce by reason of having accepted a conventional provision. Opinions that a brieve of service and cognition to terce may be removed to the Court of Session by appeal at any time before trial before the sheriff. Observations as to the competency of an appeal after trial and verdict.

Insurance policy on surviving son's life—Provision for son's family—Actuarial value.

Certain policies of insurance were taken upon a son's life by a father for behoof of himself and spouse, and payable to both "or to the survivor of them, their, his, or her heirs, executors, or assignees." After the father's death, the premiums were paid by his widow, who, in virtue of a mutual settlement by the spouses, had the absolute use of the whole estate, heritable and moveable. On the death of both, the settlement provided that the estate should be divided into twelve parts, one of which was to be retained to pay the policy premiums in the first instance. It was also provided that on the death of the son, the contents of the policies should go to the son's widow in liferent and his children in fee. Held that the actuarial value of the policies at the date of the father's death formed part of his moveable estate for the purpose of estimating legitim.

cutors, "for the benefit of his widow, child, or children, the share of profits to which the said deceased partner would have been entitled had he lived." One of the partners having died leaving a widow and one child, held that the share of the profits payable under the contract of copartnership did not form part of the deceased partner's executry estate, but fell to be equally divided between his wife and child.

Legacy in favour of heirs of deceased.

Held that a widow had no right jure relictae to a share of a money legacy left to the heirs in mobilibus of her husband.

Inglis v Inglis, 1869, 7 M. 435; 41 J. 234; 6 S.L.R. 271.

Unrevoked donation inter virum et uxorem.

Held (by a majority of the whole Court) that inter vivos gifts of moveable estate made by a husband to his wife, and not revoked by him at his death, did not fall to be taken into account in ascertaining the amount of the legitim fund of his estate.

Property passing under irrevocable mutual settlement.

Spouses by a mutual settlement bequeathed all their property in favour of the survivor, and further bequeathed the remainder of the property, on the death of the survivor, equally between the heirs of the husband and the heirs of the wife. The husband survived and married again. On his death his widow claimed jus relictae. Held that her right was not defeated by the mutual settlement even assuming that it was irrevocable by the husband.

Bell v Sands, (O.H.) 1893, 1 S.L.T. 58.

Accumulations—Thellusson Act, 1800, sec. 1—Resulting intestacy.

Held that in addition to her testamentary provisions a widow was entitled to jus relictae out of accumulations of income, prohibited by the Thellusson Act, which had fallen into intestacy.

(71)
Income which a testator directed to be accumulated fell into intestacy under the Thellusson Act. Held that the testator's widow was not entitled, in virtue of her right of jus relictæ, to claim any portion of the surplus income, in respect that it did not form part of the testator's estate at the date of his death.

Liferent falling to mother's executry through mother having divorced her husband.

A wife by antenuptial marriage contract conveyed to trustees her whole estate then belonging to her or that should pertain to her during the subsistence of the marriage. Her father by the contract bound himself on his death to make payment of £5000 to the trustees for behoof of the wife in liferent, and after her death for the husband in liferent, and on the death of the survivor for certain beneficiaries in fee. The wife divorced her husband, and thereafter died. Held that the husband's liferent, which was forfeited by reason of the divorce, fell to the wife's executry, and (2) that the only child of the marriage was entitled to claim legitim out of the interest on the sum of £5000 so falling to the wife's executry.

Gavin's Trustees v Walker's Trustees, (O.H.) 1907, 15 S.L.T. 681.

Goodwill of medical practice—Recommendation of widow.

(c) Simulate Transactions.

IO U's taken in favour of deceased's children—Delivery—IO U's returned to deceased and retained till his death.

A advanced the sum of £1000, being nearly the whole of his moveable estate, to one of his sons, who at his father's request wrote upon one sheet of paper three IO U's (the sums in which together amounted to £1000), one being in favour of each of A's other children, except a son whom he desired to exclude from all share in his succession. The paper containing the IO U's was then handed in turn to two of the creditors in the obligations (the third was deaf and dumb), and finally to the father, by whom it was retained till his death, which occurred nine months after the transaction. Held, in a claim for legitim by the excluded son against his father's trustees, that while the form of the transaction might be sufficient absolutely to divest the father of the sum of £1000, provided that such was the real intention of the parties, the whole circumstances, and particularly the retention of the obligatory documents by the father, showed that the transaction was simulate, and that the fund formed part of the personal estate of the father at the time of his death.

Buchanan v Buchanan, 1876, 3 R. 556; 13 S.L.R. 353.

Gift of whole estate.

Circumstances in which held that a widow's claim for jus relictæ was defeated by a donation of his whole estate, which had been made to a third party by the husband the donation having been absolute and irrevocable.

Allan v Stark, (O.H.) 1901, 8 S.L.T. 468.

Assignment of farm lease and stock.

A farmer assigned his whole estate including the lease and stock of his farm to his son by his second marriage, who had previously assisted in managing the farm. The assignment was delivered to the son and was intimated to the factor on the property, who recognised the son as tenant, and the policies of insurance over the farm were transferred to the son's name. The object of the transaction was to exclude a claim of legitim by the children of the father's first marriage. Held that the assignment was an effectual transfer of the lease and stock, and was not reducible as being in fraud of legitim.

Skinner v Beveridge, 1872, 10 S.L.R. 12.

Payment on deathbed—Act to Abolish Reductions ex Capite Lecti, 1871.

A father executed a deed of provision "to come into operation during my lifetime," whereby he conveyed to trustees for behoof of three of his children nominatim, "the sum of £6000 (£3200 of which I have handed to them in cash). . . ." The deed was delivered immediately after its execution, and the £3200 was at the same time handed by the granter to the trustees by cheque payable to one of them. A child of the granter of the deed, who had not been mentioned in it, sought to have it declared that she was entitled to legitim out of the £3200 handed over in cash, averring that the sum had been handed to the trustees by her father on deathbed. Held that the pursuer's averment was irrelevant, in respect the payment of the money was to be regarded as made in implement of the deed of provision, and not as an independent transaction.

Hay v Coutts' Trustees, 1890, 18 R. 244; 28 S.L.R. 205.

Relevancy of averments.

A daughter, who claimed legitim from her father's estate, raised a reduction of certain minutes of agreement entered into between her father and brother with respect to the transference of a business, in which they had been partners for several years, from the father to the son. She averred that the minutes were "not bona fide absolute transfers" of the father's estate, that "the transaction was nominal and fictitious, and in fraudem of the pursuer's claim of legitim." Held that there was no sufficient or relevant averment in support of the reasons of reduction.

Boustead v Gardner, &c., 1879, 7 R. 139; 17 S.L.R. 67.

(d) Valuation of Estate.

(79)

Date of valuing estate.

Observed (per Lord Ardmillan)—"Legitim must be calculated as at the date of the father's death, and profit or loss arising after realisation, in consequence of the executor's mode of dealing with the funds, cannot augment or diminish the claim of the child."

Earl of Dalhousie v Crokatt, 1868, 6 M. 659; 40 J. 341; 5 S.L.R. 406.

Appreciation after death.

A right to legitim is a debt to be measured by the actual value of the moveable estate left by the father at his death, and its ascertainment does not involve realisation of his estate. The estate of a deceased person included the shares of certain ships which were not marketable at the date of his death, but soon after increased in value. In an action for payment of legitim the Court allowed a proof of the value of the shares of the ships as at the date of the father's death.

On the death of a husband his executors carried on his business for some time and then realised it for a sum exceeding its value at the date of the husband's death. Held that the amount of his widow's jus relictæ must be calculated with reference to the value of the estate at his death and not the amount ultimately realised.

Maben v Maben's Executors, (O.H.) 1901, 8 S.L.T. 486.

Delay in realisation.

Trustees delayed realising certain securities for four years after the husband's death. Held that the widow's jus relictæ was to be calculated on the value of the estate at her husband's death and not as at the date of realising the securities.

Moss' Trustees v Moss, (O.H.) 1916, 1 S.L.T. 321.

Depreciation in investments subsequent to realisation.

In estimating the amount of jus relictæ the wife's estate is valued as at her death, and when the estate has been duly realised no change in its value occurring in the course of the executor's subsequent administration will, apart from specialities, affect the amount of the jus relictæ. The executor of a married woman, who died in England, brought an administration suit in the Court of Chancery, in the course of which, the executor having realised the estate, it was ordered that the proceeds should be lodged in Court, and invested in specified investments. Held that the husband's jus relictæ was not subject to deduction in respect of depreciation of the value of these investments made under order of the Court.

Losses subsequent to realisation.

In a question between a son claiming legitim and his deceased father's executor, who had allowed the agent employed to ingather the executry estate to retain in his own hands funds belonging thereto, part of which had been lost through the insolvency of the agent, held that whether there was negligence on the part of the executor or not, this was a loss incurred after realisation, which could not diminish the amount of the legitim.

Question, whether the executor or the dead's part should sustain the loss.

Earl of Dalhousie v Crokatt, 1868, 6 M. 659; 40 J. 341; 5 S.L.R. 406.

(85)

Claim for share of ipsa corpora of estate.

(e) Debts Deductible from Estate.

(86)

Marriage contract provisions—Father twice married—Legitim of children of first marriage—Provisions to children of second marriage.

A testator, who had been twice married, was survived by seven children, five of the first marriage and two of the second, and was predeceased by his second wife. The children of the first marriage had not discharged their legitim, but with respect to those of the second, the testator, by antenuptial contract with his second wife, in order to make a provision for the children of that marriage, bound himself to pay to them, at the first term after his death "a just proportion and share of the means and estate that may happen to belong to him at his decease, along with the children of his former marriage, and along with the children of any future marriage," and that equally or in such proportions as he might appoint, which provision was declared to be in full of legitim. By his settlement the testator directed his whole estate to be divided among all his children equally. One of the children of the first marriage, who had survived the testator, died before the period of vesting under the settlement, and his representative claimed the share of legitim which had vested in him at his father's death. The children of the second marriage made no claim under the antenuptial contract. Held that whether the children were or were not creditors under the marriage contract, as they made no claim under that deed, the father's trustees were not entitled to deduct two-sevenths from the executry before computing the amount of the legitim fund.

Marriage contract provisions—Provisions in favour of children of earlier marriage.

A man, on entering into a second marriage, executed a marriage contract by which he conveyed the whole estate which might belong to him at the date of his death to trustees for behoof of the children of the first and second marriages. He subsequently married a third time. On his death held that the widow and children of the third marriage were entitled to receive their legal rights before the executors conveyed the husband's estate to the marriage contract trustees.

Provision in favour of children claiming legitim.

In an antenuptial contract of marriage, the husband, besides undertaking certain other provisions, undertook to make over at his death to the children of the marriage, if any, one-half of the whole estate, heritable and moveable (after deducting a proportional part of his debts) which he should thereafter conquest and acquire in any manner of way, reserving power to divide and apportion the provisions made by him among the children, if more than one, as he should see fit. The contract did not exclude legitim. Certain of the children having at their father's death claimed legitim, held that the half of conquest being an onerous provision due to the whole children by contract, fell to be deducted from the estate before computing legitim, and that those children who took legitim were therefore entitled both to a share of the half of the conquest and to legitim.

Murray's Trustees v Murray, 1881, 18 S.L.R. 690.

Testamentary provision to widow—Liferent of portion of estate.

A testator, who had married without entering into a marriage contract, executed a testamentary deed of appointment directing his trustees to pay the income of three-fifths of his estate to his widow for her life-rent alimentary use, and to pay the income of the remaining two-fifths to his children equally during her life, and after her death to divide the whole trust fund equally among his children then surviving and the issue of those who might predecease her. These provisions were declared to be in satisfaction of jus relictæ and legitim. Owing to the character of the investments the legitim fund extended to one-half of the trust estate. The children having claimed legitim, held (1) that the provision in favour of the widow, being testamentary, had not the effect of postponing payment of any part of the legitim fund.

Chargeability of debts against moveable estate—Part of estate consisting of bond heritable quoad jus relictæ and moveable quoad succession.

A bond which was moveable quoad the creditor's succession but heritable quoad jus relictæ was assigned by him to a bank in security of advances. Held (1) that in a question with the widow claiming jus relictæ the ordinary moveable debts of the deceased were chargeable against the fund available for jus relictæ, no portion of them being chargeable against the bond; but (2) that advances made by the bank on the security of the assignation formed a charge against the bond.

Burden affecting heritage — Annuity.

A testator, in satisfaction of an obligation in his marriage contract, by his trust settlement directed his trustees to pay an annuity to his widow. Terms of the settlement under which held that the testator intended the annuity to be paid out of his heritable estate, and accordingly that in estimating the amount of the legitim fund the value of the annuity did not fall to be deducted from it as if it had been a debt exigible from his executry estate.

Smith's Trustees v Smith, (O.H.) 1912, 1 S.L.T. 484.

Burden on heritable estate of deceased.

A husband died leaving heritable and moveable estate. His widow claimed jus relictæ. The heritable estate was burdened by an obligation to erect buildings on it. Held that this burden was a charge against the moveable estate which must be met before the amount of jus relictæ was ascertained.

Ross v Ross's Trustees, (O.H.) 1901, 9 S.L.T. 340.

Aliment of widow.

A husband died leaving a will by which he gave his widow a life-rent of his whole estate, with power to appropriate such part of the capital as from time to time she should think necessary for her maintenance. Some months after the husband's death a child claimed legitim. Held that the widow was not entitled in an accounting for legitim to credit for aliment out of the estate from her husband's death till the claim for legitim was made.

Calls on shares after death of deceased.

Where calls were paid in respect of certain shares some months after a father's death, held that these were debts which must be deducted from his estate before legitim was ascertained.

Davidson v Mackenzie, (O.H.) 1898, 6 S.L.T. 25.

Unprofitable lease of music hall—Losses resulting after death of deceased.

A testator in his trust settlement directed his trustees to pay the income of the residue of his estate to his sister and her children, and after her death, and when the youngest attained the age of twenty-five years, to divide the capital of the residue among them. He was tenant under lease of a music hall, and when he died some years of the lease were still to run. His trustee failed to dispose of the lease or to sublet the premises. His widow claimed her legal rights. Held that the loss occasioned by the lease of the music hall fell to be charged against the moveable estate in a question with the widow.

Expenses—Realising estate.

The expenses of the deceased's executor in making up a title to and realising the estate fall to be deducted in ascertaining the amount of jus relictæ.

Russel v Attorney-General, 1917 S.C. 28; 54 S.L.R. 32; 1916, 2 S.L.T. 207.

—Litigation—Subsequent to deceased's death—Jus relictæ.

The executor of a married woman who had died in England brought an administration suit in the Court of Chancery, in the course of which it became necessary to ascertain the husband's domicile in consequence of his having claimed jus relictæ. After inquiry the husband's domicile was found to be Scottish. Held that the jus relictæ was not subject to deduction in respect of the costs of the inquiry as to his domicile.

Russel v Attorney-General, 1917 S.C. 28; 54 S.L.R. 32; 1916, 2 S.L.T. 207.

(2) JUS RELICTÆ.

(98)

Nature of jus relictæ—Right to share of ipsa corpora of estate or jus crediti.

Question, whether the jus relictæ is a right of property in one-third (or one-half) of the ipsa corpora of the deceased husband's estate or is merely a jus crediti for one-third (or one-half) of the money value of the estate upon realisation.

Jus relictæ is a right of the same nature as legitim. It is not a right of property in a certain share of the ipsa corpora of the deceased husband's estate which is vested in the wife at the date of his death; it is merely a jus crediti for payment of a certain portion of the value of the estate as at that date. Held, accordingly, that a widow was not entitled to obtain a transfer in forma specifica of one-third of her husband's shares in a company in pro tanto satisfaction of her jus relictæ, but was merely entitled to have the value of the shares, as at the date of his death, brought into computation in ascertaining the amount of her right.

—Special right to certain shares.

A widow brought an action against her late husband's trustees for an accounting of their whole intromissions with his moveable estate in order that the true balance due by them to her in name of jus relictæ might be ascertained. She also claimed transfer of one-half of certain shares belonging to her deceased husband at the date of his death. Held that she was, in the circumstances, entitled to a transfer of the shares belonging to her husband.

Millar v Millar's Trustees, (O.H.) 1914, 1 S.L.T. 414.

Interest—Rate of interest.

A widow threatened to raise an action of reduction of a postnuptial marriage contract and to claim her legal rights. After ten years' delay she raised the action and was successful. Held that she was only entitled to interest on the amount of her terce and jus relictæ at deposit-receipt rates and that income tax fell to be deducted from this sum.

Summers v Summers' Trustees, (O.H.) 1893, 1 S.L.T. 77.

Maintenance of widow as set-off.

The tenant of a small farm died intestate, survived by his wife, two sons, and a daughter. No executor was appointed, and no claims were made by any of the family on the deceased's estate. The second son, who had remained in family with his parents, became tenant of the farm and worked it with the assistance of his mother and sister. The mother died seventeen years after her husband, aged seventy-seven, leaving nothing except the sum payable to her jus relictæ. Held, in an action by the eldest son against the second son for payment of his share of his mother's estate, that it must be presumed that the sum due to the mother jus relictæ had been exhausted in her maintenance and consequently that she left no estate.

(103)

A widow was maintained during the eleven years of her viduity by her eldest son, who was also her husband's executor. She made no claim for jus relictae, but a claim was made by her representatives. Held that the sums expended by the son on the widow's maintenance fell to be set off against the claim for jus relictae.

Mackenzie v Mackenzie's Trustees, 1873, 11 M. 681; 45 J. 433; 10 S.L.R. 470.

Divorce — Effect of husband's divorce — Domicile—Jurisdiction.

A, a Scotswoman, who in 1873 was married in Edinburgh to B, a Scotsman, raised an action of divorce against her husband in January, 1898. B, who had been personally cited, did not appear in the action, and the pursuer, after a proof, obtained decree of divorce on 23rd February, 1898. In March, 1898, A raised a second action against B, who was a proprietor of heritage in Scotland, concluding for declarator that she was entitled to terce and jus relictae as at the date of the decree of divorce, and for count and reckoning to fix the amount of jus relictae. B averred that at the date of the divorce he was domiciled in the Isle of Man. Held (1) that, standing the decree of divorce, it was to be assumed that the Court had jurisdiction to pronounce it, and therefore (2) that the Court had jurisdiction to entertain the present action, and (3) that the pursuer was entitled to declarator of her right to jus relictae as if her husband had died at the date of decree of divorce.

Implied renunciation—Wife's signature to husband's settlement.

A husband by his trust disposition and settlement gave his wife the liferent of his whole means and estate, and in the fourth purpose directed his trustees, "after the death of the survivor of me and my said wife, and with her consent and full approval (in token of which she has subscribed this deed)," to pay over a large number of legacies, many of them to relatives of his wife. By the fifth purpose he directed that after the death of his widow his household furniture should be divided among certain of her relatives. The residue was to be devoted to religious and charitable purposes. The wife signed the deed. She survived her husband only a few weeks. Her executor claimed her terce and jus relictae, maintaining that her consent had been given to the legacies only, and not to the whole settlement. Held that although it could not be inferred from the wife's signature to the deed that she gave any consent thereto further than the deed bore, her consent to the fourth purpose implied an acceptance of the liferent provided to her in the deed in lieu of terce and jus relictae.

—Mutual settlement.

In a mutual settlement, entered into by a husband and wife, the husband left to the wife £3000, "reserving to myself the full right of disposal by testamentary writing or otherwise of the whole remainder of my personal estate as well as my heritable estate, so far as not required for fulfilling the obligations hereby undertaken by me." The wife made over the whole of her estate to her husband. The husband died intestate. Held that the wife had not discharged her legal rights.

Wright's Trustees, (O.H.) 1897, 4 S.L.T. 358.

Implied exclusion — Marriage contract executed abroad.

Terms of an antenuptial marriage contract executed abroad in foreign form, between a domiciled Scotsman and a foreign lady, from which it was held that an exclusion of the jus relictae was to be implied.

—Marriage contract provisions declared not to be in full of jus relictae—Will declaring testamentary provisions should supersede marriage contract provisions.

A marriage contract declared that the wife's provisions therein contained "shall not in any way be held as in full of her terce, jus relictae, or other marital rights which she could legally claim" from the husband's representatives, but in the event of the husband dying intestate "shall only be reckoned as a payment to account of her legal share; and in the event of his leaving a will . . . shall unless specially mentioned in such will . . . be held to be over and above the provisions in her favour in such will." The husband left a will declaring that the provisions therein should supersede the marriage contract provisions. Held that the wife was entitled to claim jus relictae.

Mora.

A widow was maintained during the eleven years of her viduity by her eldest son, who was her husband's executor, during which time she made no claim for jus relictae. In an action brought by her representatives fifteen years after her death against the representatives of her son, held that the claim was not barred by mora and acquiescence.

Mackenzie v Mackenzie's Trustees, 1873, 11 M. 681; 45 J. 433; 10 S.L.R. 470.

Discharge during marriage—Revocability.

A wife who had married without a marriage contract signed a will, which was executed by her husband, in token of her consent to accept a liferent of his whole estate in lieu of her legal rights. Eighteen months after her husband's death she claimed her legal rights. Held that she was entitled to do so.

Taylor v Taylor's Trustees, (O.H.) 1897, 5 S.L.T. 125.

Effect of discharge—Right to jus relictæ out of funds falling into intestacy—Provision by inter vivos deed in full of legal claims.

By antenuptial contract the husband bound himself and his heirs to pay his wife after his death an annuity of £250 during her life, which provision she accepted "in full satisfaction of all terce of lands, legal share of moveables, and every other thing that she, jure relictæ or otherwise, could ask, claim, or demand from the said" husband, "or his heirs, executors, and representatives, by and through his death, if she shall survive him." The husband predeceased his wife, intestate and leaving a large amount of moveable estate. Held, in a question between the widow and the children of the marriage, that the widow was not entitled jure relictæ to one-third of the moveable estate left by the husband, and that the whole of that estate fell to the children of the marriage.

Sim v Sim, 1901, 4 F. 944.

Testamentary provision accepted—Right to claim jus relictæ out of funds falling into intestacy.

[See Nos. 1467 to 1470, infra.]

(112)

Construction of discharge — "Right or claim competent to widow"—Mournings.

A widow's allowance for mournings is a privileged debt due by her husband's estate, and is not discharged by her acceptance of provisions under her husband's will which are therein declared to be "in full satisfaction of all terce of lands, jus relictæ, or legal share of moveables, and any other right or claim competent to her" through his decease.

(3) JUS RELICTI.

(113)

Nature of jus relictæ.

Jus relictæ is in the nature of a debt which attaches to the wife's free succession after the claims of onerous creditors and the expenses of the executor in making up a title to and realising the estate have been satisfied. It is a certain share of the wife's estate, fixed, so far as regards value, as at the date of her death; and, when the estate has been duly realised, no change in its value occurring in the course of the executor's subsequent administration will, apart from specialities, affect the amount of the jus relictæ.

Russel v Attorney-General, 1917 S.C. 28; 54 S.L.R. 32; 1916, 2 S.L.T. 207.

Married Women's Property Act, 1881, secs. 3 (2) and 6—Marriage prior to Act.

Held that sec. 3, sub-sec. (2), of the Married Women's Property Act, 1881, is applicable only to the preceding provisions of the Act, and does not restrict the application of sec. 6 to the case of marriages contracted after the passing of the Act.

A woman, who was married in 1878, died in 1882, without issue, intestate, and domiciled in Scotland, possessed of moveable estate, to part of which she had succeeded before her marriage and before the Married Women's Property Act, 1881, was passed, and to part after her marriage and after that Act was passed. In an action at the instance of her husband against her executrix and next of kin, held that her husband was entitled to the half of her whole moveable estate under sec. 6 of the Act.

Divorce not equivalent to death.

Held that sec. 6 of the Married Women's Property (Scotland) Act, 1881, which confers a jus relictæ on a surviving husband, applies only upon the death of a wife, and that a decree of divorce pronounced against a wife is not equivalent to her death in the sense of the Act.

Marriage contract executed prior to 1881—Wife's estate conveyed to trustees for her behoof—Renunciation of jus mariti—Husband entitled to jus relictæ.

By an antenuptial marriage contract entered into prior to the passing of the Married Women's Property Act, 1881, which dealt exclusively with the wife's estate, the wife conveyed to trustees her moveable estate with directions to them to hold the same "for behoof of herself, whom failing, then for behoof of her own representatives . . . excluding always the jus mariti and right of administration of her said intended husband, and the debts and diligence of his creditors," and "in order that this trust and arrangement may receive effect" the husband renounced his jus mariti and right of administration over the estate so conveyed. The wife died leaving children of the marriage, but without having executed any further writing disposing of her estate. Held that the husband was entitled, under sec. 6 of the Act of 1881, to one-third of his wife's estate.

By antenuptial marriage contract, entered into in 1862, a wife conveyed to trustees her whole estate, heritable and moveable, for payment of the free yearly income to herself during her life, exclusive of her husband's jus mariti and right of administration, and after her death for payment to her husband of an alimentary liferent of it, which was to cease on his entering into a second marriage. On the death of the spouses the capital was to be conveyed and paid to the issue of the marriage, if any, and failing them, in the event of the wife predeceasing the husband, to the wife's "own heirs whomsoever." The wife predeceased her husband, and there was no issue of the marriage. She left no further writing disposing of her estate. The husband took no benefit from his liferent, and married a second time shortly afterwards. Held that the husband was entitled, under sec. 6 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1881, to take one-half of his wife's estate.

Simons' Trustee v Neilson, 1890, 18 R. 135; 28 S.L.R. 119.

Husband's claim for jus relictii inconsistent with terms of marriage contract.

By antenuptial contract of marriage, dated in 1874, the wife conveyed her whole estates acquisita et acquirenda to trustees, for the purpose, inter alia, that in the event of the dissolution of the marriage by her death, without issue, her husband should enjoy the liferent of her whole estates, the trustees being, in that event, directed to hold the fee for behoof and at the absolute disposal of the wife or her heirs or assignees. The husband, inter alia, renounced his "jus mariti and rights of courtesy and of administration in, of, and in relation to the whole estate and effects, heritable and moveable, now owing and belonging, or which may hereafter be owing and belonging to" the wife. The marriage was dissolved in 1883 by the death of the wife, intestate, and without issue. The husband thereafter for several years enjoyed the liferent of his wife's estate, and then claimed one-half of the moveable estate, in virtue of the Married Women's Property (Scotland) Act, 1881, sec. 6. Held that the husband's claim was inconsistent with the provisions of the marriage contract.

By antenuptial contract of marriage, dated in 1871, between spouses who were married in that year, the wife conveyed to trustees the sum of £450, for payment of the interest to herself during her life, and on her death to her husband during his life if he should survive her, and on the death of the longest liver of the spouses, for payment of the principal sum to the children of the marriage and their descendants equally per stirpes, and if there should be no issue or descendants of issue "then the whole balance of said trust estate remaining under the management of said trustees shall be paid to the heirs, executors, and successors whomsoever of the said" wife. These liferent interests were not to be subject to the husband's jus mariti. The marriage was dissolved by the death of the wife in 1899. No children were born of the marriage. The wife left a mortis causa settlement disposing of her whole property. The husband claimed one-half of the whole moveable estate left by his wife, including one-half of the £450 conveyed by her to the marriage contract trustees, as falling to him jure relictii, and also the liferent of the balance of the £450 thereafter remaining in the hands of the marriage contract trustees. Held by the whole Court that the legal rights of the husband in the £450 conveyed to the marriage contract trustees were restricted to the liferent provision, and did not include any part of the fee.

Wife conferring on husband liferent of her whole estate—Husband's right to claim jus relictii.

A wife by antenuptial trust deed conveyed the whole estate then belonging to her, or which she should acquire during the subsistence of the marriage, to trustees to hold for herself in liferent and her children in fee, and, failing children, she directed her trustees to pay or convey the estate to her assignees or disponees, whom failing to her lawful heirs. The husband knew of the deed, and after the marriage signed along with his wife the necessary transfers to the trustees. The marriage was dissolved by the death of the wife. There were no children. She left a trust disposition and settlement by which she gave her husband a liferent alimentary provision of the free annual proceeds of her estate, and directed her trustees on his death or second marriage to realise the estate and to pay and make over the residue to the children of her brother and sister. Held that the husband was entitled to claim one-half of his wife's estate as jus relictii in place of the provision made for him in the trust disposition and settlement.

(4) LEGITIM.

(a) Generally.

(121)

Per Lord President Inglis—"Legitim is a debt due by the entire free executry, and does not constitute a burden upon one part of the estate more than upon another."

Division of deceased's estate—Survivance of divorced husband and child.

When a wife was survived by a husband whom she had divorced for desertion and a child, held that the proper division of the estate for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of legitim was tripartite.

Gavin's Trustees v Walker's Trustees, (O.H.) 1907, 15 S.L.T. 681.

———Heritable bond—Deceased survived by widow and children—Children's share.

Held that when a man leaves a widow and children, and part of his estate consists of a bond which is heritable quoad jus relictæ, and moveable quoad legitim, the children are entitled to one-half of the sum in the bond as legitim.

———Heir disinherited.

Held that an heir has the same right to legitim as any other child in the event of his collating and that where he has been disinherited by his father's will he must be counted as one of the children entitled to share on the legitim fund.

Cairns v Cairns' Trustees, (O.H.) 1916, 1 S.L.T. 42.

Acceptance of testamentary provision—One son not claiming legitim.

A father left two sons, in whose favour he made certain provisions by will. One of the sons brought a declarator that, in the event of the other not claiming his legal rights, the pursuer would be entitled to claim the whole legitim fund. Held that he would only be entitled to claim half of the fund.

Stewart v Stewart's Trustees, (O.H.) 1909, 1 S.L.T. 340.

(126)

A testator died leaving two children. The elder, who was the heir at law, accepted his conventional provisions, but the younger claimed legitim. The testator's heritage was entirely disposed of by the will, the elder child receiving thereunder a qualified liferent of one-half of the testator's estate. Held (1) that the younger child had only right to one-half of the legitim fund, the other half enuring to the testator's general dispoonees in substitution for the provision which the elder son had accepted; but (2) that the elder son was bound to collate the value of the liferent interest so far as payable out of heritage, and that the value of that interest fell to be added to the legitim fund.

Smith's Trustees v Smith, (O.H.) 1912, 1 S.L.T. 484.

Right of grandchild to claim legitim—Representation—Intestate Moveable Succession Act, 1855.

A testator died in 1867 survived by three sons, Alexander, James, and John. James died survived by children. Thereafter John died intestate and childless without having elected between legitim and the provisions made to him in his father's settlement. Alexander was appointed John's executor.

A daughter of James sued Alexander as such executor for a share of the legitim which John might have claimed. Alexander having pleaded that James was personally barred from claiming in respect of that legitim and that the pursuer as representing her father under the Intestate Moveable Succession Act of 1855, was equally barred, held that she claimed in her own right and was not barred.

Division of legitim fund—Heir not claiming legitim—Whether heir counted as a child in division of fund.

A testator, by his trust disposition and settlement, directed his trustees, inter alia, to convey his heritable property to his eldest son (who also succeeded his father as heir of entail in possession of certain other lands), and, further, to make over the residue of his estate to him. The testator was survived by his eldest son, who accepted the conventional provisions in his favour, and by younger children. Held, in a question with younger children claiming legitim, that, unless the eldest son collated the heritage falling to him under the testator's settlement and his interest as heir of entail, he could not be counted as a caput (for the benefit of the residuary estate) in the division of the legitim fund; but that the whole fund would fall to be divided among the children claiming legitim.

Child claiming legitim—Right to aliment and education out of father's estate.

A testator conveyed his estate to trustees for payment of his whole estate to his wife, subject to payment of his debts and to the cost of upbringing and maintaining his children. Held that the children were entitled to legitim out of the testator's moveable estate and also to the expense of their upbringing and education out of the remainder of the estate, but only in so far as the shares of legitim were insufficient for these purposes.

Urquhart's Executors v Abbott, 1899, 1 F. 1149; 36 S.L.R. 896; 7 S.L.T. 114.

Wife's legitim—Whether vesting in husband ipso jure—Right of husband's executor.

A left a settlement whereby he made a provision for his daughter, B, which was declared to be exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration of her husband. After the death of A, his widow and three children, including B (whose husband had deserted her) entered into a minute of agreement, whereby they agreed to hold that the estate was intestate succession, and proceeded to divide it among themselves. The husband of B was no party to this agreement, nor, though he afterwards returned and lived with his wife for a short time, did he either approve of or challenge it. After the death of B's husband, held that when B's right to legitim emerged on the death of her father, the same did not vest in her husband ipso jure, and that whether he could have claimed it effectually or not his executor was not entitled to claim it. Opinions that B's husband would not have been entitled to claim her legitim.

(132)

Liability for interest—Personal bar—Delay in claiming legitim—Interest not due.

Rate—Delay in payment of legitim.

Held (per Lord Fraser, Ordinary) that interest at five per cent. is due upon a claim for legitim which an executor delays to pay without justifiable excuse.

Held that interest at the rate of five per cent. per annum was due upon a child's legitim from the date of the father's death, although the funds in the hands of the father's testamentary trustees had been earning only about two per cent.

Election delayed owing to minority.

Where a son raised an action for payment of legitim thirteen years after his father's death, and election could not, owing to the son's minority, have been made at an earlier date, the Court held that the father's executrix was only liable in interest on the son's legitim at the rate which the money would have earned under prudent administration, and found her liable in interest at the rate of 4 per cent., that being the rate which the estate was admitted to have earned.

Ross v Ross, 1896, 23 R. 802; 33 S.L.R. 607; 4 S.L.T. 41.

An only child, who was thirteen years of age at the date of her father's death, was entitled under his will to the income of his estate after deducting two small annuities. On attaining majority she claimed and received legitim. During her minority her father's trustees, in terms of the will, had applied for her behoof the whole free income of the trust estate. The income applied for her behoof amounted to four per cent. on the legitim. Held that the daughter was not entitled to the difference between the sums received and five per cent. on the legitim. Grant v Grant's Trustees, 1898, 25 R. 948; 35 S.L.R. 740; 6 S.L.T. 38.

(c) Exclusion and Discharge.

(i) Exclusion by Parent's Antenuptial Contract.

(137)

Where no provision.

Question, whether an antenuptial marriage contract can effectually exclude the right of a child of the marriage to legitim when it contains no provision for him in place thereof. Opinion (per Lord Fraser, Ordinary) that it cannot.

Illusory share.

By antenuptial marriage contract a provision in favour of the children of the marriage was made, subject to a power of appointment by the spouses. The contract contained a stipulation that no appointment should be invalid by reason of the smallness of the amount appointed to any of the children. The provisions in favour of children were declared to be in full of legitim. Held that the stipulation as to the validity of appointments was a lawful stipulation, and that a claim for legitim was excluded, notwithstanding that the share appointed to the claimant was illusory.

Ramsay v Ramsay's Trustees, (O.H.) 1904, 12 S.L.T. 654.

Construction of marriage contract—“Children of this marriage”—Eldest son and heir of entail.

An heir of entail in possession, in an antenuptial marriage contract, provided an annuity to his wife, and made certain provisions for the children of the marriage other than, and excluding, the heir who should succeed to the entailed estates. Then followed clauses appointing tutors and curators to such of the children of the marriage as might be in pupilarity or minority at their father's death, and special instructions were given for the maintenance and education of the heir of entail out of the income of the entailed estates. There was no other reference to him. The contract then proceeded—“Which provisions before conceived in favour of the children of this marriage are hereby declared to be in full satisfaction to them” of legitim and executry. Held that the provisions referred to conferred no benefit, contingent or otherwise, upon the eldest son of the granter, and that therefore the clause declaring them to be in full of legitim did not apply to him.

Countess-Dowager of Kintore v Earl of Kintore, 1886, 13 R. (H.L.) 93; 11 App. Cas. 394; 23 S.L.R. 877.

English marriage contract—Construction.

In an action for legitim brought by the only child of a domiciled Scotsman against the executrix of his father, the defender alleged that the pursuer's claim was excluded by an antenuptial marriage contract executed by his parents when domiciled in England. The defender averred that by this deed two sums of £5000 and £6000 were conveyed by the spouses respectively in trust for behoof of the children of the marriage, and that according to the law of England the provisions made in the marriage contract in favour of the issue of the marriage operated as a full discharge of all legal and other claims which the issue so provided for could prefer against the succession of their parents, or in respect of the death of either of them, and that the pursuer had accepted these provisions, and by so doing had discharged all other claims against his father's estate. Held that the defender's averments in regard to the terms of the marriage contract and its effect by the law of England were not relevant averments of such a deed as by the law of Scotland would exclude a claim for legitim.

(141)

Mother's estate—Marriage contract dated in 1848—Bairns' part of gear—Married Women's Property Act, 1881, secs. 7 and 8.

An antenuptial marriage contract, executed in 1848, declared that the provisions therein made for the child or children of the marriage should be in full satisfaction "of all bairns' part of gear, executry, and everything else which they could respectively claim or demand by and through the decease of" their mother. The mother having died in 1899, a son, who had taken his provision under the marriage contract, claimed also, under the Married Women's Property Act, 1881, legitim from such part of his mother's moveable estate as did not fall under the marriage contract, and which she had disposed of by will. Held that the son's claim to legitim from his mother's estate was excluded by the above clause in the marriage contract.

—Liferent of whole estate to surviving spouse — Married Women's Property Act, 1881, secs. 7 and 8.

By antenuptial marriage contract, dated in 1856, the wife disposed her whole estate to the spouses in conjunct liferent, for their liferent use allenarly, and to herself and her heirs and assignees in fee. The wife died in 1896, survived by her husband and by two children. Held that the husband's right of liferent was not affected by a child's right to legitim from his mother's moveable estate arising under the Married Women's Property Act of 1881, and that the executor could not be called upon to pay away any part of the wife's moveable estate until the right of liferent was satisfied.

—Marriage contract—Conveyance of whole estate — Married Women's Property Act, 1881, sec. 8.

By antenuptial marriage contract a wife had conveyed her whole estate to her husband. Held that a claim to legitim out of the wife's estate by one of the children of the marriage was excluded by sec. 8 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1881, in respect that the claim if successful would affect the marriage contract.

(ii) Discharge of Right to Legitim.

(145)

Onerous or gratuitous.

A bankrupt executed a deed of discharge whereby, on the narrative that he had received various advances of money from his father, and that it was reasonable and proper that "in respect of such advances" he should execute the discharge after written, he exonerated and discharged his father, his heirs and executors, of any legitim which he could claim through the death of his father. Held that the deed was not to be construed as conditional upon the father's claim for repayment of the advances being discharged, but was a gratuitous discharge of the son's right to legitim.

(147)

—Mora.

The tenant of a small farm died intestate, survived by his wife, two sons, and a daughter. No executor was appointed, and no claims were then made by any of the family on the estate of the deceased. The second son, who had remained in family with his parents (the eldest son having gone to reside elsewhere), became tenant of the farm and took possession of the implements thereon at the time of his father's death, and worked the farm with the assistance of his mother and sister. The mother died intestate seventeen years after her husband at the age of seventy-seven. The eldest son then brought an action of count, reckoning, and payment against his brother praying for payment of sums in name of legitim and as one of the next of kin of his father, with interest from the father's death. A proof showed that the father left estate, consisting solely of the stock and implements on the farm, of an estimated value of £165. The pursuer deposed that he did not put forward his claim on his father's estate sooner because he did not wish to disturb matters while his mother was alive. Held that the pursuer was not barred from claiming on his father's estate, and was entitled to sums in name of legitim and as one of his father's next of kin, but without interest. Wick v Wick, 1898, 1 F. 199; 36 S.L.R. 180.

Provision in son's antenuptial marriage contract.

A father in his son's antenuptial marriage contract bound himself to leave to his son's marriage contract trustees one full third part in value of the residue of his estate. The provision was not declared to be in satisfaction of the son's legitim. By his will the father directed his executor to carry out the marriage contract obligation. Held that the provision in the marriage contract being a debt due by the father at his death, not expressed to be in satisfaction of legitim, the son was not thereby barred from claiming legitim.

Renunciation of "all claim in whatever effects or money my father may leave"—Construction.

A son during his father's lifetime wrote out and signed a holograph document in these terms—"Having received and had expended for me much more than my share I renounce all claim to any share in whatever effects or money my father may leave at his death." Held that upon a just construction of this document it constituted a discharge of the son's right to legitim.

Discharge by married woman—Jus administrationis—Married Women's Property Act, 1881, sec. 1, sub-sec. (2).

charge a claim to legitim without her husband's consent.

Miller v Galbraith's Trustees, 1886, 13 R. 764; 23 S.L.R. 533.

(iii) Payments to Account of Legitim.

(151)

Advances for personal advancement.

Advances were made by a father to a son for purchase of a commission in the army and of steps of promotion. Held that they must be imputed in a claim by the son for legitim, although the other children entitled to legitim had since their father's death discharged their claims.

(153)

A father was survived by a son and four married daughters. In the marriage contracts of his daughters he had settled considerable sums upon them in liferent, and on their children in fee. By his trust disposition and settlement he left to his son a provision in full of legitim, and directed his trustees to pay and make over the residue of his estate to the respective marriage contract trustees of his daughters, in certain proportions, for their behoof in full of legitim. The daughters acquiesced in the settlement, but the son claimed legitim. Held that as the daughters' claims to legitim had been abandoned, not assigned, the son could not demand that advances made to them during their father's life should be collated in fixing his share of the legitim fund.

Only one child claiming legitim.

Where only one of several children claims legitim, the rest having accepted testamentary provisions in lieu thereof, there is no room for collatio inter liberos, and the legitim fund consists of one-half or one-third, as the case may be, of the free estate, without imputation of advances made by the parent in his lifetime either to the child claiming or to any of the other children.

(155)

Special contract between father and son.

A son, who had received advances from his father, granted a written acknowledgment which, after acknowledging receipt of certain sums, was in these terms:—"I further acknowledge that these various sums are all payments to me on account of the share of legitim or bairn's part of gear that may become due to me by and through your decease, and which share of legitim or bairn's part of gear is now discharged by me to that extent." After the father's death the son brought an action against his father's trustees and others, in which he concluded for declarator that, in the event of his electing to claim legitim, he was not bound, in a question with the trustee, to collate the sums advanced to him, nor were the trustees entitled to set off these sums against his claim to legitim, but that these sums only fell to be collated in a question with his brothers and sisters in the event of their electing to claim legitim. The Court assailed the defenders from the above conclusion—per Lord President Dunedin and Lord Kinnear, on the ground that the father, in bargaining with the son, had bargained on account of his general estate and not on account of the legitim fund, and that consequently the trustees were entitled to set off the advances made to the son against his claim for payment of his share of legitim—per Lord Johnston, on the ground that the trustees were entitled, as in right of the children who might accept conventional provisions in lieu of legitim, to require the son receiving advances to collate.

Sums advanced by a father to children on condition that they should be imputed towards legitim or other legal rights.

A father during his lifetime advanced a sum of £30,000 to his second son, who granted a receipt acknowledging that the advance was paid to, and accepted by, him on the footing that it was "to be imputed towards any legal rights" that might be claimed by him out of his father's estate on his death. By the antenuptial contract of marriage of one of his daughters the father assigned to the marriage contract trustees certain stocks declared to represent a capital value of £12,000. The marriage contract contained the following provision:—"It is hereby specially stipulated and agreed on that in the event of the (daughter) after the death of her father . . . effectually claiming from his estate legitim or other legal rights the said sum of twelve thousand pounds sterling . . . shall be held to be imputed as a payment to account of said legitim or other legal rights so effectually claimed." After his daughter's marriage the father paid a further sum of £742 10s. to the marriage contract trustees, who granted a receipt, acknowledging that the sum was to be held by them subject to the provisions and to be applied for the purposes of the contract of marriage. Held, in a question between the father's testamentary trustees and the son and daughter claiming legitim (1) that these sums did not fall to be added to the father's general estate before ascertaining the amount of the legitim fund; (2) that the trustees were not entitled to deduct these sums from the claimants' respective shares of the legitim fund; but (3) that the sums must be collated by the children inter se.

A plea requiring collation inter liberos in answer to a claim for legitim can only be maintained by a party entitled to share in the legitim, and not by trustees representing the interests of the residuary legatee.

Gift or advances.

Large cash advances were made by a father to a son in business, and were entered in the father's books as "By gifts payable to my son James as he required it"; "By allotted for his business, free gift"; and "By given over as free gift." Held, in a question as to collation inter liberos that the advances were advances to account of legitim.

A father, during his lifetime, transferred certain stocks, of the value of £26,442 6s. 6d., to a younger son, but took no receipt for them. By his trust disposition and settlement he bequeathed a legacy of £10,000 to the son under the declaration that "the said legacy is intended by me to be and shall be in addition to the gift recently made by me to my said son of £26,442 6s. 6d. sterling by transferring to him railway stocks representing that value; and I provide and declare further that the acceptance of the foresaid provisions in favour of my said son . . . shall be deemed and taken to be in satisfaction to him of legitim and executry and of all claims competent to him upon my decease." The amount of the net moveable estate left by the father at his death exceeded £300,000. Held that the £26,442 6s. 6d. was an advance to account of legitim, and, accordingly, fell to be collated by the son in the event of his claiming legitim.

Advances for commission in army.

Advances were made by a father to a son (without taking an obligation to repay) for purchase of a commission in the army and of steps of promotion. Held that the advances were to be regarded as advances to account of legitim, not as debts.

Nisbet's Trustees v Nisbet, 1868, 6 M. 567; 40 J. 293; 5 S.L.R. 369.

—Sum settled on daughter in liferent and children in fee—Interest.

Where a father, in his daughter's marriage contract, settled a sum on her in liferent, and on her children in fee, question (1) whether the capital sum, or merely the daughter's liferent interest, was subject to collation; and (2) whether interest on the sum to be collated fell to be included.

Testamentary direction to pay legitim.

A testator, who was survived by two daughters, provided in his settlement "for payment to each of them of their or her respective claims or claim of legitim from my estate." One of his daughters, who had kept house for him for many years, had received certain inter vivos gifts and payments from him. In an action brought by the other daughter for declarator that her sister was bound, as a condition of sharing in the legitim fund, to collate these inter vivos gifts and payments, held that the settlement did not confer on the daughters a conventional bequest of sums equal to their shares of the legitim fund, but merely directed the trustees to satisfy the claims arising ex lege, and, accordingly, that these claims were subject to all their common law incidents, including collation.

Interest on advances.

Where an advance by a parent to a child falls to be brought into collation by the child claiming legitim, interest on the advance from the date when it was made need not, in the absence of evidence of a contrary intention by the parent, be added to the capital sum. Held, accordingly, that, where a father during his lifetime made advances to younger children, some upon the express footing that they were to be imputed towards any legal rights or legitim which the child might claim after the father's death and others without any such declaration, interest did not fall to be added to the capital amount of the advances which the children were required to collate inter se when claiming legitim.

IV. CONSTITUTION AND VALIDITY OF TESTAMENTS.

1. NUNCUPATIVE WILLS.

(170)

A donation mortis causa to be administered for behoof of others according to verbal directions, was held to be a nuncupative will, and therefore invalid both as a donation and as a will.

Thomson, &c. v Dunlop, 1884, 11 R. 453; 21 S.L.R. 277.

Direction to divide residue according to oral instructions—Nuncupative legacies.

A testatrix directed her trustees to divide the residue of her estate according to her wishes as expressed orally to A. In an action of multiplepounding raised by the trustees A averred that the testatrix had told her that she wished £100 to be given to the poor of Inveraray parish and A to take the rest. Held that it was incompetent to prove these instructions by parole or by the oath of A, that the residue had fallen into intestacy, but that A and the inspector of poor of Inveraray were entitled to prove by parole legacies in their favour of £8 6s. 8d.

Turner's Trustees v M'Fadyen, (O.H.) 1906, 43 S.L.R. 712; 14 S.L.T. 57.

Parole agreement between two persons to divide funds destined by statute to survivor—Proof of authority to agents to conclude such an agreement—Writ or oath.

Certain funds were by a private Act of Parliament destined to A in liferent and to the survivor of himself and his nephew B in fee. After the death of A his representatives brought an action against B, the survivor, concluding for declarator that it had been agreed between A and B that on the death of either the funds in question should be divided equally between the survivor and the representatives of the predeceaser, and for payment of one-half of the funds. The pursuers averred that a final agreement to this effect had been concluded by parole between the agents of the parties, acting upon their express instructions, and that a deed giving effect to the agreement had been revised and approved in draft and extended, but that A had died before the deed was signed by either party. They further averred that it was agreed that there should be no suspension of the agreement pending the execution of the formal deed. Held that the alleged agreement could only be proved by writ or oath, on the ground that the contract averred was of an unusual and innominate character.

(Per Lord M'Laren)—“A right of succession constituted by writing can only be transferred by writing.”

2. FORMALITIES OF EXECUTION.

[See WRIT II.]

3. DOCUMENTS WRITTEN IN PENCIL.

(173)

A testamentary deed is not invalid because it is written in pencil.

Simson v Simson, 1883, 10 R. 1247; 20 S.L.R. 831.

(174)

Pencil codicil.

Held that a codicil written in pencil is effectual if it be clear that it is a testamentary writing, and not merely a jotting.

Muir's Trustees, 1869, 8 M. 53; 42 J. 25; 7 S.L.R. 24.

Pencil alterations on will written in ink.

Unsigned pencil alterations made by a testator on a testament written in ink are presumed to be deliberative merely, but if there is evidence, parole or otherwise, to show that they were intended to be final they will receive effect.

Lamont v Magistrates of Glasgow, 1887, 14 R. 603; 24 S.L.R. 426.

Pencil alterations on holograph will.

Held that unauthenticated holograph pencil alterations on a holograph will written in ink had no effect.

Currie's Trustees v Currie, 1904, 7 F. 364; 42 S.L.R. 297; 12 S.L.T. 613.

4. CONVEYANCE OF HERITAGE.

Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868—31 & 32 Vict. c. 101, sec. 20.

(179)

Conveyance in English will.

Held that an English will containing a conveyance of Scottish heritage was a valid conveyance thereof under the Titles to Land

Consolidation Act, 1868, sec. 20, the deed having been duly executed as a testamentary writing, although prior to the Act it would not have been received as a probative deed by the law of Scotland.

Connell's Trustees v Connell, 1872, 10 M. 627; 44 J. 352; 9 S.L.R. 394.

Omission of word "dispone" in deed prior to 1868.

Held that a mortis causa conveyance of heritage executed by a person who died prior to the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868, was invalid, in respect that the word "dispone" was not used.

No words of direct conveyance.

Held that under sec. 20 of the Titles to Land (Consolidation) Act, 1868, a mortis causa deed in which the testator appointed trustees, empowered them to "realise all his heritable and moveable property," and directed them as to the disposal thereof, but which contained no words of direct conveyance or gift, was sufficient to carry the testator's heritable as well as his moveable estate. Observed that the statute puts heritage precisely in the same position as moveables when dealt with in a testamentary writing.

Writing insufficient per se to carry heritage—Clause in general disposition declaring informal memoranda binding on donee.

The proprietrix of a landed estate disposed of her whole property by a mortis causa disposition and settlement, which contained a declaration that any memorandum signed by her, however informal, expressive of her will should be equally binding upon her donee "as if forming part of these presents." She afterwards, by a holograph writing which of itself was insufficient as a conveyance of heritage, bequeathed to third parties during their lives the income arising from the minerals on her estate. Held that the memorandum and the settlement must be read together, so that the donee taking under the settlement was subject to the burden of the liferent.

Fee in pendente.

A testator, by a holograph will, left a heritable estate by direct destination to his two sisters equally between them and to the survivor; and he provided that, should neither of them have children, the destination of the estate should be to them in liferent only, and to a charitable institution in fee; but that, should either of them have a child, the liferent destination should lapse, and the estate should vest in his said sisters or sister in fee. Held that, as the proviso involved a feudal impossibility, viz., a suspended fee of heritage, it was of no effect, and could not qualify the original gift of fee to the sisters; and accordingly that the estate vested in them in fee a morte testatoris. Observations (per Lord Johnston) on the application of the doctrine of vesting subject to defeasance to destinations of heritage.

Direct disposition to A in liferent only and "after his death" to trustees.

A executed a disposition of the lands of K to B his son in liferent, for his liferent use only, and "after his death" to "the Provost of Aberdeen" and the holders of certain other offices, "all for the time being, and their successors in their respective offices," and X, as trustees. The granter recorded this deed in the Books of Council and Session. A died, survived by his son B, who was his heir at law. B brought an action against the trustees for declarator that he was entitled to the fee of the lands of K as heir at law of his father, on the ground that the disposition of the fee to the trustees did not take effect until after his death. Held that the lands of K had been effectually disposed to B in liferent and to the trustees in fee.

Edmond v Lord Provost of Aberdeen, 1898, 1 F. 154; 35 S.L.R. 193; 5 S.L.T. 230.

English entail of Scottish heritage—Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868, secs. 19 and 20—Conveyancing Act, 1874, sec. 46.

An Englishman left a will in the English form by which, inter alia, he devised all such of his lands, &c., situate in the counties of Devon, of Inverness in Scotland, &c., as consisted of "freehold of inheritance," "to the use of my elder son, E F S, and his assigns, for his life, without impeachment of waste, and after the death of the said E F S to the use of the first and every other son of the said E F S successively, according to their respective seniorities, in tail male, with remainder to the use of," &c. It was admitted that this was a valid settlement "in tail male" of the English estates, according to the law of England. The testator left an estate in Inverness-shire held of a subject-superior. It was admitted that according to the law of England, the Inverness-shire estate would have been a "freehold of inheritance" had it been situated in England. Held (1) that under the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868, sec. 20, the testator's will must receive effect according to its true import and effect with reference to the Inverness-shire estate, and (2) that that import could receive effect substantially, without inconsistency with the practice or with the policy of the law of Scotland, by giving the pursuer a liferent allenerly, and the heir-male of his body in fee.

Studd v Cook, 1883, 10 R. (H.L.) 53; 8 App.Cas. 577; 20 S.L.R. 566.

Title—Character of interest conveyed—Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868, sec. 20.

Observed (per Lord Watson)—“In enacting that the words of the deed or writing shall be equivalent to a general disposition the legislature obviously did not intend to define the character of the rights and interests conferred upon the persons favoured by such deed or writing, but to indicate the means by which these persons were to obtain a complete feudal title. The only possible mode of ascertaining the precise character of these rights and interests is by an examination of the language of the deed or writing; and that language must be read and construed for the purpose of ascertaining the intention of the settlor, just as if the settlement had been of moveables, and not of heritable. When the intention of the settlor has been so ascertained the law of Scotland must give effect to it, in so far as is practicable consistently with the principles which govern the tenure of heritable estate in Scotland.”

Studd v Cook, 1883, 10 R. (H.L.) 53; 8 App.Cas. 577; 20 S.L.R. 566.

5. INFORMAL OR INCOMPLETE WRITINGS.

(187)

Holograph writing headed “Notes of intended settlement.”

In the repositories of a person who died leaving no other testamentary writing, the following holograph document was found bearing a date seven years before his death—“Bankhead, 19th June, 1873.—Notes of intended settlement by Walter Whyte of Bankhead. First, I liferent my wife, Mrs. Margaret Pollok or Whyte, in my whole estate both heritable and moveable, burdened with an annuity of £300 stg., three hundred pounds sterling, a year to,” &c. After various bequests expressed in the same full and careful manner, the writer's signature was appended. In an action of declarator that the writing was testamentary (in which a proof was led without throwing any additional light on the question), held that the document was testamentary.

Holograph pencil memorandum containing list of legacies.

Circumstances where held that a holograph pencil memorandum headed “Legacies,” and containing a list of names with sums of money appended to each, which was found tied up with a testator's will, was a valid testamentary document.

Holograph writing — “I desire to bequeath.”

A testator left a holograph testament containing a nomination of executors and a disposal of his whole means among certain legatees, along with another signed holograph writing of subsequent date, commencing “I desire to bequeath as follows,” and containing bequests and annuities to nearly the same parties as were mentioned in the first writing. It concluded, “balance left for further disposal,” but no other deed was discovered. Both writings were found in the testator's travelling bag. Held that the second writing was a testamentary writing.

Low's Executors, 1873, 11 M. 744; 45 J. 452; 10 S.L.R. 505.

Documents of debt pinned together with holograph writing importing legatum liberatims.

In the repositories of a deceased four I O U's and a letter from the borrower, acknowledging the sum for which one of them had been granted, were found pinned together and folded so that the back of the letter was outermost; and on the back of the letter there was a holograph note signed by the trustor, “I don't want this money paid up.” Held that the writing constituted a valid bequest in cancellation of the debts contained in the I O U's.

Completed deed or jotting.

Terms of a document dictated upon death-bed, and duly tested, held sufficiently complete to give it the character of a testamentary deed.

Simson v Simson, 1883, 10 R. 1247; 20 S.L.R. 831.

(192)

Letter to a beneficiary.

A letter addressed and sent to a beneficiary was held to be a writing of a testamentary nature, and to be read along with a will and codicils found in the testator's repositories.

Ritchie v Whish, 1880, 8 R. 101; 18 S.L.R. 81.

(193)

A lady died leaving a trust disposition and settlement, in terms of which her sister took the fee of her whole estate. The testatrix, some years after the execution of the will, handed to a friend a signed and dated letter in these terms—“I leave my railway papers in your hands. I wish my sister to have the interest in her lifetime, but at her death I want you, Harriet, Willie's wife, to have each one hundred, but you must not claim them in my sister's time, or you will loose them, you must know nothing about them.” The testatrix's sister, on the death of the testatrix, was confirmed her executrix. Some years later, on the death of the sister, the friend produced the letter, and claimed £100 from the sister's representative. Held that the letter was in effect a codicil to the will.

Richardson v Macdonald's Executor,
(O.H.) 1899, 7 S.L.T. 14.

(194)

"Sketch of provisions"—Words of gift.

A law agent sent to a lady client a paper entitled "Sketch of provisions of proposed will." The lady not merely filled in blanks in the "sketch," but wrote words, which were capable of being read by themselves without aid from the context, and which imported de presenti gifts of a testamentary character, and she dated and signed the document. Held that the document was a valid and effectual will.

Murdoch's Judicial Factor v Thomson,
(O.H.) 1896, 4 S.L.T. 155.

Docquet—"A from her father."

A man died survived by sons and daughters. When the deceased's repositories were opened there were found (1) a holograph testamentary writing undated and unsigned, and (2) a sealed envelope with the following holograph inscription on the front of it—"Beatrice Burn Roberts, from her father John Burn." This was found to contain a deposit receipt for £170 in favour of the deceased, but which was not indorsed by the deceased. Held that there was a valid bequest of the deposit receipt in favour of Beatrice Burn Roberts.

Roberts v Burn's Executor, (O.H.) 1914,
1 S.L.T. 509.

(196)

Holograph signed memorandum of bequests and legates—Unintelligible without extrinsic evidence.

A holograph pencil writing, headed "will," consisting of a column of figures and a column of proper and descriptive names (most of which were unintelligible without extrinsic evidence) opposite the figures, and signed by the writer at the side, was found after his death in a locked trunk along with his business papers and letters. Held that this writing could not receive effect as a testamentary document.

Observed (per Lord President Inglis) that it is not essential to the validity of a testamentary writing that it contain words of gift, or be expressed in the form of a completed sentence, provided it implies a clear testamentary purpose on the part of the deceased, and its meaning is intelligible.

Holograph writing—No words of gift.

Terms of two holograph writings found in the repositories of a deceased person who left a formal settlement, which were held not to be testamentary.

Holograph writing pinned to deposit receipt—£150 to Mrs. A—Bequest or inter vivos gift.

In the repositories of a testatrix, who had executed a formal trust disposition and settlement, there were found two deposit receipts, for £450 and £300 respectively. The receipts were in her name, and had been indorsed by her. To the receipt for £450 there was attached by a pin a slip of paper, on which was written in the testatrix's handwriting the words, "£150 to Mrs. Mackenzie, Dunkeld. £150 to Mrs. H. Croll, Stockel. £150 to Mrs. Thomson, Ancrum."—followed by the testatrix's signature. To the deposit receipt for £300 there was attached by a pin a slip of paper, on which was written in the testatrix's handwriting, the words, "John Cameron for annuity," followed by her signature. Held that these writings did not constitute valid testamentary bequests of the sums contained in the deposit receipts.

Holograph signed document headed "draft of codicil."

After the death of a person whose settlement, with two codicils thereto, had been prepared by law agents and formally executed, there was found in an open drawer, where no important papers were kept, a writing of later date, holograph of and signed by the deceased, headed "draft of codicil," containing a new disposition of his property in favour of his children, but with a blank in the ultimate destination of the estate failing children and their issue. He survived the date of this document for several months, and there was nothing to show that it had been signed subsequent to the date it bore. Held that the writing was a mere draft, and inoperative as a testamentary writing.

(200)

Holograph writing headed "Rough."

A testator died on 19th March, 1907, leaving in the hands of his law agent a trust disposition and settlement, dated 4th January, 1905, and five codicils annexed thereto, dated respectively 6th March, 1905, 1st October, 8th November, and 18th December, 1906, and 7th March, 1907. In the deceased's repositories was found a sealed envelope addressed to his law agent containing a holograph testamentary writing headed "Rough," signed by him, and dated 5th February, 1905. The settlement dated 4th January, 1905, left the residue to the testator's eldest son. The holograph writing of 5th February, 1905, left the residue to the testator's widow and her children. The codicil of 6th March, 1905, left to the widow and her children £2000 as an addition to the provision in the settlement. Circumstances in which held that the deceased did not intend the holograph writing to receive testamentary effect.

Letter to landlord's factor—Lease.

On the day of his death, a farmer wrote a letter to his landlord's factor in these terms—

"Dear Sir,—I beg to intimate that it is my wish that my nephew, Mr. James Beattie, residing at Powneed, should, after my decease, succeed me in the farm of Powneed." Circumstances in which held that the document was not testamentary.

Beattie v Bain's Trustees, (O.H.) 1899, 6 S.L.T. 277.

Memorandum to law agent found in repositories.

Held that a memorandum found in the repositories of a testatrix in these terms—"Mem. To let Mr. Tod" (her law agent) "know that I wish the bequest and the name of Cunningham to be erased from my settlement, and I do hereby desire it to be done. (Signed) Mary Murray"—was not a testamentary writing, and did not recall a legacy left to three ladies of the name of Cunningham by the deceased's trust settlement.

Letter expressing intention—Instructions to solicitor.

Declaration of intention to execute a will.

The will of a testator domiciled in Canada after stating that he desired to carry out the wishes of his first wife with reference to certain heritage in Scotland which came to him under her will, further bore—"To carry out the wishes of the said" wife "I do hereby declare that I intend to execute a will in accordance with the law of Scotland devising said real estate in Scotland to F P, his heirs and assigns." The will contained a residuary bequest. The testator never executed a will in accordance with Scots law devising the heritage to F P, although a mortis causa disposition doing so had been sent to him for execution five years before his death. Held that the heritable property was not carried to F P by the will, but fell under the residue clause.

6. CLAUSE VALIDATING INFORMAL WRITINGS.

(206)

"Writing under my hand"—Informal writing signed by testatrix.

A testatrix, by a formal trust disposition and settlement, dated 12th July, 1893, directed her trustees "to pay any legacies and to carry out any instructions I may give by any writing under my hand clearly expressive of my wishes, although the same may not be formal." An informal writing bearing the date 2nd August, 1893, neither holograph nor tested, but admittedly bearing the signature of the testatrix, and containing certain bequests, was found in her repositories. Held that the informal writing was a testamentary writing of the nature contemplated by the trust disposition, and must receive effect.

Unsigned holograph writing.

A testator by his settlement directed payment and fulfilment of all legacies and bequests left and bequeathed by, inter alia, "any writing under my hand (however informally executed or defective) showing my wishes or intentions." He left an unsigned and undated holograph memorandum apporportioning certain articles of furniture among certain persons. This memorandum he had handed to his law agents to be put up with his settlement. Held that the memorandum was not an operative testamentary writing.

"Memorandum signed by me however informal"—Informal conveyance of heritage.

The proprietrix of a landed estate disposed of her whole property by a mortis causa disposition and settlement, containing a declaration that any memorandum signed by her, however informal, expressive of her will, should be equally binding upon her disponees "as if forming part of these presents." She afterwards, by a holograph writing, which of itself was insufficient as a conveyance of heritage, bequeathed to third parties during their lives the income arising from the minerals on her estate. Held that this writing and the settlement must be read together, so that the disponee taking under the settlement was subject to the burden of the life rent.

7. NECESSITY FOR BENEFICIAL DISPOSAL OF ESTATE.

(210)

Directions to erect statues.

A testator by a holograph settlement appointed trustees, and directed that the revenue of his heritable property should be used for the purpose of erecting (1) monuments and statues of himself, his brothers, his sisters, and his father and mother; and (2) artistic towers to be built at prominent points on his estates. The making of the statues was to be given to Scottish sculptors. The testator declared that his wish was to encourage young and rising artists, and that for that purpose prizes were to be given for the best plans of the proposed statues, towers, &c., before building them. He also declared his wish to be that the trust should be perpetual. Held that by these purposes no beneficial interest was conferred upon any person, or class of persons, and that, consequently, they were not effectual to divest the heir at law.

A testator provided by his will that after the death of certain liferenters his estate should be given to the provost and town council of Ayr in trust, "in order that they or their successors in office may use the whole therefore in rebuilding the old bridge of Ayr when such a thing may be required." Held that the bequest was not void on the ground of remoteness.

8. REQUESTS CONTRARY TO PUBLIC POLICY.

Per Lord Kyllachy—"I consider that if it is not unlawful, it ought to be unlawful, to dedicate by testamentary disposition, for all time, or for a length of time, the whole income of a large estate—real and personal—to objects of no utility, private or public, objects which benefit nobody and which have no other purpose or use than that of perpetuating at great cost, and in an absurd manner, the idiosyncrasies of an eccentric testator. I doubt much whether a bequest of that character is a lawful exercise of the testamentary factio. Indeed, I suppose it would be hardly contended to be so if . . . the trustees were, for instance, directed to lay the trustor's estate waste, and keep it so; or to turn the income of the estate into money and throw the money yearly into the sea; or to expend the income in annual or monthly funeral services in the testator's memory; or to expend it in discharging from prominent points upon the estate salvoes of artillery upon the birthdays of the testator and his brothers and sisters. Such purposes would hardly, I think, be alleged to be consistent with public policy."

Directions irrational and wasteful, and conferring no benefit on any object—Public policy.

A testatrix (who was the last survivor of her family, and had no known heir at law) by a codicil directed her testamentary trustees to convert a large circular tower, built by her deceased brother on an eminence near Oban, into a private enclosure, and to erect therein bronze statues of her parents and their nine children, including one who died in infancy. There was no provision in the codicil as to the cost of each statue, except that it was not to be less than £1000, and this cost and the upkeep of the tower and the statues were made a first charge on the revenue of the trust estate. The trustees were directed to retain the statues and tower, and to maintain the same in all time coming. Held, in a question with postponed beneficiaries, that, in respect of their unreasonable, extravagant, and useless character, the directions were invalid, and could not receive effect. Opinions that the directions were contrary to public policy.

Mutual settlement by persons living in adultery.

A man and a married woman, who had been living in adultery for ten years, executed a mutual settlement in favour of the survivor, the woman leaving to her niece her clothes and jewels, which she had acquired after she had deserted her husband. Held that as there was nothing to show that continuance of the cohabitation was the inducing cause at least quoad the bequest to the niece, the deed to that extent was effectual.

Young v Johnson, 1880, 7 R. 760; 17 S.L.R. 545.

9. FALSA CAUSA.

(216)

Testamentary directions given under erroneous belief in fact.

A testator left a will appointing executors to deal with his general estate, and also a separate trust disposition conveying to trustees the heritable estate of Chesthill, of which he was proprietor. Prior to his death he had been in negotiation with the proprietor of a neighbouring estate for the purchase from him of certain fishing rights for the benefit of Chesthill, and the sale to him of certain farms on the Chesthill estate. He believed that the transaction had been finally arranged, but in point of fact no agreement binding in law upon the parties had been concluded at the date of his death. By a codicil to his will he directed the executors of his general estate to pay for the fishing rights, "which I have agreed to purchase," and authorised them to receive for his general estate "the amount arranged to be paid" for the farms. After his death, the Chesthill trustees, having obtained the authority of the Court, carried through the transaction with the neighbouring proprietor on the terms which the testator had been in process of arranging, and purchased from him the fishings for £2000, and sold to him the farms for £12,000, leaving a balance in their hands of £10,000. Held that the sum of £10,000 fell to be retained by the trustees for the purposes of their trust, in respect that the directions in the codicil, given with reference to an agreement which did not exist and under an erroneous belief in its existence, had no application to the transaction which had been voluntarily carried through as an act of administration by the Chesthill trustees.

Misdescription of event in which testator to succeed to settled fund.

A testator, on the narrative that under his father's trust disposition and settlement the interest of his sister in the residue of his father's estate was restricted to a life-rent, and that in the event of her deceasing without leaving issue, "the residue . . . will fall and belong to me or to my children as . . . intestate succession of my father," in order to provide for the disposal of the residue, "in the event of my succeeding to it," disposed to trustees "the whole residue of said estate . . . to which I shall succeed in the event of my being pre-deceased by" his sister without leaving issue. The sister survived her brother, but died without leaving issue, and the residue of the father's estate was held to have passed to the brother as intestate succession. Held that he had effectually disposed of it, notwithstanding the misdescription of the event on the occurrence of which his settlement was to take effect.

Fraser was nearest legitimate male issue of Lord Fraser. Held that even if he was not, the destination was good in his favour, the error in the cause of granting being immaterial.

10. UNCERTAINTY.

(1) GENERALLY.

(219)

Conveyance to trustees with power of disposal "in such manner as they shall deem proper."

The residuary clause of a trust disposition and settlement by which the truster's whole means and estate were conveyed to trustees for certain purposes was as follows:—"In the last place, with regard to the residue of my means and estate hereby conveyed, and after satisfying the legacies and bequests before mentioned, together with the legacy and other duties and expenses of discharges connected with my whole estate, I leave and bequeath the same to be disposed of by my said trustees in such manner as they may think proper, subject to such instructions and directions as I may hereafter make." Held that the clause was ineffectual to convey the residue.

(220)

Gift to relations or other persons to be selected by trustees.

A testatrix conferred power on her trustees to allocate and apply the residue of her estate and pay the free proceeds to "such of my relations or other persons who, in the option of my trustees, may be entitled to participate therein, including in this bequest such legatees as are herein named by myself, and that according to the sole direction of my trustees, who shall alone be the judges." Held that the bequest was void, as it left the disposal of the residue absolutely in the discretion of the trustees.

Estate to be dealt with "as my trustees shall deem best" failing direction.

A testator conveyed his whole estate to trustees "only in trust." In a clause dealing with residue he directed them "to hold, apply and convey on such conditions and under such restrictions as I may direct by any writing under my hand, and failing any such writing, then the same shall be dealt with and disposed of by my said trustees in such way or ways as my trustees shall deem best, my wish being that, failing such instruction, my trustees shall have full power and liberty to dispose of such residue in any manner that may approve itself to them." The testator left no further testamentary instructions. Held that the bequest was void from uncertainty.

(222)

By his trust disposition and settlement a testator directed, inter alia, "that after payment of the above legacies the residue of my estate, if any, shall be disposed at the discretion of my said trustees." Held that this direction was void from uncertainty.

(223)

Residue to be distributed "as my trustees deem wise and prudent."

(224)

Request to those who, to the knowledge of the trustee, respected the testatrix.

A testatrix begged her trustee to give the residue of her estate "to those whom you know respects me." Held that the destination was not void from uncertainty, as it was a direction to the trustee to give the residue to those who he knew respected (i.e., were kind to) the testatrix, but that a simple request to the trustee to "give to those who respected me" would have been bad, as there would have been no workable definition nor would any means have been provided for ascertaining who were meant.

Gift to servants, old friends, employees, "or others whom my trustees shall consider that I would wish to remember" — Memorandum of gifts.

Held that a direction to trustees to pay a specified portion of residue "to my domestic servants, old personal friends, in need, employees not otherwise included in any provision by me, or others whom my trustees shall consider that I would wish to remember," taken along with a holograph memorandum suggesting the proportions in which allocation should be made, was not void from uncertainty.

(226)

Direction to trustees to make payment to such of testator's children and children's children as they might think "most deserving."

A testator in his trust disposition and settlement, after providing for the disposal of the greater part of his estate among his children in the form of legacies, directed his trustees "from time to time, as they think proper, to make such special payments out of the free residue and remainder of my estate to such of my children and children's children as they may think most deserving, with special instructions to relieve any of them who may appear to be in want, provided always that they have not brought themselves into such circumstances by their own misconduct. My great desire is to assist merit and thrift, and not to acknowledge indolence or folly." The trust disposition contained no further directions as to the disposal of the residue. Held that the word "deserving" meant deserving of pecuniary assistance, and accordingly that the clause committed an intelligible and workable discretion to the trustees, and was not void from uncertainty. Question, whether the trust as to the residue was "charitable."

Money placed in daughters' names for behoof of A—Unrestricted power to dispose of unpaid balance.

A father placed money on deposit receipt in the names of his two daughters and on the same date delivered to them a memorandum for their guidance in administering the money for behoof of his son Archibald. He directed them to pay the sums to or for behoof of Archibald as they or the survivor might think proper. "Should the whole not be disposed of in the lifetime of Archibald, my said daughters may dispose of the balance in any way they should think proper." The son died when the daughters had paid one-half of the fund to him or for his behoof. Held that the direction to the daughters to dispose of the fund as they might think proper conferred no beneficial right on them, and did not constitute them trustees for behoof of Archibald, and that it was void from uncertainty.

Power to dispose to charities or to "any person."

A father bequeathed to the survivor of his children a share of the residue of his estate in liferent, with full power by mortis causa deed "to dispose of the same and direct the succession thereto in favour either of religious or charitable institutions one or more conducted according to Protestant principles or of any person or persons whom such survivor may appoint or partly in favour of such institution or institutions and partly in favour of such persons or person all in such terms and subject to such conditions as such survivor may think proper." The survivor exercised this power by a deed of directions in which he bequeathed this share of residue absolutely to his wife. Held that the power was valid and had been validly exercised.

Direction to carry on testator's house.

A testator by his trust disposition and settlement dated in 1877 left the residue of his estate to his daughters in liferent and their children in fee. In a holograph letter by the testator to his trustees the following passage occurred:—"In the event of my dying before Mrs. G S, my very dear sister-in-law, I solemnly request that you, my trustees, will see that my house at Row is carried on as in my lifetime." Held that this direction was too vague to receive effect.

of the railway company consisted of guaranteed shares of £100, but the testator held £460 ordinary stock, £310 preference consolidated stock, and £70 perpetual guaranteed stock, the two latter stocks bearing interest at 5 per cent. Held that the expression "guaranteed" as used by the testator meant other than ordinary and included preference stock, and that the bequest was not void for uncertainty.

—Bequest for promotion of phrenology.

A testator by his trust disposition and settlement directed that the residue of his estate should "be applied by my said trustees in whatever manner they may judge best for the advancement and diffusion of the science of phrenology, and the practical application thereof in particular, giving hereby and committing to my said trustees the most full and unlimited power to manage and dispose of the said residue in whatever manner shall appear to them best suited to promote the ends in view." Certain well-known phrenologists were nominated trustees with powers to assume new trustees for the general management of the funds, and with directions to assume as special trustees for the application of the residue "enlightened phrenologists" with powers to appoint like-minded successors ad perpetuum. Held that this bequest was not void from uncertainty.

Bursary for Gaelic-speaking persons—Biblical instruction—Lodgings.

A testatrix by a codicil to her trust settlement left a bequest to be administered by her trustees "as they see fit, if possible" (first) for a bursary "open to Gaelic-speaking students, whether attending school or college," and (second) for instruction for "Gaelic-speaking persons or children in biblical knowledge." By a subsequent codicil she gave the trustees powers "to use the bulk of my estates as they shall see best for Gaelic-speaking people either in helping the Russell Street Gaelic church, bursary, schools, or lodgings for Gaelic-speaking students." Held that the bequests were not void from uncertainty.

Macdonell's Trustees v Macdonell's Trustees, (O.H.) 1911, 2 S.L.T. 170.

Bequest to "bursary fund of university."

By his will a testator left the residue of his estate "to the bursary fund of the Aberdeen University to help in the education of poor and struggling youths of merit," and "in order to carry out and give effect to my wishes" he appointed two persons as executors. The various bursary endowments of the University were not merged in one general bursary fund, but each endowment was kept separate and devoted to the special purpose for which it was founded. By the Universities (Scotland) Act, 1889, the University Court were given power to administer funds mortified for bursaries. Held (1) that the bequest was valid and not void from uncertainty, and (2) that the University Court were entitled to receive and discharge the residue, on condition of submitting to the Court and obtaining approval of a scheme for the administration thereof as a bursary fund.

Milne's Executors v Aberdeen University Court, 1905, 7 F. 642; 42 S.L.R. 533; 13 S.L.T. 45.

Bequest for promotion of free thought.

A testator directed his trustees "to apply the whole residue of my means and estate for the purchasing of premises in the city of Edinburgh, to be used as a shop in which one of the objects is the sale of books dealing with the subject of free thought. Held that it was void from uncertainty.

Hardie v Morison, (O.H.) 1899, 7 S.L.T. 42.

Christian and benevolent purposes.

A trust settlement contained the following bequest:—"I direct that the whole residue of my estate shall be distributed as follows, viz.:—One-tenth thereof for Christian and benevolent purposes, chiefly in Aberdeen or Deeside district, at the discretion of my trustees." Held that the bequest was not void from uncertainty.

Smith's Trustees v Smith's Trustees, (O.H.) 1910, 2 S.L.T. 74.

Foreign missions—Executor having power to select.

A Scottish testator, by his holograph general settlement, provided—"The residue of my property I give and bequeath for the benefit of foreign missions in India, China, Africa, and South America, or any other in the foreign field suitable. I appoint the Rev. W. Watson, Kiltarn, as my executor, at a remuneration of £20 sterling." Held that the bequest was a bequest for charitable purposes, and was not void from uncertainty, the bequest being to a definite class, coupled with the appointment of a person (the executor) having power to select the objects falling within the class on whom the benefit of the bequest was to be conferred.

—Payment of salaries of native missionaries to preach gospel among heathen.

A testator by his holograph trust disposition and settlement provided that his trustees were to pay out of the income of his estate "the salaries of two native missionaries chosen of them, for preaching the gospel of Jesus Christ my Lord among the heathen," and that, on the winding up of his estate, they were to make provision "for these salaries to be continued to the societies they represent." In later clauses he referred to the missionaries as "christian native preachers," and to his scheme as one for "preaching the gospel of Jesus Christ as already named for foreign lands." No mention was made of the amount of the salaries to be paid. Held that the bequest—even on the assumption that it was not a charitable bequest—was not void from uncertainty; its objects, the method of its execution, the persons to be benefited, and the sphere of its operation, being all sufficiently defined by the testator.

—"Home missions."

Circumstances in which held, after proof, that a bequest to "home missions" was not void from uncertainty, but that the words were used to denote the home missions of the Free Church of Scotland.

Miller's Trustees v Kirkcaldy, (O.H.) 1905, 13 S.L.T. 454.

—Missionary purposes.

Held that a direction to trustees to apply residue "for such missionary purposes as they in their sole discretion may determine, keeping in view specially missions in Africa," was not void from uncertainty.

Adam's Trustees v Adam, (O.H.) 1908, 16 S.L.T. 144.

—Charitable or benevolent purposes—Missionary associations.

A testator directed his trustees to devote the residue of his estate to such charitable or benevolent purposes as they should think fit. By a subsequent testamentary writing he recommended that a part of the residue should be applied to missionary associations, the London City Mission being named as one of them. Held that this reference to missionary associations did not render the bequest, otherwise admittedly valid, too uncertain to receive effect.

Miln's Trustees v Drachenbauer, (O.H.) 1921, 1 S.L.T. 152.

Whether purposes of bequest wholly charitable—"Such charitable or public purposes as my trustee thinks proper."

A testatrix by a holograph codicil to her trust disposition and settlement directed that (in the events which happened) one-half of the residue of her estate "shall be applied for such charitable or public purposes as my trustee thinks proper." Held that the direction was void from uncertainty, in respect that the words "charitable or public" were used disjunctively, and that a bequest for such public purposes as a trustee might select was void, as it did not designate a particular class of objects from which the trustee might make a selection.

Blair v Duncan, 1901, 4 F. (H.L.) 1; [1902] A.C. 37; 39 S.L.R. 212; 9 S.L.T. 390.

—Public, benevolent, or charitable purposes in connection with the parish of L or the neighbourhood.

A testatrix directed her trustees to apply the residue of her estate "for such public, benevolent, or charitable purposes in connection with the parish of Lesmahagow or the neighbourhood in such sums and under such conditions as they in their discretion shall think proper." Held (1) that the clause was to be read as if it had been expressed "for public purposes, or benevolent purposes, or charitable purposes"; (2) that the phrase "public purposes," even with the local limitation, was too indefinite to receive effect; and, accordingly, that the whole bequest was void from uncertainty.

—"Benevolent, charitable, and religious institutions in Glasgow and Greenock"—Limited locality.

A testatrix directed her trustees to pay legacies to certain hospitals in Glasgow and Greenock, and a legacy to the missions connected with the Independent or Congregational Churches in Scotland to be distributed by the treasurer of Elgin Place Congregational Church, Glasgow. She then directed her trustees to divide the residue of her estate among "such of the other benevolent, charitable, and religious institutions in Glasgow and Greenock as they in their sole discretion may think proper." Held (1) that the residuary bequest was in favour of benevolent institutions, charitable institutions, or religious institutions, and was not limited to institutions possessing, each in itself, all these three characteristics; and (2) that the bequest of residue was not void from uncertainty, as the trustees were confined in their choice to a division among existing institutions in a limited locality.

“Educational, charitable, and religious purposes.”

A testator directed his trustee to divide the residue of his estate “amongst such educational, charitable, and religious purposes within the city of Aberdeen as he shall select to be the recipients thereof.” Held that the bequest was to be construed as a bequest for any one or more of the three purposes named as the trustee should select, and that as the description “religious” was indefinite the bequest was void from uncertainty.

(254)
“Charitable, benevolent, or religious objects or purposes within the city of A.”

A testatrix by her trust disposition and settlement directed that the residue of her estate should be applied by her trustees “at their discretion from time to time towards such charitable, benevolent, or religious objects or purposes within the city of Aberdeen as they themselves shall institute or select.” Held that this direction was void from uncertainty.

Shaw’s Trustees v Esson’s Trustees, 1905, 8 F. 52; 43 S.L.R. 21; 13 S.L.T. 449.

—Social or ethical amelioration of people of K.

A testator by his trust settlement left his estate to the kirk session of the parish of Kilsyth in trust for “the promotion, furtherance, assistance, or support of any local scheme of the Church of Scotland in Kilsyth, of any local plan for the social or ethical amelioration of the Kilsyth congregation in particular, or of the people of Kilsyth in general, that may approve or commend itself to the common sense, loyal feeling, and discretion of the kirk session. The annual proceeds need not be all spent in the one year, but may be expended when and as the kirk session shall see fit.” Held that the bequest was not void from uncertainty.

Lord Advocate v Anton, (O.H.) 1909, 2 S.L.T. 326.

(256)
—Religious or charitable purposes in connection with R.

Held that a direction to trustees to apply a sum of money “for religious or charitable purposes in connection with Rio Janeiro as to my said trustees may seem best” was void from uncertainty.

M’Grouther’s Trustees v Lord Advocate, (O.H.) 1907, 15 S.L.T. 652.

“Charitable institutions, persons, or objects.”

A testatrix left the residue of her estate to her trustees “with power to them to distribute the same amongst such charitable institutions, persons, or objects, as they may think desirable.” Held that the bequest was not void from uncertainty, the words “charitable persons” falling to be construed as meaning persons in need of charity.

Cameron’s Trustees v Mackenzie, 1915 S.C. 313; 52 S.L.R. 307; 1915, 1 S.L.T. 78.

—Direction to apply income, or so much thereof as trustees may deem expedient, to charitable purposes.

A testatrix by her trust disposition and settlement provided—“As regards the residue of my estate . . . I appoint my trustees . . . to apply the interest or annual proceeds thereof, or so much of said interest or annual proceeds thereof as they may deem expedient, towards such charitable purposes within the city or county of Aberdeen as my trustees shall think fit . . .” Held that the existence of an uncertainty as to the amount of the annual proceeds or interest which the trustees might in fact apply to the charitable purposes did not render the bequest void from uncertainty, there being no uncertainty as regarded the purposes or objects of the testatrix’s bounty.

Bequest to charitable institutions — “Charitable and benevolent institutions in Glasgow and Paisley.”

A testator directed his trustees to divide the residue of his estate among “such charitable and benevolent institutions in Glasgow and Paisley and in such sums not exceeding the sum of three hundred pounds sterling to any institution as in their discretion may seem best.” Held that the bequest was not void from uncertainty.

—“Local or Scottish charitable institutions and schemes.”

A testator disposed his whole estate to certain trustees, and directed them to realise the whole residue of his estate at such time as they might think proper, and “at any time or times, or from time to time, as and when the said residue or any part thereof becomes available, as they may deem proper, to pay over or divide the said residue, or any part or parts thereof, to or amongst such local or Scottish charitable institutions and schemes already constituted, or which may hereafter be constituted . . . as they may select, or any one or more of such institutions and schemes, and that at such time, in such manner, or in such proportions, all as they in their absolute discretion may deem proper.” The testator further provided that his trustees should have “the fullest powers of and in regard to realisation, investment, administration, management, and division, as if they were beneficial owners”; that “the time, manner, and propriety of selling and disposing” of his estate, heritable and moveable, should be entirely at the discretion of his trustees; and that his trustees might, should they in their discretion see fit, retain the investments of which the estate consisted at the time of his death, "and that for such time or times as they might think fit or indefinitely." Held that the bequest was not void from uncertainty.

 "Societies or institutions of a benevolent or charitable nature."

A testatrix directed her trustee or trustees to apportion and pay over the proceeds of the residue of her estate "amongst such societies or institutions of a benevolent or charitable nature in such proportions as he or they shall in their own discretion think proper, but to the exclusion of Roman Catholic institutions." Held that the bequest was to be construed as a bequest in favour of charitable societies and institutions, and was not void from uncertainty.

(263)
 "Charitable or philanthropic institutions."

A testator directed that the residue of his estate should be paid "to such charitable or philanthropic institutions, one or more, in Glasgow or the west of Scotland, as my trustees may select as in their opinion the most deserving." Held that the bequest was to be construed as a bequest in favour of charitable institutions, and was not void from uncertainty.

 "Charitable institutions for the benefit of women and children — No express power of selection."

A testator directed his trustees "to pay over the balance or residue of my estates to and for behoof of such charitable purposes as I may think proper to name in any writing, however informal, which I may leave; but failing my leaving such writings, then to such charitable institutions or societies which exist for the benefit of women and children requiring aid or assistance of whatever nature, but said institutions and societies to be under the management of Protestants." The testator died without leaving any such writing. Held that the bequest of residue was not void from uncertainty, in respect that its object was charitable, and that the description of the beneficiaries was sufficiently definite to enable the trustees to exercise a power of selection which must be held to have been impliedly conferred upon them.

 "Public charities—List of examples—Other "benevolent and religious societies in Glasgow and west of Scotland"—"Other societies in Glasgow and west of Scotland."

Held that a direction to trustees to pay a specified portion of residue "to public charities, such as the Glasgow Royal, Western and Victoria Infirmaries, the Incorporated Glasgow Old Man's Friend Society and Old Women's Home, Glasgow Blind Asylum, Glasgow Deaf and Dumb Institution, Homes for the Poor, Sabbath schools, the two churches (town and country) with which I may be connected at time of my decease, and other benevolent and religious societies, Societies for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children and to the lower animals, and to such other societies in Glasgow and the West of Scotland which my trustees may select," was not void from uncertainty.

 "Bequest to charitable or other institutions—Charitable or other deserving institutions in connection with the city of Glasgow."

A testator directed his trustees, in the event of there being any residue of his estate, "to apply the same for behoof of such charitable or other deserving institutions in connection with the city of Glasgow as my said trustees shall think fit." Held that the trustees were directed to apply the residue alternatively to charitable institutions or to deserving institutions which were not charitable, and that, as the latter description was too vague to receive effect, the bequest was void from uncertainty.

—“Charitable institutions or deserving agencies in Aberdeen and Stonehaven.”

A testator directed his trustees to divide the residue of his estate among “such charitable institutions or deserving agencies in Aberdeen and Stonehaven as they may select.” Held that the bequest was void from uncertainty, in respect that the description “deserving agencies” fell to be read separately from “charitable institutions,” and was too vague to receive effect.

—Assignment of income to beneficiaries for charitable purposes.

Held that a provision by a testator of a fund to be secured “as a permanent source of charity,” the annual income of which was to be “at the disposal of my wife and children and their descendants,” the wife having “a vote in the disposal of it” was prima facie a good charitable bequest, it being equivalent to an assignment of the income to be disposed of by them for such charitable purposes as they might think proper.

—Failure of person entitled to select.

A testator by his holograph will left his whole estate to his sister and two brothers equally and the survivor of them subject to the payment of certain legacies, inter alia, a legacy "to the deserving working people in the parish of Annan, five hundred pounds, which sum I desire my brothers to divide amongst them according to their good judgment and discretion." The testator was survived by one of his brothers and by his sister, who were confirmed his executors. Thereafter the sister died and the surviving brother, having paid away part of the legacy, himself also died. Held that the trust for the deserving working people lapsed on the death of the surviving brother, because the duty of selection imposed by the testator could not be carried out by anybody except the testator's brothers.

Laurie v Brown, (O.H.) 1911, 1 S.L.T. 84.

Observations on the construction of mutual settlements.

United Free Church of Scotland v Black, 1909 S.C. 25; 46 S.L.R. 87; 16 S.L.T. 528.

(281)

Validity—Signature of one granter not witnessed—Validity quoad estate of the other.

A husband and a wife caused a mutual settlement to be prepared which contained a conveyance by the husband of his whole estate in favour of the wife in liferent only and his children in fee, and a corresponding conveyance by the wife of her estate in favour of the husband and children. The deed was signed by the husband before witnesses, and by the wife, but not before witnesses. Held that it was effectual as a testamentary settlement of the husband's estate.

(282)

—Incapacity of one granter—Effect quoad estate of the other.

A brother and sister executed a settlement conveying their whole property to each other and to the survivor, and thereafter to trustees for purposes specified, reserving to themselves or either of them and to the survivor the absolute use and disposal of the property and full power to alter or cancel the deed at any time. After the death of the brother, who survived the sister, an action was raised to reduce the settlement, on the ground of her mental incapacity, and it was found by the verdict of a jury not to be her deed. Held, in applying the verdict, that the deed remained effectual quoad the brother's estate.

Græme v Græme's Trustees, 1869, 7 M. 1062; 41 J. 599; 6 S.L.R. 684.

Subjects conveyed by mutual settlement—Conveyance of fee of whole estate to survivor—Accumulations made by survivor.

By mutual disposition and settlement a husband and wife conveyed, each to the other, the whole estate then belonging, or which should belong, to each at the time of his or her death, with a destination over in the event of the testators or the survivor having made no other distribution, and a declaration that the survivor should have absolute power of disposal upon the joint estate. The wife survived her husband for about forty years, during which time the value of the estate was largely increased by accumulations. She left no separate testamentary writing. Held that, as after the husband's death the whole joint estates belonged absolutely to the widow, there was no room for distinguishing between one part of her estate and another, and that the whole estate, including increase of value and accumulations of income made by the surviving spouse, fell to be distributed in terms of the mutual will.

—Conveyance of estate belonging to granters "respectively" at "our death"—Gift of liferent to survivor—Whether accumulations from liferent carried by survivor's settlement.

Two spouses executed jointly a trust disposition and settlement, conveying to trustees "all and sundry the whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal, of whatever nature and description, and wheresoever situated, now due or belonging to us respectively, or that may pertain and belong or be addebted and resting-owing to us respectively at the time of our death, nothing excepted or reserved," for certain purposes, inter alia, "for the liferent use and enjoyment of the survivor of us." The survivor of the spouses, after the death of her husband, saved from her liferent of the estate a large sum of money, and tested upon it. Held that she was not barred from so doing by the terms of the mutual trust deed.

Power to alter trust purposes — Mutual settlement for charitable purposes — Alteration of purposes by survivor under power.

A brother and sister executed a mutual trust disposition and settlement, which was declared to be irrevocable by the survivor, except to the extent specified in a deed of instructions, in which the purpose of the trust was stated. This was the formation of a fund to be called "The Anderson Bequest," to be managed by a board, the testators stating that it was their intention and wish "that the same may give great relief to parties residing in the town and parish of Borrowstounness from their poor rates, and also to assist respectable young people with a small sum of money on their setting out in the world." Detailed directions followed, according to which one-half of the income of the fund was to be laid out in pensions to various classes of persons specified, and the other half was to be expended in effecting two classes of insurances on the lives of young persons, one class to provide a sum on the assured reaching twenty-five years of age, and the other class to provide a sum on the death of the assured. A power was given to the survivor "to alter or enlarge the instructions and powers to said board, but that only so as the principal design or object of said bequest shall not be interfered with or any way altered." After his sister's death the brother executed a codicil directing his trustees to maintain a school which he was erecting in B, and to pay salaries to a teacher and assistant. A question having arisen whether this was within the survivor's power, held that the general objects of the mutual deed being the diminution of pauperism in B and the setting out of young persons in the world, the direction to maintain a school was well calculated to promote these ends, and fell fairly within the reserved powers given to the survivor.

Effect of revocation by survivor.

Two sisters, who lived in family together and held their estates jointly, each being owner of a pro indiviso half thereof, executed a mutual trust disposition and settlement whereby they conveyed to trustees the whole estates belonging to them at their respective deaths. By the trust disposition the survivor was to have a liferent of her predeceasing sister's estate, and, on the death of the survivor, the trustees were to pay legacies to certain charities, amounting in all to £6000, and were to divide the residue among such other charities as they should think proper. The trusters further reserved their liferents of their respective estates, with full power to them or either of them, at any time during their respective lives "to alter, innovate, or revoke these presents in whole or in part as we may respectively think proper, which power each of us reserves entire, and may avail ourselves of, without the consent or concurrence of the other." On the death of the predeceasing sister the joint estate amounted to £8000. Held (1) that each sister had a power to revoke the settlement as regarded her own estate, but not as regarded her sister's; and (2) that the surviving sister by exercising this power did not forfeit her liferent of her sister's estate.

—Mutual settlement between husband and wife—Effect of secret revocation by wife—Meliorations by husband—Recompense.

A wife possessed certain heritable property, which in a mutual settlement executed by her and her husband after marriage she conveyed to him after her death. This mutual deed contained a power of revocation by either of the spouses, and the wife exercised the power by settling the property on her children by a former marriage, to the exclusion of her husband. The husband was ignorant of this change until after her death, and in the meantime had expended a considerable sum in improving the property. The money so expended was, however, principally obtained from the wife or her property, and fell to the husband in virtue of the jus mariti. Held that the secret revocation of the mutual settlement by the wife having disappointed the husband's reasonable expectations, he was entitled to recompense for his expenditure so far as beneficial to the property.

2. POWER OF SURVIVOR TO REVOKE.

(290)

Mutual settlement between spouses — Fee to survivor—Substitution in favour of wife's daughter—Revocation by surviving wife.

A mutual testament, executed by a husband and wife, provided (1) that the survivor should possess and inherit all the property that might belong to them at the death of the predeceaser; and (2) that on the death of the survivor the residue of all that was left by the deceased should go equally to A and B, the daughter and grand-daughter of the wife by a former marriage. A and B survived the husband but predeceased his widow. Held that the provision in their favour was a mere substitution, which was effectually defeated by a testament executed by the widow.

(291)

—Fee to survivor—Substitution in favour of relatives of both spouses—Power of survivor to revoke.

A husband and wife executed a mutual settlement whereby they conveyed their whole means and estate to the survivor. They subsequently executed a codicil by which they directed "that on the death of the survivor of us without leaving lawful issue, the whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, belonging to the said survivor shall be divided equally between" a nephew of the husband and a nephew of the wife. The codicil also nominated two trustees, one a nephew of the husband and the other a nephew of the wife, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions with respect to the estate of the survivor. The husband survived his wife and uplifted her estate. Subsequently he executed a will whereby he left his whole estate to persons other than those named in the codicil to the mutual settlement. Held that the mutual codicil was not in its nature contractual, and accordingly that the husband was entitled to revoke it, and had revoked it, by his will.

—Onerous settlement—Joint codicil.

A husband and wife by a codicil to a mutual settlement which was onerous and contractual made certain provisions from the wife's estate in favour of the husband's relatives, payable in the event of his survival. After the husband's death the wife revoked the codicil. Held that the codicil was revocable as a donation inter virum et uxorem. Opinion (per Lord Guthrie) that apart from the relationship of husband and wife the codicil was revocable.

(293)

—Liferent to survivor with fee to children—Right of survivor to revoke quoad his own estate.

A husband and wife who had no ante-nuptial marriage contract executed a mutual settlement whereby they conveyed to trustees the whole property, heritable and moveable, belonging to either of them, or which might belong to them at the date of their decease, to be held for the survivor of the spouses in liferent, and for the children of the marriage in fee. The liferent of the surviving spouse was to cease in the case of a second marriage. The whole funds and estate of the spouses were derived from the husband with exception of £400 belonging to the wife (as to which sum the husband's jus mariti had been excluded), the sole interest in which was conferred on the children. The wife predeceased her husband, who, shortly after her death, executed a deed of revocation of the mutual settlement, except in so far as it dealt with the wife's £400. Held that in so far as the provisions by the husband in the mutual settlement were to be regarded as provisions in favour of the wife, being gratuitous, they were (except the liferent, which was in the circumstances a reasonable provision) revocable as donations inter virum et uxorem, and that as regarded the provisions to children, they were merely testamentary, and that the deed of revocation was effectual.

—Right of predeceaser to revoke quoad own estate.

In a mutual settlement by a husband and wife, where the whole means and estate, consisting of heritage valued at £45 a year, and £300 of moveable estate, were the property of the husband, it was provided that if the wife survived her husband she should get the residue of the moveable estate absolutely and the liferent of the heritage—the fee of the heritage being destined to persons named. The husband predeceased, leaving a trust deed by which he revoked all former deeds, and while slightly altering the provisions to his wife he also made a change in the destination of the fee of the heritage. Held (1) that as the provision to the widow in the mutual settlement was not excessive, it was not revocable as a donation inter virum et uxorem; and (2) that in the circumstances the change in the destination of the heritage must receive effect.

Gibson's Trustees v Gibson, 1877, 4 R. 867.

(295)

—Uncertainty.

Question whether a mutual settlement in favour not of a specific class of persons, but of a vague philanthropic object could bind the surviving testator so as to prevent him dealing with his own fortune.

—Reservation of power to revoke—Fee to survivor—Substitution in favour of relatives of predeceaser.

A husband and wife executed a mutual trust disposition and settlement whereby they conveyed to the survivor of them the whole means and estate "which shall belong and be owing to us respectively at the time of our death, . . . and on the death of the longest liver of us we dispose . . . all and sundry the whole means and estate of which we may die possessed" to trustees in trust to divide the capital between two grandnieces of the wife. The deed contained the following clause:—"We reserve our respective liferents of the means and estate above conveyed, with power to alter, innovate, or revoke these presents at pleasure." Held that after the wife's death the husband was entitled to revoke the mutual trust disposition and settlement and to dispose by will of the whole estate, including the wife's estate which was made over to him on her death.

Liferent to survivor—Fee to charitable purposes.

Two sisters who lived in family together and held their estates jointly, executed a mutual settlement whereby they conveyed their whole estates to trustees for the survivor in liferent, the fee to be devoted to charitable purposes. The granters reserved "full power and liberty to us, or either of us, at any time during our respective lives, to alter, innovate, or revoke these presents, in whole or in part, as we may respectively think proper, which power each of us reserves entire, and may avail ourselves of, without the consent or concurrence of the other." Held that the survivor was entitled to revoke the mutual settlement quoad her own estate, but not quoad the estate of the predeceaser.

Power of survivor to revoke bequest of property of predeceaser.

By mutual settlement two spouses conveyed to trustees the whole property belonging to them or to either of them at their respective deaths, for certain purposes, reserving "our respective liferents of the premises with power to us or the survivor of us to alter, innovate, or revoke these presents at pleasure." Held that under this clause the surviving spouse had no power to revoke bequests in the settlement of subjects which were the property of the predeceasing spouse, or bequests which were the joint gifts of both spouses.

Kay's Trustee v Stalker, 1892, 19 R. 1071.

Power of survivor to revoke joint bequest.

Two sisters executed a mutual settlement reserving power to each and the survivor to revoke so far as regards her own estate. They made a joint bequest. The survivor revoked the settlement. Held that one-half of the joint bequest remained payable to the beneficiary, and that the survivor had power to revoke the other half.

Scott's Trustees v Scott, (O.H.) 1919, 1 S.L.T. 78.

(300)

Right of survivor to appoint new trustees.

A mutual settlement, executed by a husband and wife, nominated certain persons as trustees. The husband then conveyed to them his whole estate, giving a liferent to his widow during her widowhood, and the fee to the children of the marriage, and failing them to certain persons, his own relations. The wife made similar provisions in favour of her husband and children, and certain persons, her own relations. Both spouses then accepted the liferent provisions as in full of their legal claims; and they reserved power "during our joint lives, or to the longest liver of us, even on deathbed, to alter, innovate, or revoke these presents in whole or in part, as we or either of us may see cause." Held that the widow was not entitled under this clause of reservation to recall the nomination of trustees contained in the mutual deed and appoint new trustees on her husband's estate.

(301)

Reservation of power to granters of mutual consent to revoke during joint lives—Power reserved to survivor to dispose of estate acquired during survivorship—Survivor's heritage destined to her own relations.

A husband and wife executed a mutual settlement in which each bequeathed to the other, on survivorship, the whole of his or her estate for that other's liferent use, and subject to certain burdens and directions which were identical in each case. In addition, the wife conveyed a heritable property to the husband in liferent and to certain of her own blood relations in fee. The settlement contained a clause reserving power of revocation by mutual consent during the joint lifetimes of the spouses, and declaring its finality unless so revoked, but reserving to the survivor a power of disposal over "all his or her own means and estate to be made and acquired after the decease of the first of us." Held that the provisions of the mutual settlement with regard to the wife's heritable property were contractual, and that she was not, after the death of her husband, entitled to revoke the destination thereof.

Bequests to granters' relatives—Express power to survivor to revoke bequests to his own relatives—Donation inter virum et uxorem.

A husband and wife executed a mutual settlement whereby they disposed the estate of the predeceaser to the survivor, and on the death of the survivor they disposed the whole estate of the survivor to trustees, who were directed to pay one-half to named relatives of the husband, and the other half to named relatives of the wife. Power was reserved to revoke or alter the settlement during the joint lives of the spouses by mutual consent, and it was provided that the survivor should have power to alter or revoke quoad the half destined to his or her relatives. The wife, who had no separate estate, predeceased. Held that the stipulations as to alteration and revocation were pactional between the spouses, and that the husband had not power to alter or revoke the destination in favour of the wife's relatives.

———Right of survivor to revoke.

By an antenuptial marriage contract intending spouses conveyed each to the other in case of survivance, and to the heirs of the survivor their whole estates. They subsequently executed a mutual settlement, whereby they severally conveyed the whole estate which should belong to them respectively at their death to trustees, with directions to pay to the survivor the income of the estate of the predeceaser, and on the survivor's death, after paying legacies, to divide and pay the residue to four persons named "with power to us by any joint writing under our hands to revoke or alter these presents, but declaring that in so far as not altered or revoked as aforesaid the same shall remain effectual." The marriage was dissolved (without issue) by the death of the wife. The husband died leaving a settlement in which he conveyed his whole estate to trustees and revoked all testamentary deeds previously executed by him. Held that the provisions of the mutual will were onerous and were matter of contract between the spouses, and that therefore the will was not revocable by one of the spouses after the death of the other.

———Revocability by survivor—Husband and wife—Gift by each spouse to other of liferent of estate on survivance—Gift of residue to children.

A husband and wife who had no antenuptial marriage contract made a mutual settlement by which each spouse gave to the other in the event of survivance the liferent of his or her estate, and declared that on the death of the survivor the whole residue of their estates should be divided among their children. The settlement reserved power to the spouses to alter or revoke during their joint lives. The wife survived the husband, and left a settlement which bore to revoke all previous mortis causa deeds made by her. Held that the mutual settlement was contractual and so had not been revoked by the wife's subsequent settlement.

———Power to revoke exercisable only by granters jointly—Gift of fee to survivors of granters.

B and C, two sisters, and A, the husband of B, by a mutual trust settlement, containing a clause of absolute warrandice, conveyed their whole estates at their death to trustees, and nominated the survivor of them, the granters, and on the survivor's death the trustees, to be their executors. The main purpose of the trust was for division of the estate among the children of A and B. The deed contained the following clause:—"Reserving always, and giving and granting to us and each of us and the survivor of us the whole estate hereby disposed by us, and also reserving to us full power during our lives, or even on deathbed, to burden, as also to alter, to innovate, or revoke these presents." A was the first deceiver of the granters and C the second. Held (1) that the power to revoke could only be exercised by the granters collectively; (2) that the clause of reservation conferred on the surviving granter power to enjoy and dispose of the estate by inter vivos deeds; but (3) that the ultimate destination having been presumably the inductive cause on the part of the husband, the survivors after his death could not defeat it by any gratuitous testamentary writing.

Craich's Trustees v Mackie, 1870, 8 M. 898; 42 J. 597; 7 S.L.R. 571.

(306)

———Joint or several power.

A husband and wife executed a mutual will, which contained a power "to us at any time during our joint lives to alter, innovate, or revoke, as we may see proper." Held that this imported a joint and not a several power.

———Conveyance of whole estate belonging to granters at death of predeceaser—Liferent of one-half to survivor with fee to relations of predeceaser—Right of survivor to revoke.

By mutual trust disposition and settlement a husband and wife, who had no antenuptial marriage contract, disposed to trustees the whole property, heritable and moveable, which should belong to them or either of them at the death of the first deceiver, with directions that upon that event the trustees should take an inventory of the whole estate, and should hold one-half thereof, subject to the liferent of the survivor, for behoof of the relatives of the first deceiver. The spouses reserved full power to alter the deed during their joint lives, and the wife declared the provisions in her favour to be in full of her legal claims. Held that the trust deed was not revocable by the surviving husband, and that the right of the relatives of the wife vested in them at her death.

Kerr v Ure, 1873, 11 M. 780; 45 J. 512.

(308)

———Revocation by survivor prohibited—Liferent to survivor—Fee of both estates to granter's children.

By mutual settlement a husband and wife conveyed to trustees the whole estates which might belong to them at their respective deaths. The trust purposes were (1) a liferent of the predeceaser's estate to the surviving spouse, and (2) the fee of the whole estates of both spouses to be divided equally among the children of the marriage. The spouses reserved power "jointly but not otherwise" to revoke the settlement, and it was specially declared that if the settlement should stand unrevoked at the death of the first de-ceaser, "it shall not be competent to the survivor of us to alter or recall" the settle-ment "in any way." The wife prede-ceased survived by children and leaving £10,000, of which the husband enjoyed the liferent until his death fifteen years later. At his death the husband was possessed of £24,000. Held that the mutual settlement was onerous and contractual and could not be revoked by the husband after the wife's death, even quoad his own property.

Settlement declared irrevocable on death of predeceaser—Conveyance of estate as at predeceaser's death—Liferent to survivor—Fee to relations of spouses.

A husband and wife, who had married without an antenuptial contract, executed a mutual settlement, by which they con-veyed the whole estate presently belong-ing or which should belong to the spouses, jointly or individually at the death of the predeceaser, to trustees, who were directed to allow the survivor the liferent of the estate, and upon the death of the survivor to realise and pay over the same in equal halves to relations of the husband and wife respectively. It was specially declared that upon the death of the predeceaser the deed should become absolute and irrevocable, and delivery was dispensed with. The husband was possessed of about £3000, of which a considerable part was heritage, and the wife was possessed of two heritable bonds, together amounting to £460. Upon the death of the wife, who was the predeceaser, the trustees entered into possession of the estate. Held that the mutual settlement was revocable by the husband in so far as it disposed of his own estate, on the con-dition undertaken by him in a minute lodged in process, that he should renounce all benefit from his wife's settlement.

(311)

Contractual settlement—Revocation by survivor — Substitution of adequate pro- visions.

A husband and wife executed a mutual will. Thereafter the husband made another will revoking it. Held that the mutual will was contractual, but in respect that the second will made adequate provision for the wife the revocation contained in it was valid.

Wood's Trustees v Findlay, (O.H.) 1909, 1 S.L.T. 156.

Power to revoke reserved to spouses jointly —Gift to children—Mutual disposition under burden of legacies and gifts by either spouse —Power of survivor to revoke quoad her own estate.

By mutual disposition and settlement a husband and wife gave and disposed to their children their whole estate presently belong- ing or which should belong to them or either of them at the time of their death, but "always with and under the burden of our lawful debts and deeds, payment of our funeral expenses, and of such gifts or legacies as we, or either of us, may think proper to leave by any deed to be executed by us or either of us at any time of our lives." Power was reserved to the spouses, with mutual advice and consent, to revoke or alter the mutual disposition and settlement. Held, upon a consideration of the terms of the deed, and especially having regard to the clause above quoted, that the settlement was revocable by the survivor of the spouses so far as his or her own estate was con- cerned.

Main v Lamb, 1880, 7 R. 688.

Fee to survivor—Power of survivor to revoke.

A mother and daughter executed a mutual trust settlement by which each made the other her universal legatary. The deed further provided for the distribution of the estate on the death of the survivor, and concluded with these words—"Reserving always our respective lifetimes of the whole premises, and full power, with mutual con- sent only, to alter, innovate, or revoke these presents, in whole or in part, as we may think proper." Held that there was nothing in the terms of the deed to displace the presumption that the clause referred only to the primary dispositions by which each party conveyed to the survivor the estate which she might leave at her death, and did not forbid the survivor from deal- ing as she pleased with the whole estate belonging to her either inter vivos or mortis causa.

Boath's Trustees v Machardy, (O.H.) 1902, 10 S.L.T. 446.

(314)

Power of survivor to dispose of own estate.

A husband and wife executed a mutual trust disposition and settlement, whereby the former disposed his whole property, heritable and moveable, of which he might die possessed, "to and in favour of S M, my wife, and on her decease to the heirs and successors of me." The wife's disposition was "to and in favour of" her husband "and his heirs and assignees whomsoever." There was a clause of reservation in the following terms:—"Reserving always to us, and each of us, our respective liferents of the means and estates above conveyed, with full power to us at any time during our joint lives to alter, innovate, or revoke these presents, in whole or in part, as we may see proper; but declaring always that the same, in so far as not altered, innovated, or revoked as aforesaid, shall be effectual though found lying by either of us at the time of his or her decease, or in the custody of any other person for our behoof, with the delivery whereof we have dispensed and hereby dispense for ever." The wife survived her husband. Held that she had right to dispose at will of her own estate, but had only a liferent of her husband's estate.

Milne v Milne, 1876, 13 S.L.R. 223.

Wife surviving and making donations—Validity of donations.

A husband and wife by mutual will each bequeathed to the other, if survivor, the whole moveable estate of which the predeceaser might die possessed, and further, they jointly and severally bequeathed the whole moveable property of which the longest liver might die possessed to certain relatives of the husband. A power of revocation was reserved to the spouses jointly and to the husband if survivor. The wife survived the husband for over twenty years. She had no separate estate, but she saved considerable sums from the income of the husband's estate. With a view to defeating the rights of the husband's relatives under the mutual will, she put these savings on deposit receipt in the name of various persons to whom she wished to make donations. After the death of the wife, the executor under the mutual will called upon these persons to account for these sums. Held that the mutual will was merely the testament of the surviving spouse, and was revocable by her, and that, therefore, the donations made by her, whether inter vivos or mortis causa, were effectual.

Power of survivor to revoke quoad his own estate.

A person having purchased certain subjects took the disposition to himself and his wife in conjunct fee and liferent, for her liferent use allanarly, and to himself and his heirs and assignees in fee. Thereafter the husband and wife executed a mortis causa disposition containing the following clause:—"Reserving always to us during our joint lives our own liferent right and use of the premises, with full power to us at any period during our joint lives to alter, innovate, or revoke these presents in whole or in part." Held that the husband being absolute fiar under the first deed, was entitled to revoke the mutual disposition after his wife's death.

Power to change destination.

A and B, sisters, executed a trust deed directing their trustees to give a liferent of their estate to the survivor, with certain provisions as to residue. By a codicil they directed their trustees to carry out the instructions of the survivor as to any change of destination of one-half of the estate, and to pay the survivor absolutely such part of one-half as she might demand. In two other codicils variations and additions were made on the bequests, and all existing provisions with regard to residue were recalled and a new bequest of residue was made. A died and was survived by B, who executed a deed of directions in which she reduced the annuities of two of her relatives and disposed of one-half of the estate to parties not named under the original trust disposition and codicils. Held that the deed of directions was a valid exercise of her right under the first codicil, and that she was therefore entitled to revoke to the extent of one-half the annuities and the bequest of residue.

A father lent a sum of money to a railway company and took a mortgage debenture with a destination to himself and his children. Held that the destination was effectual to carry the mortgage to the children on the death of the father.

Policy of assurance.

A special destination in a policy of assurance will be given effect to in a competition between the trustees named in the policy and the executor-dative of the assured, even although the policy was not intimated to the trustees and the assured died insolvent.

Mutual assurance association — Benefits payable to nominee of deceased member — Appointment of nominee.

The rules of an unregistered mutual assurance association provided that every member should execute a written nomination in favour of some person to whom the benefits payable on his death should be paid. A member of the association executed a nomination in favour of his sister, and on the member's death she received payment of the amount of the benefits. The member had executed a will, later in date than the nomination, disposing of his whole estate. The executor acting under the will having brought an action against the nominee to recover, as part of the deceased's estate, the sum paid to her, held, on a construction of the rules of the association, that the nomination merely conferred a title to collect the amount of the benefits payable on the death of the member, and that the nominee was bound to account to the executor therefor.

A deposit receipt was taken by a husband payable to himself or his wife and the survivor. Held in the absence of proof of intention on the part of the husband to make a donation mortis causa to the wife, that the deposit receipt belonged to the husband's representatives.

(331)

Certain sums of money belonging to A and B were placed on deposit receipt, the receipts being taken in favour of A, B, and C, repayable to them or to the survivor or survivors of them, or to any of them. B, A, and C having died in that order, held that the destination in the deposit receipt had no testamentary effect, and that, there being no intention of making a donation mortis causa in favour of any one, the sums in the deposit receipts must be held to be in bonis of A and B.

4. OBLIGATIONS TO TEST.

Whether obligation constituted.

A mother and one of her sons executed a minute of agreement, whereby the mother, on the narrative that the son had advanced sums amounting to £800 to the mother, bound herself to execute an irrevocable settlement of her whole property in favour of her son, and he undertook to pay up or take an assignment to a bond for £150 over the mother's property, to pay the taxes and premiums of fire insurance, and to allow her to receive the full rents of her property. The mother, of the same date, executed a settlement in her son's favour, and he took over the bond and paid the taxes and the premiums. The mother died leaving a later settlement, by which she revoked the earlier, and disposed of her property otherwise. In an action by the son, held that the agreement was onerous and was binding on the mother, and that the later settlement, being in contravention of the agreement, fell to be reduced.

Paterson v Paterson, 1893, 20 R. 484; 30 S.L.R. 646.

—Whether inter vivos deeds struck at by obligation.

A testator in his settlement made certain liferent provisions for his wife, and left her a legacy of £5000, declaring that "by acceptance hereof she binds herself to execute a settlement of her own affairs so as that my own relatives shall have at least the two-thirds of what may be at her disposal," and in a codicil he stated—"It is to be distinctly understood that at my wife's death, or previously, she is to leave all means at her disposal two-thirds to my sister's family." After his death his widow accepted the provisions in her favour. Held that the widow was bound to leave to relatives of her husband two-thirds of the funds at her disposal at the date of her death, but that her right to dispose of her funds onerously or gratuitously by deeds inter vivos was not limited.

—Precatory trust.
A testator bequeathed his moveable estate to his widow, expressing in his testament an "anxious desire" and in a subsequent writing, "a hope" that she should make a testament bequeathing one-half of the means which might belong to her at her death to certain of his relatives. The testator's widow having died intestate, held that her executor was not bound or entitled to give effect to the testator's request.

Barclay's Executor v M'Leod, 1880, 7 R. 477; 17 S.L.R. 311.

Deeds in fraudem of obligation.

A widow, who was under an obligation to leave to her husband's relatives two-thirds of the funds at her disposal at the date of her death, executed two trust deeds, bearing to be irrevocable, in which she assigned £2000 and £1000 to trustees. The deeds were delivered, and the trustees got possession. In these deeds provision was made for (1) payment to her during her life of annuities of £70 and £35; (2) increase of her annuities if in the trustees' opinion necessary for her maintenance and support; (3) accumulation during her life; and (4) payment of the residue after her death to certain of her relatives, and in the event of their predecease to her heirs and assignees. She also executed a disposition of her household furniture to a friend, with full power to demand delivery at any time. The deed contained a consent to registration for preservation and execution, and was registered in the Books of Council and Session during her life. The widow remained in possession of the furniture till her death. Held that the widow was divested of the subjects conveyed during her life, and that there was no breach of the obligation.

Murray v Macfarlane's Trustees, 1895, 22 R. 927; 32 S.L.R. 715; 3 S.L.T. 63.

VII. REVOCATION.

1. POWER TO REVOKE.

Mutual settlements.

[See V. 2, supra.]

(338)

—Agreement for disentail—Settlement of price of expectancy.

By minute of agreement a father undertook to pay, and a son to accept as the price of the son's consent to disentail a property, a sum of £4000 absolutely, and a "further sum of £3000" to be held by trustees for the son's use and behoof. The father reserved a right to limit the son's power over the £3000 as he thought proper, "and, in particular," to restrict his interest to a liferent, the fee to go to his issue, whom failing, to his nearest heirs and assignees. The father executed a bond in favour of the trustees, which was declared to be subject to purposes expressed in a deed of declaration of trusts of even date therewith. By this declaration of trusts the son's interest was restricted to an alimentary liferent, and failing his issue the fee was destined to his aunt and cousins. The son, who was unmarried at this time, signed both the bond and the declaration of trusts in token of his acquiescence and concurrence. The bond was delivered to the trustees, and they paid the income to the son. The son, having survived his father, revoked the declarator of trusts and bequeathed the £3000 to his widow. Held that the destination to the aunt and cousins was purely testamentary, and as such revocable by the son.

Wightman v Costine, 1879, 6 R. (H.L.) 13; 4 App.Cas. 228; 16 S.L.R. 496.

Destination in inter vivos deed—Disposition in liferent to parents and survivors—Fee to children—Subjects acquired with wife's funds—Delivery.

A husband and wife purchased heritable property with the wife's funds and took the disposition to themselves and the longest liver of them in liferent, for their liferent use allanarly and to their lawful children, whom failing, to the wife's heirs whomsoever in fee. They took infertment in the liferent in terms of the disposition, but no infertment was taken in the fee. Children were afterwards born of the marriage. Held that the infertment did not operate as delivery for behoof of the children, and that the spouses were entitled to revoke the destination in their favour.

Disposition of heritage in consideration of price paid "on behalf of" wife—Destination to wife in liferent allanarly and children in fee—Infertment only in liferent—Delivery—Revocation by wife—Jus quæsitum tertio.

In 1839 the proprietor of certain heritable subjects in consideration of the sum of £100 paid to him by Robert Bruce "on behalf of Mrs. Isabella Wood or Bruce, his spouse," disposed the subjects to Mrs. Bruce "in liferent for her liferent use allanarly (the said Robert Bruce her husband's jus mariti, right of courtesy, or other right or title whatsoever, being hereby excluded), and to the children procreated or to be procreated betwixt them" in fee. Mrs. Bruce took infertment in liferent, but no infertment was taken in the fee. Children were born of the marriage. Held (1) that on a sound construction of the deed it was to be inferred that Mr. Bruce had no interest in the purchase price, but that it was paid with money belonging to Mrs. Bruce; and (2) that the infertment in liferent did not operate as delivery for behoof of the children, and that Mrs. Bruce was entitled to revoke the destination in their favour.

Heritable property bought by spouses—Special destination in disposition.

Spouses purchased heritable property, each paying one-half of the price. The disposition was taken in favour of the spouses jointly and the survivor and the heirs of the survivor and their assignees whomsoever. Held that the destination could not be altered except by the joint consent of the spouses.

Delivered trust disposition—Contingent interests.

Held that a testator could not revoke a duly delivered trust disposition and settlement without the consent of his grandchildren in whom the deed created an interest, although their rights under it were contingent only, and that as the grandchildren were pupils, they were incapable of giving their consent.

Foucalt v Foucart's Trustees, (O.H.) 1896, 4 S.L.T. 211.

2. CANCELLATION BY DESTRUCTION OR DELETION.

[See 3 (3), infra, and WRIT II. 5.]

3. REVOCATION BY LATER TESTAMENTARY DEED.

(1) EFFECT OF EXPRESS REVOCATION.

(343)

Application to mortis causa disposition of heritage.

The proprietor of an estate in Scotland by a mortis causa deed disposed it to his wife in liferent and to trustees in fee, with directions to sell the estate on the expiry of the liferent and apply the proceeds for purposes set forth in an English will of prior date, which he subsequently cancelled. By a second English will, executed on deathbed, the testator bequeathed his personal property and his whole "freehold, copyhold, and leasehold estates in England, Scotland, and elsewhere," to trustees, the income to be paid to his widow, and at her death the whole to be realised and the proceeds paid to his nephew, and he revoked "all former wills." Held (1) that the mortis causa disposition of heritage was not revoked by the second will, and that the conveyance of liferent in favour of the widow was effectual; but (2) that the destination of the fee had fallen in consequence of the failure of the trust purposes through the cancellation of the first English will; and (3) that therefore the Scottish estate went to the heir at law, whose right was not affected by the direction to sell.

Thomas v Tennent's Trustees, 1868, 7 M. 114; 41 J. 59; 6 S.L.R. 113.

Application to revocable bond of annuity.

The heir in possession of an entailed estate granted in favour of his wife a bond of annuity under the Aberdeen Act providing her an annuity out of the estate "during all the days of her life after my decease, in case she shall survive me." He reserved power to revoke the bond. Subsequently he executed a trust disposition and settlement prepared by a law agent, whereby he revoked "all previous settlements and all writings of a testamentary nature, with the exception of" the bond of annuity. By a later holograph will he revoked "all previous wills or testaments." Held that the holograph will did not revoke the bond of annuity.

Maclean v Maclean, 1891, 18 R. 874; 28 S.L.R. 656.

Application to holograph list of legacies referring to will of even date.

In the repositories of a deceased testator there were found (1) a draft will, dated 27th October, 1909, (2) a holograph memorandum, dated 28th October, 1909, and (3) a formal will, dated 29th October, 1909. It appeared that, on 27th October, 1909, the testator adjusted with his law agent the draft will, and urged him to have it engrossed as soon as possible. At the same time he appended to the draft a signed and dated holograph docquet adopting it "as my last will." Next day the formal will was extended in terms of the draft, and sent to him for signature. The following day his law agent called on him, when he produced the formal will, which by that time he had signed, and he acknowledged the signature before witnesses. The testing clause was then completed as of that date, viz., 29th October, 1909. The formal will and the draft will were in identical terms, and each contained a clause revoking all previous testamentary writings, and a clause declaring "this along with any separate bequests by me of even date herewith, or to be hereafter executed by me, to be my last will and testament." On the testator's death the holograph memorandum was found tied up with the two wills. It was written in pencil, and was headed, "Legacies," and contained a list of names, with sums of money appended to each. It was dated 28th October, 1909, and was signed, with this note added—"In terms of my last will of even date." No will of 28th October was found. Circumstances where held that the pencil memorandum had not been revoked by the will of 29th October, but must be read along with that deed.

Application to gift of bank stock reserving power of sale.

During his life A made over certain bank stock to his sisters, but he reserved the right to draw the dividends and power to sell. By his will he revoked "all former testamentary writings executed by me." Held that the gift of the bank stocks was not revoked.

Application to jotting on envelope.

Among the repositories of a deceased person an envelope was found which contained acknowledgments of debt by the testator's sons. On the envelope was a direction to the trustees, written in pencil, that the envelope was not to be opened, but burned. A subsequent will was made by the testator, which revoked all previous deeds of a testamentary nature executed by him. Held that the pencil jotting was not a deed in the sense of the will, and was not revoked thereby.

(348)

Application to special destinations in stock certificates.

(349)

Application to I O U.

After the death of a testator there were found in his repositories two I O U's, dated in 1873, in favour of two of his daughters. A will was in existence at that date, but a will of later date contained this clause, "I revoke and recall all former deeds of settlement made by me at any time heretofore." Held (per Lord Pearson, Ordinary) that the I O U's were of a testamentary character, but were not revoked by the later will.

McGaw's Trustees v King, (O.H.) 1902, 10 S.L.T. 83.

Codicil revoking wills recorded in Books of Council and Session—Testator's will not recorded.

A testatrix left a holograph writing which contained the following clause:—"Having made two wills when suffering from decay of memory, both of which are registered in the Books of Council and Session, Edinburgh, I do hereby cancel them, and in place of which I make the following statement of my wishes." There followed words which did not effectually dispose of her estate. Held that this writing did not revoke a formal settlement which was found at her death in the hands of her law agent, but was not registered in the Books of Council and Session, and which was executed when the testatrix was thirty-one years of age, and when there was no reason to suppose that she was suffering from decay of memory.

(2) IMPLIED REVOCATION.

(351)

Revocation by general settlement—Bequest of shares—Money legacy.

A person who had received from his wife £140 in loan out of her separate estate, delivered to her a holograph writing bequeathing to her three shares of his bank stock "in payment of money lent," and subsequently another holograph writing bequeathing to her £500 worth of the same stock. They were afterwards judicially separated, and he died leaving a settlement directing his trustees, after payment of his debts and a special legacy, to convey the whole residue of his estate to his daughter. The deed made no reference to other testamentary writings, and contained no express revocation of prior bequests. Held that the holograph writings in favour of the wife had not been revoked either expressly or by implication, and must receive effect.

Holograph writings — Holograph writing enclosed in envelope—Memorandum on envelope dated subsequent to settlement.

A testatrix left a universal settlement disposing of her whole estate, but containing no express revocation of prior testamentary writings, and also two holograph testamentary writings, dated respectively three and four months before the settlement. The earlier in date of these documents was contained in an envelope closed with gum, and addressed by the testatrix to her brother, with the words, "To be given him by-and-bye," and a date a month later than the date of her settlement. Shortly before her death, which did not occur until seventeen months after the execution of the settlement, she had told her brother that she had left a testamentary document in her own handwriting addressed to him. By the universal settlement she bequeathed £500 out of sums due to her from the trust estate of her father and a deceased brother, to a niece L, and with regard to the division of her jewellery referred to a memorandum to be left by her. The holograph writing earlier in date disposed of some articles of jewellery to certain persons named, and concluded—"Also £500 to my dear niece L." By the more recent holograph writing changes were made in the names of trustees she had appointed in a prior settlement afterwards cancelled, and a legacy of £500 out of funds due out of her father's estate was left to the same niece L. L having claimed all three legacies, as cumulative and not substitutional, held (1) that the more recent holograph writing was revoked by the universal settlement; and (2) that the address and date on the envelope containing the earlier writing, although subsequent to the execution of the universal settlement, were not sufficient to make it operative so as to affect the provisions of the universal settlement by introducing another legacy of £500, the probable explanation being that it was intended to act as the memorandum referred to in the settlement.

Successive universal settlements—Whether earlier settlement revoked.

Held that a testamentary settlement disposing of the whole estate of the testator operated as a revocation of prior settlements of the testator, which likewise purported to dispose of his whole estate, although the subsequent settlement did not contain an express revocation of the prior settlements.

(354)

A testator left in his repositories twenty-one deeds of a testamentary character, including four which ex facie dealt with his whole estate. Held that the last of the trust deeds, which dealt with the whole estate, operated as a revocation of all the previous testamentary writings, although it did not expressly revoke them.

Sibbald's Trustees v Greig, 1871, 9 M. 399; 43 J. 150; 8 S.L.R. 294.

(355)

Legacies repeated in subsequent settlement except one.

A testator who by his settlement had directed payment of a number of special legacies, repeated them all in a subsequent settlement, with the exception of a valuable legacy to his heir and a derisory bequest of one penny to a third person. Held that the legacy to the heir was revoked by implication.

Macleod's Trustees, 1871, 9 M. 903; 43 J. 517; 8 S.L.R. 597.

(356)

Effect of codicil.

A testatrix by her trust settlement left the residue of her estate for a certain purpose, but by a codicil she left certain specified subjects for a different purpose. The subjects specified in the codicil comprised her whole estate. Held that the codicil impliedly revoked the bequest of the residue contained in the settlement.

Macdonell's Trustees v Macdonell's Trustees, (O.H.) 1911, 2 S.L.T. 170.

(357)

Direction to pay legacies testator might leave by writing under his hand—Application to prior general settlement.

After the death of A in 1906, there were found in his repositories two universal trust dispositions and settlements, one dated in 1860 and the other in 1897. By that dated in 1860 A, after making certain small specific bequests, directed the residue of his estate to be divided among his brother and certain of his sisters in certain proportions. By the trust disposition of 1897 the trustees were directed to pay any legacies "I may leave . . . by any writing under my hand," and to pay the residue of his means and estate in the manner "to be directed or appointed by any writing or writings under my hand," and in default "of my leaving any such written directions or instructions," the trustees were directed to pay the residue to the testator's heirs in mobilibus. Held (1) that the trust disposition and settlement of 1860 was impliedly revoked by the trust disposition and settlement of 1897; and (2) that by the words "any writing under my hand" in the settlement of 1897 the testator meant future writings only, and that they did not apply to the deed of 1860.

Revocation of will by marriage contract.

In 1879 a lady executed a settlement by which she conveyed her whole estates to executors, directing them to divide the residue among three charitable institutions. In 1886 she entered into a second marriage, and by antenuptial contract she conveyed her whole estate to trustees, who were directed to hold the estate for her behoof in life, and to hold the capital for behoof of such persons as she should appoint by any writing under her hand, and failing such appointment for her heirs in mobilibus. On her death the lady left the settlement of 1879, but no other writing except the marriage contract. The capital of the estate had been delivered to the marriage contract trustees. Held that the deed of 1879 was not effectual either as an independent settlement or as an appointment under the marriage contract, but was revoked by the marriage contract, which was to be taken as a settlement of the lady's entire estate as existing at her death.

Donatio inter virum et uxorem stante matrimonio—Testament dealing with subject of gift.

A conveyed a house to his wife, who was infert therein, the disposition proceeding upon the narrative that he had through her succeeded to money. His wife predeceased him, and after a second marriage he died, leaving a trust disposition and settlement conveying to trustees his whole means, heritable and moveable, and directing them to dispose of, inter alia, his "house, furniture, plate, &c.," and also generally to realise the residue, "whether heritable or moveable." Held, without deciding the question whether or not the disposition to the wife was revocable, that it had not been revoked.

Two codicils in similar terms—Revocation of earlier by later codicil.

Held that a holograph and informal codicil was not revoked by a subsequent codicil of the same character, bearing similar prefatory words and repeating the names of all but one of the legatees under the prior codicil, with the same sums opposite to them, and adding several others, but remained a subsisting testamentary writing; and the bequest to the person whose name was contained in the prior but omitted in the subsequent codicil, sustained.

Bond of annuity to widow under Aberdeen Act (5 Geo. IV. c. 87)—Disentail and re-entail of estate under Entail Amendment Act, 1848—Affidavit by disentailer that no provisions to widow affected the lands.

An heir of entail executed in virtue of the Aberdeen Act a bond of annuity in favour of his wife. Subsequently he disentailed and re-entailed the estates, in the course of which proceedings he made an affidavit under the Rutherford Act that there were no provisions to widows affecting the lands. Held that the bond of annuity had been intentionally evacuated.

(362)

Testator destroying will containing clause of revocation—Earlier will in existence at date of death—Action for declarator that he died intestate.

A testator, who had executed a will in 1878, executed another will in 1885 by which he revoked all previous testamentary writings. He retained the will of 1885 in his possession, and subsequently destroyed it animo revocandi. At the time when that will was being prepared by his law agents he sent them the will of 1878 with a note of the alterations required for the new will, and the will of 1878 was still in their possession at the time of his death. In an action at the instance of the testator's heir for declarator that the will of 1878 was not operative as a testamentary writing, the pursuer averred, inter alia, that the testator believed that that will had been destroyed, and that, when he destroyed the later will, he believed he was annulling the only deed which regulated his succession. The pursuer also averred that the testator had stated that he was leaving no will, and that his property would devolve upon the pursuer or her son. The Court allowed a proof before answer.

Letter cancelling recent will and confirming prior will.

A testator left two wills, one dated twelve years after the other. In the former he made his brother his universal legatary, and in the latter he made no mention of him at all. In his repositories there was also found an undated holograph letter addressed to his brother, who survived him, in which he mentioned the first will, and also said that "you may perhaps find another drawn as if I happened to outlive you—you can destroy it." Held that the effect of this letter was to cancel the later will and confirm the earlier one.

Conditio si testator sine liberis decesserit—Whether earlier will restored by implied revocation.

(4) EFFECT OF CONFIRMATION OR RE-EXECUTION OF TESTAMENTARY WRITINGS.

(365)

Revoked general settlement set up by codicil—Implied revocation of subsequent general settlement—Whether codicil to earlier general settlement set up.

In the repositories of a person deceased there were found the following writings of a testamentary character, viz.:—(1) Trust disposition and settlement dated 21st March, 1879, containing, inter alia, a clause revoking all former testamentary writings, and omitting to provide expressly for the income of the heritable estate in an event which happened; (2) codicil referring to the foregoing deed, written on a separate piece of paper, and dated 3rd May, 1879; (3) trust disposition and settlement, dated 17th May, 1879, inter alia, revoking all former testamentary writings and directing as to the disposal of the income of the heritage in the event above referred to; (4) codicil appended to the foregoing, dated 22nd May, 1879; (5) codicil dated 30th June, 1881, and written on the same paper as the trust disposition of 21st March, 1879. This codicil bore that "I, the before designed" testator, "having reconsidered the foregoing trust disposition and deed of settlement, have resolved to make the following alterations and additions thereon," then followed certain alterations and additions on the trust disposition of 21st March, 1879; the codicil then concluded "and with these alterations and additions, I hereby homologate and approve of said trust disposition and deed of settlement in all other respects." Held that the effect of the codicil of 30th June, 1881, was to revive the trust disposition and settlement of 21st March, 1879, but not the codicil of 3rd May, 1879; and that the trust disposition of 17th May, 1879, and the codicil of 22nd May, 1879, were revoked absolutely.

Codicil confirming settlement except in so far as altered—Revocation of intermediate codicil.

A testatrix executed a trust disposition and settlement, which contained a revocation of all former testamentary writings and a reservation of a power of alteration or revocation by any writing however informally executed. Thereafter, on a separate sheet of paper, she executed a codicil making an important alteration on the settlement. A year later she executed a second codicil, which was written on the settlement, and bore to be a "codicil to the foregoing trust disposition and settlement." Its only provisions were with regard to certain small pecuniary legacies; and it concluded, "except in so far as hereby altered, I confirm my said trust disposition and settlement in all respects, and provide that it and this codicil shall be read and construed together as forming one document." Held, in the circumstances, that the confirmation of the trust disposition and settlement contained in the second codicil did not have the effect of revoking the provisions of the first codicil.

Codicil confirming will and first codicil, but omitting mention of second codicil—Effect upon second codicil—Intention of testator.

A testatrix left a trust disposition and settlement and three codicils. The settlement disposed of the residue of her estate. The first codicil contained bequests of certain legacies. The second codicil contained bequests of additional legacies and further directions with regard to the vesting of the residue of the estate, and nominated an additional trustee; it also contained a clause confirming the settlement and the first codicil. The signature to the second codicil was almost illegible; and subsequently a third codicil was prepared and was executed notariaily, which repeated the provisions of the second codicil with the omission of the nomination of the additional trustee, and repeated also the clause confirming the settlement and the first codicil, but made no mention of the (second codicil. A question having arisen as to the effect of this deed upon the second codicil, circumstances in which held that the omission of all mention of the second codicil from the clause in the third codicil confirming the settlement and the first codicil had not the effect of revoking the second codicil.

Intention to restore revoked legacy.

A testator died leaving a trust disposition and settlement dated 9th December, 1898, by which he bequeathed a legacy of £5000 to Dr. B. By a codicil dated 9th September, 1901, he revoked that legacy, and bequeathed the sum of £5000 to a cousin. Both of these documents remained in the custody of the testator's agents. By a holograph codicil dated 11th November, 1907, which was found along with a number of other holograph codicils in the testator's repositories, he bequeathed the sum of £2000 to Dr. B, and provided—"This is in addition to any legacy mentioned in my Will and Codicils." There were no other bequests to Dr. B mentioned in his testamentary writings. Dr. B and the cousin both survived the testator. Held that the reference in the codicil of 11th November, 1907, to "any legacy mentioned" in the testator's will and codicils, did not have the effect of restoring the revoked bequest of £5000 to Dr. B.

Implied revocation of codicil—Restoration of original bequest.

A testator died leaving a settlement, dated 8th February, 1879, by the eighth purpose of which he bequeathed £18,000 to his nephew. By his eighth codicil, dated 17th November, 1879, he reduced this legacy to £16,000. A twelfth codicil, dated 5th February, 1880, provided—"In addition to the legacy or legacies left to my nephew . . . in the eighth purpose of my trust disposition and settlement, which was executed by me in February last, I hereby leave him two thousand pounds stg. if my estate can afford it." In a question between the nephew and the residuary legatees, held that the twelfth codicil, in referring to the eighth purpose of the original deed, had restored the bequest there given to its original amount, and had given £2000 in addition thereto.

Best v University of Edinburgh, 1880, 8 R. 66; 18 S.L.R. 45.

(370)

Re-execution of prior will—Effect on validity of intervening codicil—Competency of extrinsic evidence.

A testatrix by her will, dated 13th January, 1904, inter alia directed her trustees to pay the income of £5000 to her daughter, and on her daughter's death to pay £500 thereof to a grand-daughter, "to pay a further sum of £1500 thereof in the manner to be afterwards directed by me in any writing or writings to be hereafter executed by me," and to pay the remainder, £3000, to certain grandchildren. The will contained a clause revoking "all previous testamentary writings." The testatrix left no writing dated after 13th January, 1904, dealing with the sum of £1500, but there was found in her repositories after her death a holograph document dated 21st December, 1903, by which she bequeathed the £1500 to certain beneficiaries. The will of 13th January, 1904, was in its main provisions the same as a previous will executed by her on 16th December, 1903, but contained certain alterations, one of them being the provision with regard to the sum of £1500, which was not contained in the previous will. Circumstances in which held (1) that the will of 13th January was not a mere re-execution of the will of 16th December; (2) that extrinsic evidence (consisting chiefly of correspondence between the testatrix and her law agents) was not competent for the purpose of establishing that she intended, notwithstanding the clause of revocation in the will of later date, that the document of 21st December should form part of her testamentary writings; and accordingly (3) that the document of 21st December, having been revoked by the will of 13th January, was inoperative as a testamentary writing.

Revocation of codicil to prior universal settlement.

A lady left (1) a trust disposition and settlement, partly signed by her and also executed notarially of date 8th March; (2) a codicil executed notarially on 14th March; and (3) a trust disposition and settlement executed on 9th April in the ordinary way, all in the year 1890. (1) and (3) were both universal settlements, and were practically identical. There was no express revocation of prior settlements in (3). The codicil bequeathed a legacy to a person to whom a legacy was bequeathed in the first trust disposition, and again in identical terms in the second trust disposition, the codicil bearing that its provision was "in addition to the provisions in my trust disposition and settlement in favour of the" legatee. In a special case brought to determine whether the codicil was or was not recalled by the second trust disposition, it was stated that the first trust disposition of the 8th of March was executed notarially, because from bodily weakness the testator had not been able to complete the execution of it in her own hand; that her man of business had explained to her that, if she recovered strength, "it might be better to have the deed re-executed and signed by herself"; that accordingly, she having recovered, it was so "re-extended and re-executed," this deed being the trust disposition of 9th April; and that the notary who prepared and executed the codicil was not the same person who prepared the two trust dispositions and took charge of their execution. Held that the codicil was not recalled, the trust disposition of 9th April being merely a re-attestation of the will of 8th March.

(5) REVOKING DEED INEFFECTUAL.

(372) Disposition of heritage—Subsequent ineffectual disposition of same heritage.

In 1866 a married woman disposed her whole heritable and moveable property to herself and her husband and the survivor, whom failing to trustees for behoof of her daughters—reserving power to herself to alter or revoke with consent of her husband. In 1867 the lady executed, with consent of her husband, a trust deed “to regulate the management and distribution” of her estate after her death, in which she conveyed to the trustees her whole heritable and moveable estates for behoof of her husband in liferent, and four of her eight daughters in fee, subject to annuities of £100 in favour of each of her other daughters and her son on the death of his wife, reserving full power to herself alone to alter or revoke the deed or sell the property. There was no express clause of revocation of the previous deed. The second deed was ineffectual as a conveyance of heritage in consequence of the omission of the word “dispone.” In an action brought by the son, as his mother's heir at law, for declarator that the first deed was revoked by the second deed, held that, apart from the inconsistent conveyance of heritage in the second deed, which was ineffectual, there was no implied revocation of the conveyance of heritage in the first deed, and that to that extent the first deed was effectual.

(373) Erroneous belief that testamentary writing defective—Second writing invalid.

A Scottish testator duly executed a codicil to his will, and sent it to his London solicitor, who, under the erroneous impression that it was not completed according to the solemnities of Scots law, docquetted it as “Not used—incorrectly signed,” and laid it aside, at the same time informing his client of the supposed invalidity, and sending him a second codicil in precisely the same terms, with minute directions for execution. The testator received and executed this second copy of the codicil, and returned it to his solicitor, but the execution was invalid. Held that the second codicil, being invalid, could have no effect in revoking the first, and that the attempt to execute it afforded no indication of an intention to do so.

Stirling Stuart v Stirling Crawford's Trustees, 1885, 12 R. 610; 22 S.L.R. 391.

(374) Residuary bequest in will — Ineffectual residuary bequest in codicil — Residuary legatee under codicil predeceasing date of vesting.

A testator in his settlement gave the life-rent of his estates to his widow, and appointed her his residuary legatee. In a codicil executed some years after he expressly revoked certain legacies and confirmed “the bequests,” &c., “to my half-brothers James and Archibald, with the addition that if the said James shall survive myself and my spouse he shall be considered my residuary legatee,” and “he shall pay to his brother Archibald,” &c.; and “I further authorise my wife Helen, if she survive me, to alienate by gift, or bequeath by will, any portion or portions of my personal or moveable property of which she is to enjoy the use or income, not exceeding in all £3000 sterling.” James survived the testator, but predeceased the widow. In a question between the widow and other beneficiaries on the one part, and one of the testator's next of kin on the other, held that the residuary bequest in favour of the widow took effect in so far as the residuary bequests in the codicil were not effectual, and that there was no intestacy.

Ogilvie's Trustees, 1870, 8 M. 427; 42 J. 204; 7 S.L.R. 253.

(375) Holograph paper containing a number of legacies — Subsequent general conveyance — Gift of residue void.

In 1882 A wrote to a friend B, “I mean to write out a kind of will or assignation and I would sign it, and I would give you the names of the parties I have in view. . . . I want this to be a separate thing from my general will.” Two months afterwards he sent B a holograph letter of instructions, naming a number of legacies, amounting to £1150, which he wished to be paid, “these payments to be made by you after my death.” He reserved power to himself to withdraw any part of the £1150, which he at the same time paid over to B. He died in 1892, leaving a trust disposition and settlement dated 20th April, 1891, in which he conveyed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees for certain purposes, but did not effectually dispose of the residue. The trust disposition did not expressly revoke the letter of instructions, and the £1150 if carried by the trust disposition would have fallen into residue. Held that the letter of instructions was not impliedly revoked by the general conveyance to the trustees.

(376) Purpose of subsequent deed exhausted.

A husband and wife executed a mutual settlement whereby each disposed of his estate in favour of the survivor. There was no clause revoking previous settlements. The wife survived the husband and died. Held that a deed executed prior to her marriage was effective.

Sim v Sim, (O.H.) 1915, 2 S.L.T. 201.

4. EVACUATION OF SPECIAL DESTINATION BY GENERAL DISPOSITION.

[See XIII. 7, infra.]

5. CONDITIO SI TESTATOR SINE LIBERIS DECESSERIT.

(1) GENERALLY.

(377)

Nature of doctrine.

Per Lord Watson—"According to the law of Scotland, the question whether the testament of a parent is revoked by the subsequent birth of a child is one wholly dependent upon the circumstances of the case."

(378)

The question whether a testament executed when the testator has no children is revoked by the subsequent birth of a child is one wholly dependent on the circumstances of the case.

Millar's Trustee v Millar, 1893, 20 R. 1040; 30 S.L.R. 865; 1 S.L.T. 172.

Right to plead.

The right to challenge a will on the ground that a child has been born to the testator subsequent to the date of the will is personal to the child so born, and if the child dies without making a claim, no right to make it passes to his personal representatives.

Smith's Trustees v Grant, (O.H.) 1897, 35 S.L.R. 129; 5 S.L.T. 190.

Total or partial revocation.

Where a will was revoked by the operation of the conditio, held that the revocation was not limited to the provisions of the will disposing of the testator's estate in favour of beneficiaries but extended to the whole will, including the clauses appointing trustees and executors, and tutors and curators to the testator's children.

Total or partial restoration.

Held that although a will which has become inoperative owing to the subsequent birth of a child may be validated in toto by proof of circumstances showing the testator's intention that it should receive effect notwithstanding the birth, it cannot be validated in part in any circumstances.

Crow v Cathro, 1903, 5 F. 950; 40 S.L.R. 687; 11 S.L.T. 143.

Revival of earlier testamentary writings.

While the law presumes that a will which makes no provision for children nascituri is revoked on the subsequent birth of a child, there is no presumption that a prior will which has been expressly revoked by the later will is restored, although it contains provisions for children nascituri.

Per Lord McLaren—"I should be disposed to hold that whenever a last will is cut down by the operation of the rule or presumption that we are now considering, all previous testamentary settlements must fall along with it except such as are obligatory and matter of contract."

A testator died on 16th February, 1922, survived by a widow and by two daughters, who were born on 23rd January, 1915, and 6th April, 1918, respectively. After the birth of the elder daughter, but before the birth of the younger daughter, he executed two testamentary writings. The first was a trust disposition and settlement, dated 13th February, 1917, which contained provisions in favour of children nascituri. The second was a holograph settlement, dated 31st July, 1917, which was universal in its terms, but contained no express revocation of earlier testamentary writings. By it he bequeathed his whole estate to his widow absolutely. Held (1) that, although the elder daughter was alive at its date, the second deed was revoked by the subsequent birth of the younger daughter; (2) that the deceased's succession fell to be regulated by the first deed, which provided for children nascituri, in respect that the revocation of it by the second deed was merely an implied revocation, and had been rendered ineffective by the revocation of that deed.

(2) APPLICATION OF CONDITIO.

(384)

Whether will provides for children nascituri—Whether marriage contract to be read with will.

A lady by antenuptial contract settled certain specific funds on any children who might be born of the marriage, reserving to herself a power of bequeathing the trust estate by will in the event of there being no child of the marriage who should attain twenty-one years of age (or, if a daughter, should marry). Ten days after the marriage she executed a settlement "pursuant to the power reserved" in the marriage contract, bequeathing the residue of her property equally between her husband and sister. Two years after the marriage she succeeded to certain heritable estate from a brother. Shortly thereafter she gave birth to a child, one month after whose birth she died. The legatees contended that the marriage contract and the will were to be read together as one settlement, and that as express provision had been made for children of the marriage the condition si sine liberis testator decesserit did not apply to the will. Held that the will was subject to the condition si testator sine liberis decesserit.

Lapse of time subsequent to birth of child—Testator surviving for a period of years.

A testator died in October, 1908, leaving a trust disposition and settlement, dated 12th December, 1896, whereby he conveyed his whole estate to trustees, with directions to convey the whole moveable estate to his wife, and to pay her the rents of two heritable properties (the only heritage belonging to him at the date of the will or his death), and on her death to convey them, the one to his brother and the other to his sister. The settlement made no provision in favour of children. There was no clause disposing of residue. The settlement was left in the hands of the testator's law agent for custody, and remained there until the testator's death. At the date of the settlement the testator (who had been married in 1889) had no children, but subsequently, in November, 1898, a daughter was born, who survived her father. Held that the trust disposition and settlement had been revoked by the birth of the daughter. Opinions that mere lapse of time is not sufficient to overcome the presumption that a will is revoked by the subsequent birth of a child to the testator.

(386)

A, a few days before his marriage, executed a will whereby he left the residue of his estate to his wife. Two years after his marriage, on the narrative that he had made no marriage provision for his wife, and in order to make such provision, A assigned certain policies of insurance to his wife. A child was born three years after the marriage, and five years after the birth of the child A died. Held that the conditio si testator sine liberis decesserit applied, and that the will became inoperative on the birth of the child.

Rankin v Rankin's Tutor, 1902, 4 F. 979; 39 S.L.R. 753; 10 S.L.T. 181.

A testator executed a trust disposition and settlement leaving his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to his younger brother. Four years afterwards he married after executing an antenuptial marriage contract, in which, inter alia, he disposed a house to himself and his wife "in conjunct fee and liferent for her liferent use alienarily, and to his heirs and assignees whomsoever in fee." Three years afterwards a son was born, and two years later the testator died. Held that the presumption that the will had been revoked on the birth of a child had not been displaced; and, accordingly, that the fee of the house belonged to the son as heir at law of his father.

(388)

A testator who was forty years of age and married, but had no family, executed a will whereby he left half of his estate to his wife and authorised his executors to divide the residue as they might think fit. The testator died four years later. Two children were born to him subsequent to the date of the will, and he survived the birth of the elder child by two years, and that of the younger child by four months. Held that the will was superseded by the operation of the conditio si sine liberis.

A's Executors v B, (O.H.) 1874, 11 S.L.R. 259.

Testator surviving fourteen months after birth of child—Will in favour of testator's wife.

A, sixteen months after his marriage, executed a will, by which he left his whole estate to his wife. Five years later a child was born of the marriage, and fourteen months afterwards A died. Held that the conditio si testator sine liberis decesserit applied, and that the will became inoperative on the birth of the child.

(390)

Children in life at date of will—Will making no provision for children nascituri.

The presumption is that a settlement which makes no provision for children nascituri is revoked on the birth of a child to the testator after the date of the settlement, although he had children at its date.

In 1896 a testator executed a universal trust disposition and settlement. At that time his family consisted of two children, and in the will he made provision for his widow and his two children, but made no provisions for children nascituri. In 1897, eighteen months afterwards, a third child was born. The testator died in 1905, at the age of sixty, unexpectedly, after a short illness. At his death the will of 1896 and the draft of a new will were found together in his repositories. Held that there was a presumption that the will of 1896 had been revoked by the subsequent birth of a child, and that there was no circumstances in the case sufficient to rebut that presumption.

(392)

Exclusion of conditio.

Circumstances in which it was held that the application of the conditio si testator sine liberis decesserit had been displaced.

Stuart-Gordon v Stuart-Gordon, 1899, 1 F. 1005; 36 S.L.R. 779; 7 S.L.T. 79.

———Bulk of testator's estate settled by marriage contract—Testator surviving for four years after date of will.

Circumstances in which it was held that a testament had not been revoked by the subsequent birth of a child.

Millar's Trustee v Millar, 1893, 20 R. 1040; 30 S.L.R. 865; 1 S.L.T. 172.

(394)

———Knowledge of wife's pregnancy on part of testator—Will not general disposition.

Held that the conditio si testator sine liberis decesserit did not apply to a will, in respect (1) that it was executed by the testator in the knowledge that his wife was pregnant; and (2) that it was not a general disposition disposing of the universitas of his estate.

(395)

Declarations of intention.

Held that proof of declarations of intention made by the testator is not competent either to rebut or to fortify the presumption which arises from the birth of a child subsequent to the date of his father's will.

Smith's Trustees v Grant, (O.H.) 1897, 35 S.L.R. 129; 5 S.L.T. 190.

(396)

Restoration of will subsequent to birth of child—Pencil alterations on will subsequent to birth of child.

A solicitor, on 5th February, 1884, made a holograph will in favour of his parents should they survive him, and, failing them, in favour of his nephew. A year afterwards he married, executing a marriage contract in which he settled part of his estate upon his wife and children. He died in 1889, leaving a widow and children. After his death the will was found in his repositories altered in pencil in favour of his wife and daughter. The alterations were in his handwriting, but were neither initialed nor signed, and had no date attached to them. Held (1) that the will as it originally stood became inoperative by reason of the conditio si testator sine liberis decesserit; and (2) that the pencil alterations were to be regarded merely as converting the will into a draft for another will to be afterwards made.

Munro's Executors v Munro, 1890, 18 R. 122; 28 S.L.R. 104.

Persons whom testatrix "may appoint by any writing under her hand"—Whether previously executed writing included.

A lady by antenuptial contract conveyed her whole estate to trustees directing them to hold the estate for herself in life and for such person or persons in fee "as she may appoint by any writing under her hand" and failing such appointment for behoof of her nearest heirs in mobilibus whomsoever. Held that a universal settlement which the lady had executed some years before the date of her marriage contract, and which was found in her repositories after her death uncanceled, was not an appointment within the meaning of her marriage contract, and that her heirs in mobilibus as legatees under the marriage contract had right to her entire estate.

Legacies testator "may" leave by writing under his hand.

On the death of A in 1906 there were found in his repositories two universal trust dispositions and settlements, one dated in 1860 and the other in 1897. By the deed of 1897 the trustees were directed to pay any legacies "I may leave . . . by any writing under my hand," and to pay the residue of his estate in the manner "to be directed or appointed by any writing or writings under my hand." Held that by the words "any writing under my hand" in the deed of 1897, the testator meant future writings only, and that they did not apply to the deed of 1860.

"Family"—Children predeceasing settlement.

Circumstances where held that the word "family" used in a bequest in a trust settlement included children dead before the execution of the settlement.

Conditio si sine liberis decesserit—Parent not instituted—Parent dead at date of will—Conditio not applicable to surviving issue.

Exercise of power of disposal by general settlement — Power conferred subsequent to date of settlement.

M'Tavish's Trustees v Ogston's Executors, 1903, 5 F. 641; 40 S.L.R. 458; 10 S.L.T. 739, No. 1280, infra.

3. TESTAMENTARY WRITINGS CONSTRUED TOGETHER.

(1) SEVERAL WILLS.

[See also VII. 3 (2), supra.]

(401)

Holograph will following on formal will.

A testatrix left two testamentary deeds. In the first she nominated A B and C D trustees, and also appointed them her executors, and ordained them, failing a writing under her hand, after payment of debts, to divide the residue "among my next of kin who would have been entitled to succeed to my moveable estate had I died intestate." In the second deed, which was addressed to "my executrix A B, also C D," she left certain legacies, and bequeathed the residue "to my next of kin." The first deed was prepared by her man of business, the second was holograph of herself. Both were found in one envelope in the hands of her man of business at her death. Held that the later deed was not intended to supersede the former, but that the two deeds must be read together, and that the bequest of residue was to be construed as a bequest to her heirs in mobilibus.

Holograph testament containing residuary bequest—Subsequent holograph writing containing clause "balance left for further disposal."

A testator left a holograph testament disposing of his whole estate and containing a residuary bequest. He also left a holograph writing of subsequent date containing bequests and annuities in favour of nearly the same parties as were mentioned in the previous writing. It concluded "balance left for further disposal," but no other deed was discovered. Both writings were found in the testator's travelling bag. Held that the second writing did not revoke the first writing, but that both must be read as one writing.

Low's Executors, 1873, 11 M. 744; 45 J. 452; 10 S.L.R. 505.

Conveyance of whole estate to executors—Subsequent conveyance of moveable estate for different purposes—Abatement of legacies.

A person by disposition and settlement conveyed his whole property, heritable and moveable, to executors for payment of his debts and of a number of legacies amounting to £1000, and for payment of the residue to J H. The testator subsequently executed a last will and testament conveying his moveable estate to different executors for payment of debts and of legacies to the amount of £600. The residue was directed to be paid to J H. At the testator's death his heritable estate proved insufficient to meet the legacies left by the first deed, but the heritable and moveable property together were more than sufficient to pay all the legacies under both deeds. Held that the legacies bequeathed by the first deed were not chargeable on the moveable estate, but only on the heritage, and must suffer a proportionate abatement.

Hood's Executors, 1869, 7 M. 774; 41 J. 402; 6 S.L.R. 503.

(2) WILL AND CODICIL.

(a) Generally.

(404)

Condition adjoined to legacy — Whether applicable to legacy payable along therewith — Direction to trustees to pay on event happening which did not take place.

By codicil to his will a testator left a legacy of £500, "which is to be handed over along with or at such time as legacies mentioned in clause D of this will are paid or handed over." The legacies in clause D were contingent on the testator surviving his mother, an event which did not occur. Held that the terms in which the direction was expressed did not import a condition into the legacy, and that the legatee was therefore entitled to payment.

Condition adjoined to bequest in will — Whether applicable to substituted bequest in codicil.

A testator by his will left the residue of his estate to his next of kin, the issue of any next of kin predeceasing the testator to take their parents' share. One of his brothers predeceased the date of the will, leaving three children, one of whom was a son R. By a codicil the testator provided that if R should succeed to the estate of G his share of residue should be one-half of what it would otherwise have been. By a second codicil the testator provided that R should be one of his residuary legatees, and this bequest was held to supersede the bequest of residue in favour of R contained in the will. Held the residuary bequest to R contained in the second codicil was not subject to the condition that R's share should be reduced to one-half if he succeeded to the estate of G.

Direction as to payment of legacies in settlement—Legacies in codicil.

A testatrix by a codicil left certain legacies to the minor children of a person who was domiciled in New Zealand. By her settlement she had directed that in the event of any of her legatees thereunder being under twenty-one years of age her trustees should be sufficiently discharged by paying the legacy to the parents of such minor legatees. Held that this direction applied to legacies under a codicil as well as to legacies under the settlement.

Lumsden's Trustees v Lumsden, (O.H.) 1921, 1 S.L.T. 155.

Direction in settlement that codicils be taken as "part and parcel of these presents" — Provision in codicil that foregoing bequests be paid free of Government duty—Whether applicable to later codicils.

A testator, by trust disposition and settlement dated in 1865, directed his trustees to make payment of a number of legacies, and to divide the residue of his estate among certain persons named, and further directed his trustees, inter alia, "to pay out of my said estate all such legacies gifts or provisions and implement all such instructions as shall be contained in any codicil or any memorandum or writing by me clearly expressive of my will though not formally executed declaring that the same whether formal or informal shall be held and taken to be part and parcel of these presents." By two codicils, dated in 1894 and in 1897 respectively, the testator made certain further bequests. The second codicil contained this provision—"I provide and declare that the foregoing bequests and also those contained in the foregoing trust disposition and settlement and codicil are to be satisfied and paid free of all Government duty." Thereafter by two codicils, dated in 1898, the testator made certain further bequests. Neither of these codicils contained any reference to Government duty. Held that the provision in the second codicil as to freedom from Government duty applied only to bequests already made, and did not apply to the bequests in the third and fourth codicils.

Legacy of corporeal moveables in will free of duty — Codicil bequeathing subjects to other persons—Clause confirming will subject to alterations.

A testator in her settlement directed her trustees "to pay over and deliver" certain legacies bequeathed by her "without any deduction or abatement whatever for legacy or succession duty, or otherwise." Among the legacies was one of all her silver-plate, furniture, &c. This legacy she recalled by a codicil, in which she bequeathed these articles to other legatees. The codicil contained this clause—"And I hereby declare that these presents shall in no way infer a revocation of my said deed of settlement before written, but that the same shall stand in full force, with this alteration thereon." Held that the clause of relief of legacy duty applied to the altered bequest contained in the codicil.

M'Alpine, &c., 1883, 10 R. 837; 20 S.L.R. 551.

(409)

Will declaring provision to be in satisfaction of legitim—Declaration applicable to provision made by codicil.

Gift of liferent to persons named and survivors — Revocation of bequest to one liferenter—Revoked share given to another person — Right of new legatee to share under survivorship clause.

In her trust settlement a testator appointed her trustees to pay over the yearly interest of the residue of her estate to her three brothers, Charles, George, and Stuart, equally among them, and to the survivors and survivor of them, and at the death of the survivor to divide the residue among three of her nieces. In a codicil, upon the narrative that George, one of the brothers, had died since the date of the settlement, she provided:—"I hereby recall the bequest made by me therein to George of a share of the residue of my estate, being one-third thereof, and ordain my trustees to pay over the said share which would have fallen to him had he not so predeceased me to his widow." The testatrix died in 1890, and her brother Stuart died in 1893. In an action raised by George's widow against the trustees, held (assuming that by share of residue the testator meant share of income of residue) that the pursuer was entitled not only to the third share of income, but also to one-half of Stuart's share to which under the settlement her husband would have been entitled.

Residuary bequest in will—Nomination of additional residuary legatees in codicil.

By his will a testator nominated his next of kin to be his residuary legatees. At the date of the will his next of kin were three brothers and a sister. By a codicil the testator provided that R, his nephew, "shall be one of my residuary legatees along with" the testator's wife and three nieces. He further left legacies to his brother, James, and his sister, who were the sole survivors of those who were his next of kin as at the date of the will. James and the sister survived the testator and were his next of kin at his death. Held that the nomination of residuary legatees in the codicil was a nomination of additional residuary legatees, and did not revoke the residuary bequest in the will, and that the residue fell to be equally divided among the testator's sister and brother, James, and the five persons mentioned in the codicil.

(412)

Revocation of bequest of "share" and gift of "share" of former legatee to another person—Right of new legatee to take jure accrescendi.

Residue left to "beneficiaries already named"—Alteration of beneficiaries by codicil.

A testatrix by her will bequeathed certain legacies, and directed her trustees to divide the residue of her estate among "the beneficiaries already named." By a codicil one of the legacies was revoked, two legacies to new legatees were added, and the will was otherwise confirmed. In a special case, held that the will and codicil must be read together, and that in the division of the residue the person whose legacy had been revoked fell to be excluded, and the two new legatees included.

Codicil executed for a specific purpose.

Where a codicil to a trust disposition and settlement had been executed for a specific and declared purpose unconnected with the general destination of the residue set forth in the trust disposition, held that the codicil could not be taken as modifying the construction of the clause disposing of the fee of the residue.

Specialia derogant generalibus.

A wife who had paid a sum to her marriage contract trustees for the purpose of paying the income to the spouses and the survivor, and the fee to any children who should survive the longest liver of the spouses, whom failing, to her own assignees, executors, or next of kin, died leaving a will bequeathing her "whole means and estate" to one of three children of the marriage. All the children predeceased the husband. A holograph memorandum was appended to her will and signed by her in these terms—"The property will be found in possession of" her agent. She then enumerated certain investments, being her whole property except the marriage contract fund. Held that there was nothing to indicate a testamentary intention to exclude the fund from the universitas bequeathed to her child.

(416)

Legacy reduced in amount—Whether life-ferent converted into fee.

In a mutual trust settlement two spouses directed the trustees, inter alia, to apply four shares of the trust estate for the use of the testators' daughter, J, in life-ferent till she attained thirty-five years of age or was married, and on her attaining said age without being married for payment of the principal to her, or in the event of her previous marriage for settlement of the principal on herself in life-ferent and her children in fee, whom failing, the same to form part of the estate for division. By a codicil the surviving spouse, in exercise of a power of alteration, recalled this direction, and "in lieu and in place of the provision or share of the estate thereby declared to be paid" to her daughter J, she directed, appointed, and declared "that only two and a half shares shall be paid to her." J was married before she was thirty-five years of age. Held that the codicil only changed the amount of the shares which were to be applied for behoof of J, and that J's right was a right of life-ferent only.

Chalmers' Judicial Factor v Chalmers, 1903, 5 F. 1154; 40 S.L.R. 814; 11 S.L.T. 236.

(417)

Revocation of destination over—Effect on vesting.

A share of residue was left to A subject to a destination over which suspended vesting. By codicil the testator revoked the destination over. Held that A's interest vested a morte testatoris.

Bequest to children of A with postponed vesting—Bequest in codicil to sons of A nominatim—Term of payment not specified.

By the mutual trust disposition of a husband and wife the residue of the husband's estate was disposed of in favour of his sister's children in such terms as to postpone vesting until the death of the wife who had the life-ferent of the estate and who was the survivor of the spouses. In virtue of a reserved power to alter without prejudice to the widow's life-ferent, the husband, by a codicil, directed five bank shares to be transferred to the five sons of the same sister nominatim, one to each. Held that the legacy in the codicil vested a morte testatoris.

Sanderson v Wardrop, 1873, 1 R. 96; 11 S.L.R. 14.

Vesting under settlement a morte testatoris—Term of payment altered by codicil—Power to trustees to withhold payment.

By trust disposition and settlement a testator directed her trustees, inter alia, to pay one-third share of the residue of her estates to each of her daughters at the first term occurring six months after her death. There was a destination over to survivors in the event of any of the children predeceasing the period of payment. By a codicil the testator directed her trustees to hold, inter alia, the proceeds thereof and also the shares of the residue appointed to the daughters in their own hands, for the benefit and alimentary use of the daughters equally, and to pay the daughters the capital and interest, or only the interest in such manner and in such proportions as to the trustees should seem proper. The provisions were declared to be alimentary. Held that as under the trust disposition by itself the provisions to the daughters vested a morte testatoris, and as the purpose in question was not revoked by the codicil, the codicil was not to be construed as altering the period of vesting.

Appointment of tutors and curators to beneficiary by will—Bequest in will revoked—Application of appointment to share taken as heir in mobilibus under codicil.

A testator directed her trustees to hold half of the residue of her estate for her nephew A until he attained the age of twenty-five, giving them power, if they should think proper, to make certain advances for his behoof before that date, "but which discretion will lie wholly with my said trustees whom I hereby appoint to be tutors and curators to him until he attain said age." She bequeathed the other half of the residue to B. By a codicil she recalled the bequest to B, adding "in the event of my death before executing a new settlement, such residue will be disposed of among those of (sic) my relatives according to their legal rights." A became entitled to part of this share of residue as one of her heirs in mobilibus. Held that B's share of residue had become intestate succession, and therefore that the powers conferred on the trustees and their appointment as tutors and curators to A did not apply to it.

Opinion that even if the share of residue in question had been testate succession under the codicil, the powers of trustees as tutors and curators did not extend to it.

Johnston v Johnston's Trustees, 1892, 20 R. 46; 30 S.L.R. 97.

(b) Extent of Revocation of Provisions of Will.

(421)

Revocation by codicil of bequest in will.

A testator conveyed his unentailed lands and property, heritable and moveable, to trustees, and directed them, in the third place, to invest and accumulate the whole free rents and proceeds of the trust estate, and to employ the funds so invested in the purchase of lands for the period of twenty years after his death. In the fifth place, he directed the trustees at the termination of the twenty years to settle the estates conveyed by the trust deed, and the lands purchased by them, in strict entail upon the truster's son and his heirs-male. In a codicil the truster directed that the trustees, "instead of investing the free rents of my unentailed estate in manner before mentioned, shall annually pay over the whole free proceeds of the same to my two daughters, equally between them, while both shall be in life, and to the survivor, and shall continue to do the same as long as both or either of them shall be alive." Held that the codicil superseded the fifth purpose of the settlement and that the daughters were entitled to the rents of the unentailed lands during their lives and not only for a period of twenty years after the testator's death.

Marquis of Breadalbane's Trustees v Jamieson, 1873, 11 M. 912; 45 J. 556; 10 S.L.R. 647.

(422)

Direction to divide subject among heirs in mobilibus—Original legatee one of the heirs in mobilibus.

Held that where a testator recalled by a codicil all provisions made in favour of a particular person, and directed her trustees to dispose of the estate so set free among her relatives "according to their legal rights," the person originally favoured was not thereby prevented from taking a share of the latter bequest as one of the heirs in mobilibus.

Bequest of business in will—Revocation by codicil.

A testator, in his trust disposition and settlement, directed his trustees to convey the property in which he had carried on business, with the furniture, machinery, and goodwill, to W. Terms of codicil on a consideration of which held that the testator had by implication revoked the bequest of the property and business made to W.

Residuary bequest—Construction—Ejusdem generis.

Terms of a holograph writing disposing of specific articles of jewellery, and other corporeal moveables, and constituting "my daughter J my residuary legatee," which were held not to revoke the residuary bequest contained in a prior general trust disposition and settlement, but to carry only corporeal articles ejusdem generis with those enumerated in the context.

Gore Booth's Trustee v Gore Booth, 1898, 25 R. 803; 35 S.L.R. 606; 5 S.L.T. 381.

Holograph writing modifying settlement—Subsequent codicil.

A testatrix, by general disposition and settlement, conveyed to her niece her whole heritable and moveable estate, under burden of debts and legacies, on the condition that her niece should pay any other legacies which the testatrix might think proper to leave by any writing under her hand, clearly indicative of her intention, although not formally executed. She appointed her niece her executrix. By a codicil to this will she revoked the conveyance of her moveable estate, and conveyed the same to other executors, directing them to fulfil any testamentary instructions left for them under her hand, and providing that any surplus of the moveable estate, after meeting debts and bequests, should be paid to her niece, but that any deficiency thereof should form a burden on her heritable estate. By a holograph document, addressed to her niece of date intermediate between the settlement and codicil, she directed that her heritable property should be sold, and that the price thereof, together with any surplus after payment of expenses, should be deposited in bank for behoof of her niece in liferent, and certain others in fee. Held that the holograph writing was inconsistent with, and therefore impliedly revoked by the codicil, which was of later date.

Storrar v Smal, 1838, 26 S.L.R. 43.

Revocation in codicil to English will—Ap-plication to Scots settlement.

A testator, who died possessed of heritable and moveable property in both England and Scotland, executed, in 1870, a trust disposition and settlement in Scottish form, in which he appointed seven trustees, and directed them to entail his Scottish estates on his second son and a series of substitute heirs. Thereafter, in 1877, he executed a "last will and testament" in English form, in which he appointed three of the former trustees his trustees and executors, and conveyed to them his whole English personal and real estate, the latter to be settled on his issue in tail-male. In 1880 he executed a holograph codicil, which commenced—"This is a codicil to the last will and testament of me," and in which he expressly confirmed his last will and testament of 1877, except in so far as he revoked all legacies and rights of succession in favour of the second son named as institute in the Scottish trust deed, "who, being a confirmed drunkard, is unfit to inherit any of my properties in England or Scotland," and to a granddaughter, who took nothing except under the Scottish deed. No mention of the Scottish deed was made in the codicil. Held that the terms of the codicil showed that the testator intended it to apply to both deeds—the Scottish as well as the English—and extinguished the interest therein of the persons named.

Partial revocation of destination—Effect.

An heir of entail in possession obtained a judgment declaring that the entail was ineffectual to prevent gratuitous alienation. He died in 1845, leaving (1) a mortis causa settlement whereby he disposed the estates to his brother A in liferent allanarly and the heirs of his body in fee, whom failing to his brother B in liferent allanarly and the heirs of his body in fee, whom failing to the heirs of the body of his deceased sister, whom failing to his sister D and the heirs of her body, whom failing to his "nearest heirs and assignees whomsoever"; and (2) a deed of restriction of subsequent date, whereby he revoked "the said destination and order of succession in so far as regards the persons called and appointed to succeed after my brothers therein named"; declaring it to be his intention "that the destination and order of succession in the said trust disposition and settlement shall not take effect beyond my said brothers and the heirs of their bodies, and that the person or persons further called to the succession shall have no claim to the same, but shall be entirely excluded therefrom, and are hereby excluded accordingly." He reserved a right to name a new series of heirs, and declared that his trust settlement, in so far as not restricted, should remain in full force and effect. After the death of A and B, both of whom survived the truster but left no issue, held (1) that the terms of the deed of restriction did not revoke the destination in the trust settlement to the truster's "heirs and assignees whomsoever"; and (2) that B's right as heir whomsoever was not prejudiced by the fact that a liferent allanarly had been conferred upon him by the same deed. Opinions that if the deed of restriction had had the effect of revoking the destination to the granter's heirs and assignees whomsoever, the trust settlement failing (in consequence of the death of A and B without issue) to convey the fee, the fee would have passed on the truster's death under the unevacuated destination in the entail to the next heir of investiture, and through him to B and to his disponees.

Legacy to B revoked and given to A—B's legacy renewed — Whether A's additional legacy revoked.

A testator, who left £57,000, by his settlement bequeathed to certain nephews, including A and B, legacies of £1000 each. Thereafter he executed a codicil to this effect—"I recall the legacy of £1000 to my nephew B . . . and I give said sum to my nephew A . . . to be paid to him at the same time with the like legacy of £1000 already given to him." Two days later he executed this other codicil—"I . . . renew the legacy of £1000 to my nephew B, to be paid to him as at the time of the original legacy . . ." Held that the additional legacy of £1000 to A had not been revoked.

Legacy to A in will—Conditional institution of A's children—Codicil revoking legacy to A—Legacy to conditional institutes in second codicil.

A lady in her settlement directed her trustee "to invest . . . £200 sterling for behoof of" her brother J L, "and out of the sum so invested to pay" to him £3 per month, and "to divide whatever balance is over of the sum so invested equally among his children, and in the event of his predeceasing," "instead of investing the said £200, to divide the same equally among" his children. A codicil, written by her own hand after her brother's death, bore—"October, 1879.—I hereby cancel and annul the legacy bequeathed to . . . J L, now deceased, but in all other respects hereby ratify and confirm the foregoing settlement." Then followed another codicil, without date, bearing—"I hereby bequeath to G, C, and S L, my late brother's daughters, the sum of £20." Held that the codicils cancelled the contingent legacy in the settlement in favour of J L's children.

(c) Effect of Inaccuracy in Codicil.

(430)

Codicil containing incorrect recital of terms of will.

By his will a testator directed his trustees to pay one-half of the residue of his estate to his son, and to hold the other half for his widow in life and his daughter in fee. By a holograph codicil, after erroneously narrating that, "As expressed in my last will and testament that, should my wife survive me she is to be life tenant in whatever means I may be possessed of, and at her death the same to be divided between my son . . . and my daughter . . ." the testator continued, "I wish that to be carried out, but I hereby specially desire, that at the death of my son, should he die without issue, his portion shall pass to my daughter." In a special case held, on a construction of the will and codicil in the light of the circumstances of the case, that the inaccurate recital in the codicil did not have the effect of altering the provisions of the will by increasing the widow's life interest or revoking the gift to the son.

(431)

A testator bequeathed a legacy of £300 to A. There was no other legacy to A in the will. By a subsequent codicil, the testator recalled "the legacy of £200" to A. In an action at the instance of A against the testamentary trustees for payment of the legacy, held that A's legacy of £300 had been revoked by the codicil.

Stewart v Campbell's Trustees, (O.H.) 1917, 2 S.L.T. 259.

Residue—Misstatement of share.

A testatrix by her trust settlement bequeathed a half of the residue of her estate subject to a life interest to her daughter. The life interest predeceased the testatrix, who thereupon executed a codicil dealing with the lapsed life interest, but in the codicil she referred to her daughter's share of the residue as one-third instead of one-half. Held, after a proof of circumstances, that the bequest to the daughter of one-half of the residue of the estate was not revoked, the reference in the codicil to the daughter's share as one-third thereof being falsa demonstratio.

Russell's Trustees v Palmer, (O.H.) 1901, 9 S.L.T. 321.

Revocation—Misdescription of legacy.

An old lady executed a settlement with five codicils, all on one sheet of paper. She disposed of a property she had to a niece, whom she named her executrix and residuary legatee. By the first of the codicils she bequeathed, inter alia, "to Edward Whish, son of my cousin Margaret Whish, wife of Colonel Whish, five hundred pounds." The last codicil bore—"I revoke the legacy of five hundred pounds to my cousin Mrs. Whish" (there being no such legacy), "wife of Colonel Whish, and bequeath to her in place thereof the sum of £400, and I bequeath the £100 to T H," her husband's nephew. Two other papers were found in the testatrix's repositories giving directions to her executrix, and they showed that she knew how much she possessed, and only meant to bequeath that amount, while if legacies were given to Edward Whish, Mrs. Whish, and to T H, the amount bequeathed would exceed by £500 the amount of the executrix estate. A letter of a subsequent date written by the testatrix to Mrs. Whish was produced, in which she stated that Edward Whish was still to be her chief legatee, "but not for so large a sum as I intended," and then went on to bequeath her gold watch to him, and certain jewellery, &c., to other relations. Held that the testatrix's intention was to revoke the legacy of £500 only to the extent of the £100 bequeathed to T H, her husband's nephew.

(434)

A testator by his trust disposition and settlement directed his trustees to pay or make over to each of three of his daughters one-fifth share of the residue and remainder of his "means and estate," the said shares to be at the absolute disposal of his said daughters respectively. By codicil he "revoked and altered" his settlement "to this extent, that in place of the absolute power therein given to" his three daughters, "I restrict that absolute power in each case to one-half of their respective shares of my heritable estate, and in respect of the other half," he gave directions intended to limit the power of the daughters during their lifetime. The testator's moveable estate amounted to £175,000 and his heritable estate to £8000. Held that the words "shares of my heritable estate" in the codicil applied to the testator's whole estate, whether heritable or moveable.

Effect of later codicil upon earlier.

By a codicil a testator directed the residue of his estate to be divided among his daughters in equal shares, and declared that the share of one of the daughters should suffer a deduction of £500, which sum was to be paid to one of her children. In a later codicil the testator dealt with this daughter's share, ignoring the deduction, and directing his trustees to hold, apply, or pay the share in question to or for behoof of the daughter and her children or any of them. Held, on the terms of the documents, that the bequest of £500 to the daughter's child contained in the earlier codicil was not revoked by the later codicil.

(3) WILL AND OTHER TESTAMENTARY DEEDS.

(436)

Effect of marriage contract—Wife sole legatee—Deed (1) making provisions for wife, and (2) disposing of residue on her death.

By will dated 17th February, 1886, a husband bequeathed his whole estate to his wife, and appointed her his sole executrix. By deed of trust and agreement, dated 17th May, 1886, which embodied a postnuptial contract, he conveyed his whole means to trustees, and directed them, inter alia (2) to pay to his wife a free annual allowance out of the trust funds for her alimentary use and for her separate maintenance while the spouses lived separately; and (6) failing issue of the marriage to pay the trust funds or the residue thereof upon his own and his wife's deaths to his nearest heirs, executors, and assignees whomsoever. Held, on the death of the husband, that the will was not revoked by the trust deed, which did not dispose of the capital of the trust funds, and (2) that the trustees were bound to retain a sum sufficient to provide for payment to the wife of her annual allowance provided by the trust deed.

Conveyance of testator's whole estate to wife—Wife in right of alimentary liferent under marriage contract—Discharge of alimentary condition.

By antenuptial contract of marriage the husband on his part conveyed his whole means and estate to trustees for payment, to himself during his life, and after his death to his wife, should she survive him, of the free annual income thereof, "for the liferent and alimentary use allenarly of them and the survivor of them, declaring that the same shall not be affectable by the debts or deeds of either of them, or the diligence of their creditors." Then followed provisions to the effect that in the event of there being no children of the marriage the fee of the husband's estate should be reconveyed to him, or made over to his heirs and assignees on the death of the wife. The marriage was dissolved, without issue, by the death of the husband, who left a will, by which he bequeathed "all my real and personal estate, including any property over which I have power of appointment, to my dear wife absolutely." Held that, on a sound construction of the husband's will, it was not his intention to discharge his estate of the alimentary liferent in his widow's favour, and consequently that the trustee was not entitled to denude of the trust estate.

Investments subject to special destinations—Whether part of general settlement.

By his trust disposition a testator left the whole residue of his estate to his children. His estate included various sums invested in bonds with destinations in favour of the testator and his wife or the survivor, which were not revoked by the trust disposition. Held that the trust disposition and the destinations in the bonds fell to be read together as constituting one general settlement of the testator's whole estate, and that the testator's children could make no claim to legitimize without forfeiting their testamentary rights.

(441)

Surrogatum for marriage contract provisions.

A husband contracted to pay his wife, if she survived him, an annuity of £200 sterling, and, on his death, to pay a sum of £2000 to trustees, to secure this obligation.

pro tanto. The husband died, having by will assigned all his means to his wife. These amounted to £1780. This sum the wife assigned to the marriage contract trustees, and a further sum of £220 was paid to them by the husband's brother. The wife accepted interest on the fund during her life. Held that her representatives were entitled to receive the £2000, as the wife was entitled to the fee of her husband's estate in terms of his will, and as the sum paid by the brother must be considered as a gift.

Kelso's Trustee v Allison, (O.H.) 1916, 2 S.L.T. 40.

4. CONFLICTING PROVISIONS.

(442)

Dispositive differing from inductive clause.

The inductive clause of a mortis causa disposition declared it to be the desire of the granters that a certain tenement should after their decease belong to C, their niece, for her life, and at her decease to her daughters D and E nominatim in fee, but by the dispositive clause the subjects were disposed "to C, D, and E, or the survivors or survivor of them." D predeceased the longest liver of the granters, leaving a daughter; C and E survived the granters. Held (1) that the dispositive clause could not be controlled by reference to the inductive; (2) that on the death of the last of the granters the fee vested in equal pro indiviso shares in C and E as the survivors at that date of the three disponees; and (3) that the daughter of D was not entitled under the conditio si sine liberis to any share of the subjects conveyed.

Chancellor v Mosman, 1872, 10 M. 995; 44 J. 557; 9 S.L.R. 646.

(443)

Annuity—Declared to be a real burden—Not mentioned in dispositive clause of settlement.

By his trust disposition and settlement, which was a universal settlement, a testator left an annuity to his widow, and declared it to be a real burden on the heritage, but it was not so declared in the dispositive clause of the deed. Held that the annuity had not been validly constituted a real burden on the heritage.

Scott v Scott's Trustees, (O.H.) 1898, 6 S.L.T. 119.

Specialia generalibus derogant.

A testator directed that the funds constituting a succession which had opened to him at the time of his death, but of which he had not up to the time of his death become entitled to the possession, should be paid over to R, whom he nominated his executor, and to whom he "bequeathed, assigned, and conveyed" the same. By another purpose of his will he bequeathed to N the whole stock belonging to him at his death in two railway companies named. The only railway stock he had was part of the succession conveyed to R.

Held that the special conveyance of the stock to N derogated from the general conveyance of the funds constituting the succession bequeathed to R, and that R, as executor of the deceased, was bound to convey the stock to N.

Nixon v Rogerson's Executor, 1882, 20 S.L.R. 10.

5. IMPLICATION.

(445)

Supplying by inference words omitted.

On the same day each of two sisters, X and Y, executed a similar trust settlement, in which each sister directed her trustees to invest four sums of £1000 for behoof of her brothers, A and B, her sister C, and her sister D's children as aftermentioned. With regard to A—(a) To give him and his children liferents of £1000; (b) on the death of the last surviving child, to divide the £1000 among A's grandchildren; and (c) failing grandchildren or their issue, to divide the £1000 among the other three legatees. With regard to B and D's children similar directions were given. With regard to C the direction was also similar, with the exception that the clause giving the grandchildren a fee was omitted. In a special case, held that the clause giving a fee to the grandchildren which did not appear in C's case could not be supplied by inference.

Object of bequest not named—Bequest "for the love I have for A."

A testatrix left a holograph will which bore—"I, . . . for the love I have for my husband, J.M., bequeath and leave everything which belongs to me, or may belong to me at some future time." Certain specific bequests to individuals named followed. Held that this will did not contain a bequest in favour of her husband, J.M.

Supplying prefatory words by implication—Marriage contract.

A testator directed his trustees to hold a share of his residue for his daughter upon the same terms as those contained in her marriage contract. By the marriage contract it was provided that the wife should have the liferent of a settled fund, and "in the third place, upon the death of the" wife, in the event of there being children and of the husband surviving, that the husband should have a liferent, and that the fee should be paid to the children; "and, lastly, in the event of there being no child or children" and of the husband surviving, that he should have a liferent, "and upon the death of the" husband that the fund should revert and belong to the wife's father, whom failing to certain other beneficiaries. There were no children of the marriage, and no provision with regard to the fee was made for the event, which happened, of the wife being the survivor of the spouses. Held that in order to give effect to the intention of the testator it was necessary to imply as introducing the last purpose of the marriage contract the prefatory words of the third purpose "upon the death of the" wife; so that the direction for the distribution of the fee should read as if it were "upon the death of the wife and upon the death of the husband"—that is to say, upon the death of the survivor of the spouses.

Request by implication—Erroneous recital of legacy.

A testatrix was predeceased by her brother, Archibald Gray, and by his son, also named Archibald Gray. The latter left a son, also named Archibald Gray, who survived the testatrix, and to whom she, by her trust disposition and settlement, bequeathed a legacy of £500 "and that in addition to and over and above the share of the legacy of one thousand pounds sterling hereinafter bequeathed to the children of his deceased father, Archibald Gray." The settlement contained no bequest of £1000 to the children of the legatee's father, the testatrix's nephew, Archibald Gray; but it did contain a legacy of £1000 to the children of the legatee's grandfather, the testatrix's brother, Archibald Gray. Held that no right to a legacy of £1000 was conferred by implication on the children of the testatrix's nephew, the general scheme of the settlement being inconsistent with such a bequest, and the erroneous reference to a legacy of that amount to these children being reasonably attributable to confusion in the mind of the testatrix owing to the identity of the names of her brother and her nephew.

Survivorship clause — Implied destination over to issue.

A testator directed his trustees to pay the liferent of the residue of his estate to his daughter and her husband, and at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the death of the survivor to divide and pay the residue, equally, share and share alike, among their children and the survivors and survivor of them. There was a destination over "in the event of its happening that all of my said grandchildren predeceased the terms of payment of their respective provisions without leaving lawful issue," and the term of payment was declared to be the term of vesting. The testator was survived by his daughter, her husband, and six grandchildren. The husband survived his wife and four of the children, and was survived by two children. One of the surviving children, Mrs. N, predeceased the term of vesting, leaving issue. Held that a conditional institution of issue was to be implied from the terms of the deed, and that the issue were entitled to succeed to one-half (not merely one-sixth) of the residue.

Overstatement of marriage contract provision—Debt or bequest.

In an antenuptial contract of marriage, dated 6th June, 1860, the husband bound himself to make payment to his wife, if she should survive him, "of a free yearly annuity of £100 sterling." By his will, dated 12th February, 1887, he conveyed his whole estate to trustees for certain purposes, and, inter alia, "for payment to my said wife of the free yearly annuity provided to her under our marriage contract, dated 6th June, 1860, of £150 sterling." Held that his widow was entitled to an annuity of £150, as the will showed that this was the testator's intention.

Implied gift of liferent—Gift to heirs of A on A's death.

Opinion, that the English rule which implies a liferent to A from the gift of the fee by a testator to his heir at law or next of kin on the death of A would be adopted by the Court in Scotland in circumstances appropriate for its application.

(453)

Gift of fee to issue of marriage, payable at death of husband.

By an assignation in trust made in contemplation of marriage, the wife conveyed her estate to trustees in trust (1) for behoof of herself in liferent; (2) after her death, if there were no issue of the marriage, for behoof of the husband in liferent so long as he remained unmarried; (3) for behoof of the issue, if any, of the marriage "then" surviving, and the issue per stirpes of predeceasers, payable at majority or marriage, whichever of these events should first happen, after the decease of the longer liver of the spouses, if the wife should be the survivor, "but after the decease or second marriage of" the husband "if he shall be the longer liver"; but declaring that if the husband entered into a second marriage "the foresaid liferent provision created in his favour in the event before mentioned" should, ipso facto, cease and determine. The wife died intestate, survived by the husband and by two children of the marriage, who were both major. Held that in view of the express gift of liferent to the husband in the event of there being no issue, a gift of a life interest to him was not to be implied from the postponement of payment to the children until his decease.

A testator directed the annual produce of two-thirds of his estate to be paid to A and B "and in the event of either A or B dying without leaving lawful issue to hold and pay the share of the income which would have fallen to the deceasing child for behoof of and to the survivor of them." The fee did not vest till the death of the survivor of A and B. A predeceased B. Held that during the life of B the issue of A were entitled to the interest of A's share.

——— Life interest to widow reducible to half in event of re-marriage—Fee to A—Implied life interest to A after re-marriage of widow.

A testator by his trust settlement left the whole income of the residue of his estate to his widow under the declaration that in the event of her marrying again she should only be entitled to one-half of the said income as and from the date of such second marriage. The fee of the residue was given to the testator's aunt, in whom it vested at his death. The widow re-married. Held that on the re-marriage of the widow nothing fell into intestacy, and the one-half of the whole income of the residue was thereafter payable to the aunt, but that the aunt was not entitled to demand immediate payment of one-half of the residue.

——— Gift of residue to A in life interest and his children in fee—Payment to children not to be made until majority—Whether life interest to A's children implied.

A testator directed his trustees to hold the residue of his estate for his son A in life interest and the son's children in fee. The children's shares were to be paid to them, if under age at their father's death, at majority, or in the case of daughters, on marriage. Power was conferred on the trustees "after the death of both parents" to pay interest, and to make advances out of capital, to the children. A was survived by his wife and by two pupil children. Held that A's widow did not take by implication a life interest of the residue of the testator's estate.

——— Marriage contract—Heritable estate conveyed to trustees—Implied gift of fee to children of marriage.

By an antenuptial contract of marriage the wife conveyed her whole estate, and particularly the lands of C, to trustees for certain purposes. Under these purposes if the wife was the survivor she was to have the rents of the heritable estate so long as there were issue surviving, and the trustees were directed to reconvey the heritable estate to her if there were no issue or on the failure of such issue by predeceasing her. The only express provisions as to the fee of the heritable estate if the husband was the survivor were limited to the events of there being no issue or the failure of such issue by predeceasing the husband. There was no express provision as to the fee in the event of there being issue surviving both spouses. The marriage having been dissolved by the divorce of the wife and there being three children of the marriage still alive, the divorced wife brought an action for declarator that she had the sole right and title to, and beneficial interest in, the fee of the estate of C. The Court dismissed the action, holding that there was conferred on the children of the marriage, by necessary implication from the terms of the marriage contract, such a contingent right in the fee of the estate of C as at least to disentitle the pursuer to obtain declarator hoc statu.

Gift over if legatee predeceased testator without issue—Legatee surviving testator but dying without issue—Revocation by codicil of bequest in will—Resulting intestacy.

A testator, by his trust disposition and settlement, directed his trustees, inter alia, to pay special legacies of considerable amount to all his children, and to divide the residue among them equally. By a codicil he revoked and recalled these directions, and, "in lieu and place of the same," directed his trustees to pay considerable legacies to all his children except his eldest son. The residue he directed to be held for behoof of his eldest son in liferent and his children in fee, and "in the event of" that son "predeceasing me without issue," to be divided equally among his other children. The codicil concluded thus—"Subject to these alterations and additions I do hereby ratify and confirm the said trust disposition and settlement in the whole heads, articles, and clauses thereof." The eldest son survived his father, but died without issue. Held that the codicil revoked the directions in regard to residue in the trust disposition and settlement, and that, although the codicil did not provide, as regarded the residue, for the event which had happened, the directions in the trust disposition and settlement were not thereby revived; and that the children's shares of residue fell to them ab intestato, and not under their father's settlement.

Gift to two sons in liferent and their issue in fee — Gifts over in event of sons dying without issue—Predeceasing son leaving issue and survivor not leaving issue.

A testator directed his trustees to divide the income of his heritage between his two sons; and in the event of one of his sons dying leaving issue, to sell the half and hold the proceeds for behoof of his issue equally; and then, in the event of the survivor dying leaving issue, to sell the remaining half and hold the proceeds for behoof of his issue; in the event of the first deceiver dying without issue, to apply his share for the use of survivor or his issue equally; and in the event of both dying without issue, to divide the property among certain charities. He did not expressly provide for the case, which happened, of the predeceasing son leaving issue and the survivor dying without issue. Held (1) that by the deed the heritage was destined to the two brothers and their issue, and on their failure to the charities, and that there was no intestacy; (2) that though the testator had failed to express the mode of division among the children of the predeceasing brother, his intention to divide equally was apparent from other parts of the deed, and should receive effect.

Gift over in event of A and B having children—B dying unmarried.

A and B, two brothers, pro indiviso proprietors of heritable subjects, executed a disposition by which they conveyed the subjects to trustees for behoof of certain liferenters and for the six children of A nominatim in fee. There was a declaration that in the event of any more children being born to A "and in the event of me, B, becoming married and leaving issue," the trustees were to convey one-half of the subjects to the six children of A and any others that might be born to him and the other half to B's children. In the event of there being no such issue of A and B the declaration was to become void at their deaths and the trustees were to make over the absolute fee of the subjects to the six children of A nominatim. A remarried and had a son. B died unmarried. Held that the child of A's second marriage was entitled to share in the subjects which belonged to his father, although according to the literal interpretation of the deed he was entitled to participate only in the event of B marrying and having children.

A testator, who died leaving no known heir or next of kin, by trust disposition and settlement directed his trustees to divide his estate into three equal shares, and to hold one of these shares for A in liferent, and her children and the survivors of them in fee; another share for B in liferent, and his children and the survivors of them in fee; and the third share for C in liferent, and his children and the survivors of them in fee. The trustees were directed, on the death of the respective liferenters, to pay over to their children in equal shares the fee of the respective shares set apart for them, payable to them on their respectively attaining twenty-one years of age, until which time the income was to be applied for their behoof. In the event of a fiat dying before the period of payment, his lawful issue were to take their parent's share, and if he left no issue the share of the deceiver was to be divided equally among his surviving brothers and sisters, the issue of a predeceasing brother or sister taking their parent's share; "and in the event of the whole fiars to any one share or portion dying without leaving issue before the said period of payment, such share or portion shall revert and fall to be administered as part of the residue of my estate." A and B died leaving issue. C died without ever having had issue. On the death of C, held that although the event which had happened had not been expressly provided for, it sufficiently appeared from the deed that the testator's intention was that the direction at the close of the residuary clause should apply if there were no issue of a liferenter of a share to take such a share, whether that resulted through the death of children who had been born, or because no children had ever been born, and that therefore the one-third share of the estate liferented by C did not fall to the Crown as intestate estate, but to the issue of A and B equally per stirpes.

Gift over in event of annuitant not accepting—Annuity to servant—Testator having no servant at death.

A testatrix directed her trustees to apply in certain proportions the residue of her estate in purchasing annuities for certain persons, and, inter alia, an annuity for the servant maid who might be with her at the time of her death, and added a provision that in the event of any of the annuitants failing to accept, or dying before the purchase of the annuities, the sum so set free should be set free for behoof of the surviving annuitants in the same proportion as the original provisions in their favour. Held that this clause applied to the share of residue set free in consequence of the testatrix having no servant at the date of her death.

7. THE SUBJECT OF THE GIFT.

(1) WORDS IMPORTING GIFT OF HERITAGE.

Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act,
1868—31 & 32 Vict. c. 101, sec. 20.

"Property"—Direction to sell "remainder of my property wherever situated"—Moveable estate insufficient to pay legacies.

A testatrix died in 1882, leaving a testamentary deed, in which she nominated a "sole executor and trustee." After a few bequests of moveables there came this clause—"I also direct my trustee to sell the remainder of my property, wherever situated, and to divide it equally among all my grand-nieces." The whole estate, with the exception of furniture and a balance in bank, consisted of heritage. The legacies more than exhausted the moveable estate. Held that the deed imported an intention on the part of the testatrix to bequeath her whole heritable and moveable property, and that her heritage was effectually conveyed to the trustee.

M'Leod's Trustee v M'Luckie, 1883, 10 R.
1056; 20 S.L.R. 714.

(470)

"Residue of my property."

A testatrix, by a holograph will, after leaving certain pecuniary legacies and bequests of furniture and effects, made this further provision—"My dear friend, Miss A C, for the kindness she has to me I leave the residue of my property." By a codicil she made further bequests of specific articles, and appointed trustees and an executor. The pecuniary legacies amounted to £510. The moveable property left by the testatrix amounted to £266 18s., of which £110 19s. represented the furniture and effects which she had specifically bequeathed. She also left heritage, consisting of a dwelling-house of the value of £900. She was aware of the amount of her moveable estate. Held that the testatrix had intended to dispose of, and had effectually disposed of, her heritable as well as her moveable property.

Craw's Trustees v Blacklock, 1920 S.C.

(471)

"Remainder to be invested."

A testator by a holograph "last will and testament," after bequeathing two pecuniary legacies of £100 each, provided "remainder to be invested as my trustees may direct," and gave instructions as to the disposal of the interest and capital of the sum so invested. At his death his estate consisted of the house in which he lived, furniture valued at £170, an insurance policy for £300, about £1000 of invested capital, and about £700 of cash. Held that the testator's house was not carried by his will.

Woodard's Judicial Factor v Woodard,

(472)

"All the property, goods, money, gear."

A holograph testament was in these terms, viz.—"I . . . do hereby dispoise, leave, and allocate all the property, goods, money, gear, stock, shares, boats, scrip, &c., which I may be possessed of at the time of my death, to be divided." Held that the testament conveyed heritage.

Oag's Curator v Corner, &c., 1885, 12 R.

(473)

Estate—"Whole estate."

A testator by holograph will appointed executors, and instructed them after paying his debts to divide the income of "the balance" between his brother and sister equally, and on the death of either to pay the whole income to the survivor; on the death of both "I wish my whole estate realised and equally divided between my cousins on my mother's side." The testator left about £3300 of moveable property, and also had a personal right to a share (valued at under £100) of a small heritable property. Held that the heritable property was carried by the will.

(474)

—“All my estate.”

A testator by his will, dated in 1905, appointed an executor whom he directed to realise “all my estate,” and to pay certain legacies. He further directed that “the residue of my estate,” after payment of the legacies, should be divided among his family. The testator died possessed of both heritable and moveable property. Held that the heritable property had been validly conveyed by the will to the executor, and that he had power to sell the same.

Jack's Executor v Downie, 1908 S.C. 718; 45 S.L.R. 545; 15 S.L.T. 989.

(475)

—Whole estate and execntry of every description — Appointment of executors — Power to intromit—No words of conveyance.

Terms of a testamentary writing which were held not to carry heritage.

Grant v Morren, 1893, 20 R. 404; 30 S.L.R. 442.

—Residue of my estate — Nomination of executor.

A testator died in 1877, leaving a holograph will in which he appointed his nephew to be his “executor,” and directed that “the residue of my estate shall be divided equally” among the children of the testator's half-brother (his executor being one). Held, on a construction of the whole terms of the will, that heritable property belonging to the testator was not conveyed thereby.

Observations on sec. 20 of the Titles to Land Act, 1868, in regard to the terms sufficient to import a bequest of heritage or a general disposition.

A testatrix by a holograph document described as her “last will and testament” appointed executors to whom she gave legacies. She then instructed them “to distribute the rest of my estate after payment of funeral expenses and debts” by the payment of a number of legacies, providing that, if the “money” left by her was insufficient to meet the legacies, the legacies should be reduced proportionately. After disposing of books, furniture, and other articles, she concluded—“I desire the residue of my estate, if any, to be divided into six equal parts,” one part to go to each of six funds connected with the United Free Church. The testatrix left moveable property amounting to £2949, which was more than sufficient to meet all the legacies. She also left heritable estate consisting of two dwelling-houses of the value of £300 and £190 respectively. Held that the testatrix intended to deal with, and had effectually dealt with, her whole property, both heritable and moveable.

—“Whole residue of my estate” —

Nomination of trustees and executors.

Terms of a will which were held not to carry heritage.

Bell v Bell, (O.H.) 1906, 14 S.L.T. 244.

(479)

—“All my other means and estate” — Direction to turn into cash.

There was found in the repositories of a deceased an informal holograph document in these terms—“All furniture, books, and personal effects to A absolutely, and the free liferent use of all my other means and estate. After A's decease, the whole of the estates to be turned into cash at the time my trustees deem most suitable for best realising, and proceeds safely invested for disbursing as under.” There then followed certain pecuniary legacies and a bequest of residue, and a nomination of trustees “for carrying out the foregoing.” Held that this document was equivalent to a general disposition of his heritable estate in favour of the trustees.

Aim's Trustee v Aim, &c., 1880, 8 R. 294; 18 S.L.R. 204.

Whole means and estate bequeathed to wife as executrix.

By antenuptial contract of marriage a husband conveyed to A, his intended wife, his whole household furniture and plenishing and the liferent use of a cottage, which belonged to him, along with the half of a plot of garden ground attached to it. He further took his heir bound to pay the wife an annuity of £15 out of certain other heritage belonging to him. He further gave his wife “full power and liberty, by mortis causa deed, to test upon and divide and apportion among my lawful children, whether by my first or this intended marriage . . . my whole means and estate . . . and to that end I hereby appoint the said A to be my executrix, with power to give up inventories of my estate, and all other powers competent to an executrix; and I hereby leave and bequeath my whole means and estate to her as executrix foresaid.” The husband died shortly afterwards, survived by children of a former marriage only, and without leaving any other deed of a testamentary character. Held that the terms of the marriage contract did not express or imply an intention on the part of the husband to convey the heritage to her.

Question, whether the widow's power of apportionment covered heritage.

(481)

Means and effects—Heritage acquired subsequent to date of will.

A testator left a holograph testamentary writing in these terms—"In order to prevent all dispute after my death regarding the disposal of my property, I hereby leave and bequeath to my beloved wife the whole of the means and effects in my possession, or belonging to me at the time of my decease, to be absolutely at her disposal." At the date of the writing the testator had no heritable property, but he subsequently acquired heritage. Held that the will carried the heritage.

(482)

Means and substance.

Observed (per Lord Pearson, Ordinary)—"The expression 'means and substance' would, I think, according to its common acceptation, include all disposable property."

MacLagan's Trustees v Lord Advocate, (O.H.) 1903, 11 S.L.T. 227.

(483)

"All and sundry goods, gear, debts, effects, sums of money, heritable and moveable."

By mutual disposition in 1840 two spouses proceeded to "assign and dispose" to each other respectively, and to the survivor, "All and sundry goods, gear, debts, effects, sums of money, heritable and moveable, household plenishing and furniture, and others whatsoever resting, pertaining, and belonging to" each of them "at the time of my death by bond, bill, ticket, account or in any other manner of way whatever," reserving to each spouse power to alter. At the date of execution neither of them had any heritable bonds or securities, and they never acquired any such, nor had they at that time any lands or houses. Many years afterwards the husband acquired certain heritable subjects, and took the title to himself and his wife in conjunct fee and liferent, for her liferent use alienably, and to his heirs and assignees whomsoever, reserving to himself power at any time, without her consent, to sell, burden, or gratuitously dispose the subjects. He afterwards acquired other heritable subjects, the title to which he took to himself and his heirs and assignees whomsoever. After the husband's death the wife claimed the whole estate, heritable and moveable, belonging to her husband at the date of his death, as hers, in terms of the mutual disposition. Held that the mutual disposition did not convey lands.

Farquharson v Farquharson, 1883, 10 R. 1253; 20 S.L.R. 836.

(483a)

"All I have in the world."

A person died in 1872 leaving a holograph settlement dated in 1861, and a codicil dated in 1870. By the settlement he left and bequeathed "all that I have in the world—life assurance, money in the bank, goods in bond and in my shops, . . . also household furniture, bed and table linen, silver plate, and all other effects in my house," to his wife, under certain deductions in favour of his children. At the date of the settlement he was possessed of no heritable property, but before the date of the codicil he, in 1864, purchased a house, the title of which he took to himself and his wife in conjunct fee and liferent, for her liferent use alienably, and to his heirs and successors in fee. The codicil bore that he had looked over his settlement, and, "as far as the disposal of all my effects, in money, stock-in-trade, and otherwise are concerned, I hereby confirm the same to be at the disposal of my wife." He then made certain alterations in the provisions to his children. He was survived by his wife. Held that the heritable subjects purchased in 1864 were not conveyed by the settlement and codicil.

"Effects."

A person possessed of heritage and moveables left a testament in these terms—"I hereby declare that B, my brother, shall not inherit any of my effects, but that they shall all descend to my brother C." Held that the word "effects" could not be construed to include lands.

Pitcairn v Pitcairn, 1870, 8 M. 604; 42 J. 306; 7 S.L.R. 329.

(485)

Held that a bequest in the following terms—"I hereby solemnly declare it to be my will that all my brothers and sisters share equally in any effects I may leave," was not habile to convey heritage.

M'Innes v Hill, (O.H.) 1912, 1 S.L.T. 80.

(486)

Will made in foreign country.

A native of British Guiana who had been resident in Scotland for some years died in 1903 possessed of heritage in Scotland, leaving a will which had been executed in British Guiana in 1891. The will bore that the testator was about to leave the colony, and that in order to prevent disputes arising after his demise "as to the disposition of my effects in or out of the colony. . . . I now order as follows . . . I will and bequeath to . . . all my effects to be divided equally between the three . . ." The will concluded with a nomination of executors. Held (1) that the question whether the will carried the Scottish heritage was a question for the Scottish Court; (2) that as the will was expressed in ordinary language, and as there was no relevant averment that it contained any technical term, or that it fell to be construed in accordance with any technical canon of construction peculiar to the colony, it was not necessary for the Court to resort to any foreign Court for aid in its interpretation; and (3) that the will did not convey the testator's heritable estate in Scotland.

Griffith's Judicial Factor v Griffith's Executors, 1905, 7 F. 470; 42 S.L.R. 361; 12 S.L.T. 730.

"Belongings."

(487)

Held that the word "Belongings" contained in a holograph will included heritage.

M'Crorie's Curator Bonis v M'Crorie, (O.H.) 1909, 1 S.L.T. 544.

(488)

A testator died leaving several testamentary writings, the latest in date being a holograph writing, executed on the day before his death, in these terms—"I leave and bequeath all my moneys and belongings to my dear wife J S." The value of the whole estate was £966 3s. 1d., of which sum £860 represented heritage. There were no surviving children. Held that the holograph will operated as an effectual settlement in favour of the testator's widow of his whole estate, both heritable and moveable.

Simson's Trustees v Simson, 1922 S.C. 14; 59 S.L.R. 5; 1921, 2 S.L.T. 238.

"Investments."

Terms of a holograph settlement which were held to carry two unfinished houses in course of erection at the time of the testator's death, although the deed contained no words of direct conveyance.

Edinburgh Merchant Maiden Hospital v Greig's Executors, (O.H.) 1902, 10 S.L.T. 317.

(490)

"Funds."

Circumstances in which it was held that a bequest of "funds" included heritage. Sibbald v Lord's Trustees, (O.H.) 1913, 2 S.L.T. 86.

(491)

"Moveable and personal estate" — Separate note of values.

A bequest of "all the moveable and personal estate which shall belong to me at the time of my death," taken in conjunction with the terms of a holograph letter of instructions by the testatrix, in which the amount of the estate as detailed included the value put upon certain house property belonging to her, held to be sufficient to carry that heritage.

Pringle, 1877, 15 S.L.R. 89.

(492)

"Investments"—Villa.

Circumstances in which held that the word "investments" occurring in a will included two villas belonging to the testator, and that the villas accordingly fell under a will which contained an appointment of executors, but no words of disposition.

Edinburgh Merchant Maiden Hospital v Greig's Executors, (O.H.) 1902, 10 S.L.T. 317.

(493)

"Everything else"—"Remainder."

Terms of a holograph testament containing the expressions "Everything else to be sold" and "I leave the remainder," which were held sufficient to import a bequest of heritage.

Crowe v Cook, 1908 S.C. 1178; 45 S.L.R. 904; 16 S.L.T. 332.

"Residue"—Appointment of executor.

A testatrix, by her holograph testamentary disposition, on the narrative that she had "resolved to provide for the settlement of my affairs," appointed a "trustee and executor"; and after making bequests which were all of moveable property, declared "that if there be any residue after all expenses and legacies are paid, I bequeath the said residue to" three nieces, reserving her "life use of the whole estate and effects hereby conveyed."

Held that the testatrix's heritable property was not carried by this deed, but passed to her heir at law.

Bryden v Cormack, 1913 S.C. 209; 50 S.L.R. 76; 1912, 2 S.L.T. 381.

Appointment of residuary legatee—Lapse of gift of heritage.

A testator left the estate of N to his nephew, and after various legacies he provided as follows:—"I leave as my residuary legatee my niece Annie Amelia Wallace, who will pay my funeral expenses and any debts I may justly owe." The nephew died six months before the testator, who was aware of his death, but made no alteration on his will. Held that the estate of N was carried by the residuary clause.

Wallace's Executors v Wallace, 1895, 23 R. 142; 33 S.L.R. 87; 3 S.L.T. 162.

"Rent of my houses."

A farmer by holograph will provided, inter alia, "the rent of my houses to be equally divided to my nephew Colin, in Strathglass, and my two sisters, and one-half share to my niece Jessie and her sisters, in America. . . . My nephew Colin, Strathglass, to be trustee." There was no other reference to heritable property in the will and no clause of residue. The testator died possessed of certain house property. Held that the bequest was not void from uncertainty: that the subject of the bequest was, the rent of the houses and not the houses themselves; and that the rent was divisible into two equal shares, one share being payable to Colin and the testator's two sisters, and the survivors and survivor of them, and the other share to his niece Jessie and her sisters, and the survivors and survivor of them.

Mackenzie's Trustee v Mackenzie, 1899, 2 F. 330; 37 S.L.R. 254.

Lease.

(497)

A testator by his will appointed trustees and directed them to do everything necessary for the comfort of his wife and family, and "that they entirely take charge of the farm, all means and moveables, until the youngest is twenty-one, then to be an equal division . . . and they also have power to take it from the one and give it to the other in case of any imprudence. . . . The whole managements are to be wholly through the trustees. They shall also have power to retain or give up the farm as they see it of most advantage to the family." Held that the lease of the farm rented by the testator was carried by the will.

Hardy's Trustees, 1871, 9 M. 736; 43 J. 406; 8 S.L.R. 499.

Long lease—"Property either in money, bonds, debts, business, and other effects."

A person who carried on the business of an innkeeper, in premises of which he held a long lease, and who died in 1872, left testamentary writings in these terms:—"I do hereby bequith, in event of my death before my wife, H E, the whole of property either in money, bonds, debets, bussness, and other afficts whatsoever, . . . and I appoint H E, my wife, heir and executor of this my last will and testament." Held that the words could not be so construed as to include the lease of the inn.

Edmond v Edmond, 1873, 11 M. 348; 45 J. 236; 10 S.L.R. 210.

Accessory—Heritable estate to be acquired subsequent to date of will—Heritable burden over land owned by testator at date of will.

The proprietrix of lands held of the Crown, subject to certain duties payable in kind to a donatory of the Crown, executed a mortis causa trust settlement, in which she directed her trustees to hold the said lands for certain charitable purposes, and to convey to certain persons named "all such lands, houses, or other heritable subjects, of whatever nature or denomination the same may be, which I may acquire or succeed to after the date of these presents." The testatrix subsequently obtained by purchase a disposition from the Crown donatory of the said duties, on which she was infeft. Held that the duties thus acquired were not to be regarded as a separate heritable subject from the land in the sense of the trust deed.

Dennison v Fea's Trustees, 1873, 11 M. 392; 45 J. 259; 10 S.L.R. 246.

English will dated in 1866—Testator surviving till 1875.

In the construction of a will observed—(1) That it was an important element of interpretation that the words of conveyance employed were not at the date of the will habile to convey heritage in Scotland, though they afterwards became so by a change in the law several years before the testator's death; (2) that instructions to prepare a mortis causa deed are not admissible in construing the deed as evidence of the testator's intention; (3) that deeds and holograph writings made subsequently are admissible as evidence.

Farquhar v Farquhar's Executors, 1875, 3 R. 71; 13 S.L.R. 36.

(2) REQUESTS OF MONEY AND CORPOREAL MOVEABLES.

(501)

"Heritable"—"Moveable"—Titles to Lands Consolidation Act, 1868, sec. 117.

Where a testatrix gave directions with respect to her "heritable" estate and other directions with respect to her "moveable" estate, held that bonds and dispositions in security in favour of herself and her executors or assignees, and in favour of herself and her heirs or assignees, were to be regarded as part of her moveable estate.

(502)

"Money"—"Moneys."

A testator expressly disposed of his heritable estate, household furniture, and stock-in-trade. He directed that all the "money he should leave, wherever deposited," should be divided among his wife and children, such division to take place when his youngest daughter attained majority. By a codicil he gave his wife "the interest of all the moneys left by me up to the time of the division of the same." Held, the word "money" and "moneys" included the testator's whole moveable estate which had not been otherwise specifically disposed of.

—"All moneys and goods in my possession"—"Any money I am entitled to by my late father's will."

A young officer shortly before his death executed a holograph testamentary writing bequeathing to his widow "all moneys and goods in my possession at the time of my death. Also any money I am entitled to by my late father's will." The testator was in right of certain sums bequeathed to him by his father's will. He was also entitled to a share of certain funds (part of which had been invested in a house) settled by the marriage contract of his parents on the children of the marriage, and liferented by his mother, which share had been appointed to him by a mutual deed of division executed by his parents in virtue of a power of appointment contained in the marriage contract. Held that the holograph will above-mentioned operated as an effectual bequest not only of the funds to which the deceased was entitled by his father's will, but also of his share of the marriage contract funds.

"Money in bank"—Deposit receipt.

A husband bequeathed to his wife "all moneys at my death in the house, or in the Bank of Scotland, or the City Bank of London, or in any other bank or banks in my name." At his death he held, in addition to money in his account current with the Bank of Scotland, a deposit receipt in his own name for £2000 with the Queensland National Bank, Limited, repayable four years after its date. Held that the deposit receipt was included in the bequest to the testator's wife.

Harper's Trustees, 1903, 5 F. 716; 40 S.L.R. 474; 10 S.L.T. 758.

"Money in banks" after paying lawful debts—Legacy to testatrix subsequently deposited in bank unknown to her.

A testatrix by a holograph will, after directing payment of certain special legacies, further provided—"Any money in banks after paying my lawful debts, funeral expenses, &c., I give over to my stepdaughter." The will contained no other directions as to the disposal of her estate. After the date of the will she became entitled to a legacy left to her by her brother, but, owing to her state of health, she never knew of it. The amount of the legacy was deposited in bank by the law agents of her brother's executors in their own name in trust for the testatrix. Held that the bequest of "any money in banks after paying my lawful debts," &c., could not be construed as a bequest of the money left to the testatrix by her brother, and that it fell to her next of kin as intestate succession.

Masson v Smellie, 1903, 6 F. 148; 41 S.L.R. 104; 11 S.L.T. 450.

"Sums contained in" policies of insurance—Bonus additions—Deduction of sums paid as premiums—Periodical interest on premiums.

A testator left a legacy of £4000 to his sister under declaration "that the said sum of £4000 represents the sums contained in" certain policies of insurance "under deduction of the sums already paid or yet to be paid for premiums of insurance thereon, . . . it being expressly declared that while the amount of the said provision may be found to be less than, it shall in no case exceed the amount of £4000." Held (1) that the legatee was not entitled to a sum of £4000, but only to the balance of the proceeds of the policies of insurance after refunding the amount of premium paid; (2) that under the terms "sums contained in" the policies of insurance bonus additions were included; and (3) that the deduction of sums paid as premiums fell to be made without adding periodical interest thereon.

Gollan's Trustees v Dallas, (O.H.) 1905, 13 S.L.T. 720.

Furnishings and plenishing in mansion-house—Plate deposited in bank.

A testator left to his wife a liferent of two estates and of the "whole plenishings, furnishings, and articles" in the mansion-houses thereof. He also constituted her his sole residuary legatee. At the time of his death there was lying deposited in a bank for safe keeping certain plate which was not in ordinary use in his house. Held that it did not fall within the legacy of a liferent of the "plenishing, furnishing, and articles in the house," but was part of the ordinary moveable estate, and therefore that his widow was fiae of it under the residuary clause.

Fraser v Croft, 1898, 25 R. 496; 35 S.L.R. 420.

(508)

All outside or inside a house—Watches.

A testator bequeathed a house "and all that may join that is mine, namely, buildings, lands, household furniture, all outside or inside of the above-named place." Held that the bequest did not carry certain gold watches and chains found in a desk in the house.

Rennie's Trustees v Watt, 1904, 12 S.L.T. 195.

Stock and cropping on "farms occupied by testator."

A testator directed his trustees to assign to his sons William and Robert the leases of the farms of K and B, and "any other farms I may occupy at the time of my death," and to deliver to them the whole stock, crop, implements, and all other effects thereon. At the time of his death the testator was in occupation of the farms of K and B, of which he was the tenant, and also of the farms of A and T, of which he was the proprietor. Held, on a construction of the settlement as a whole, that under the above direction the sons were entitled to stock and crop on those farms only of which the testator was the tenant.

Graham's Trustees v Graham, 1899, 2 F. 232; 37 S.L.R. 163; 7 S.L.T. 283.

"Uniforms and all other personalities."

Held that a bequest of "my uniforms and all other personalities, except such as I may specially bequeath to others," did not carry the residue of the testator's personal estate.

Douglas's Executors, 1869, 7 M. 504; 41 J. 268; 6 S.L.R. 324.

(511)

"Carriage"—Motor car.

The proprietor of an estate died in January, 1907, leaving a trust disposition and settlement dated in 1890. In it he directed his trustees to make over his landed estate to his wife, and with certain small exceptions his whole "furniture and plenishing, including books, plate, pictures, jewellery, ornaments, and bed and table linen, and also my horses and carriages, live stock, plants, and garden and stable implements." At the date of his settlement the testator had carriages and horses, but subsequently he sold these and bought two motor cars, which he possessed at the time of his death. Held that the bequest of carriages included the motor cars.

(512)

Shares—Ordinary and preference.

A testator made a bequest of shares in a certain company which should belong to him at the date of his death. He died possessed of both ordinary and preference stock in the company. Held that the bequest carried the preference stock as well as the ordinary shares.

Morland v M'Dowall's Trustees, (O.H.) 1919, 1 S.L.T. 162.

Sum invested in whisky—Realisation or valuation.

A testator bequeathed to pupil beneficiaries "whatever sum I may have invested in whisky." Held that the beneficiaries were entitled to the sum which the trustees had received on a prudent realisation of the whisky after confirmation, and not to the value of the whisky ascertained by valuation as at the date of death, the consent of the beneficiaries to such a valuation being unobtainable in respect of their pupillarity, and, further, that there should be no deduction in respect of the expenses of realisation or of warehouse rents to the date of realisation.

Chapman v Alexander, (O.H.) 1909, 1 S.L.T. 403.

(514)

War Loan and Exchequer Bonds.

A testatrix left to a legatee her "holdings of British Government War Loan and Exchequer Bonds." In addition to War Loan and Exchequer Bonds she possessed at her death certain War Bonds. Held that the legatee was not entitled to claim the War Bonds.

Lumsden's Trustees v Lumsden, (O.H.) 1921, 1 S.L.T. 155.

Moneys saved out of annual income of estate.

A testator directed that all moneys "saved by my trustees and my wife out of the annual income payable to my wife shall be given by my trustees after my wife's death to my daughter Emily." Held that, in so far as the annual proceeds of the estate were left by the widow at the time of her death in the hands of the trustees, they were saved in the sense meant by the truster, and belonged to his daughter. Observed that the provision in the will did not apply to income actually paid to the widow.

Wood v Menzies, 1871, 9 M. 775; 43 J. 418; 8 S.L.R. 517.

Bequest of debt—Whether interest included.

A lady lent £2000 to her nephew and took a receipt. Ten days afterwards she wrote and signed a testamentary writing in these terms—"I give the £2000 I lent . . . my nephew to his mother . . . at my death." The testatrix survived for thirty-four years, during which time she never asked or received any interest on the loan either from her nephew, who predeceased her, or from his executor. After her death, held that, on the assumption that interest was payable on the loan from its date, it was intended to be included in the bequest, and belonged to the legatee.

Cunninghame v Vassall, 1871, 10 M. 49; 44 J. 27; 9 S.L.R. 31.

Bequest of capital required to yield £120 per annum.

A testator who died in 1885 directed his trustees to keep a sum of money "invested safely so as to yield a life interest to my wife amounting to £120 sterling annually," and after her death to realise and divide "the said surties" equally among his nephews and nieces. The wife did not accept this provision, as she had a liferent of her husband's whole estate under their marriage contract, and no sum was set aside and invested to yield a sum of £120 per annum. In 1899, when the trust came to be wound up, on the death of the widow, the question arose as to the amount of the bequest to the testator's nephews and nieces. Held that the amount of the bequest was £4000—that being the sum which the trustees would, on a fair calculation, have been bound to lay aside as likely, one year with another, to produce £120.

Bequest of legal rights.

A widow who is bequeathed her legal rights under her husband's will is a creditor on his estate, and not a beneficiary. She should not be debited with the expense of administration nor with interest on sums advanced in respect of jus relictæ.

Henderson v Henderson's Trustees, (O.H.) 1916, 2 S.L.T. 292.

(3) GIFTS SUBJECT TO BURDENS.

(520)

Burden of heritable securities—Payment of heritable debt—Testator taking assignation to bond—Ground annual—Confusio.

A lady, by trust disposition and settlement, directed her trustees to dispoſe certain heritable ſubjects to a perſon named, "under burden of any heritable ſecurities that may affect the ſame, and the feu-duty, ground annual, and other burdens affecting it." Prior to the date of her ſettlement the truſter had obtained aſſignations to the only ground annuals affecting the ſubjects. She ſubſequently paid up a bond affecting the ſubjects, and took an aſſignation there-to. Held (1) that the bond had been extinguished confuſione, and that the diſpoſee was entitled to the property free of the burden of this bond; but (2) that he muſt take the property under burden of the ground annuals, that being the intention of the truſter as expreſſed by her ſettlement.

Murray v Parlane's Truſtee, 1890, 18 R. 287; 28 S.L.R. 223.

—House burdened by heritable ſecurity—Extrinsic evidence.

J S in 1879 executed a ſettlement in which he conveyed his eſtates to truſtees in truſt to pay and make over to his ſiſter-in-law, Mrs. B, wife of W B, in liferent, and her children in fee, one-half of the reſidue, and to his brothers and ſiſters the other half. On 4th January, 1881, J S executed a bond over his houſe and grounds of L for £4000, and the bond was recorded. By a codicil dated in 1889 the teſtator conveyed to Mrs. B in liferent, and to J B, her daughter, in fee, his houſe and grounds of L, ſtating that he revoked the ſettlement only in ſo far as it conveyed the dwelling-houſe, &c. After the death of J S, Mrs. B and her daughter raiſed an action for declarator that the bequeſt of the houſe and grounds was not burdened with the debt contained in the bond, and that the truſtees were bound to pay it out of the deceased's other eſtate. They made averments to the effect that J S never intended the bond to be acted upon, except in the event of his bankruptcy, and had deſtroyed it; and that the houſe and grounds were not worth more than £3000. Held that the purſuers' averments were irrelevant, and action diſmiſſed.

Brand v Scott's Truſtees, 1892, 19 R. 768; 29 S.L.R. 641.

—Sum payable out of price of herit- age — Taxative or demonſtrative — Rents accruing prior to ſale.

A teſtator directed his truſtees to ſell his eſtate of A, and to apply £4000 of the price in reducing the debt of £14,000 with which his eſtate of B was burdened, and, after the death of his brother, to convey B to certain perſons, "ſubject to the real burden of the bond preſently affecting the ſaid lands to the extent of £10,000, part of the principal ſum of £14,000 therein contained (the ſum of £4000 being payable by my truſtees in part of the principal ſum as herein provided)." The price received for A was only £2400 or thereby. Held that the perſons to whom the teſtator had left B were not entitled to have the eſtate diſburdened of the balance of the £4000 which the price of A did not cover, by payments out of reſidue.

Adam's Truſtees v Wilſon, 1899, 1 F. 1042; 36 S.L.R. 819.

Obligation to impoſe real burden on herit- age—Contingent real burden.

The proprietrix of a heritable eſtate died, leaving a mortis caſa diſpoſition of the eſtate to A and the heirs of his body, whom failing to B and the heirs of her body, whom failing, &c., under the condition "that in the event of any part of the ſaid lands and eſtate . . . that may remain unſold at the time of my death being thereafter ſold or diſpoſed of or exchambiſed by any proprietor or poſſeſſor of the ſame or adjudged, or attempted to be adjudged or carried away in any manner or way for his or her debt, that then and in any of theſe events there ſhall be paid out of the price of the lands . . . if and when ſold or created a real lien and burden on the ſame if they ſhall remain unſold to and in favour of ſuch of the children of F as may then be in exiſtence or to their heirs . . . the ſum of £10,000." Held that the provision in favour of the children of F was effectual as a condition of the gift to A.

Legacy of ſpecific moveable ſubjects taken cum onere.

Held that the legatee of a ſpecific moveable ſubject muſt take it cum onere, and redeem it for himſelf if it has been pledged or aſſigned in ſecurity by the teſtator ſubſequent to the date of the bequeſt.

Stewart v Stewart, (O.H.) 1891, 19 R. 310; 29 S.L.R. 907.

(526)

Debt laid by teſtator upon two eſtates to which different beneficiaries ſucceeded.

A proprietor of two eſtates, B and S, after executing an entail of B, reſerving power to alter, executed a truſt diſpoſition and ſettlement conveying both eſtates to truſtees, with full power to burden and ſell S if required to pay the debts of the truſter, but with no ſuch powers as regarded B, but merely an inſtruction to pay out of the annual produce of B certain legacies and annuities, to grant no leases longer than the duration of the truſt, and at its expiration to reſpond B to the ſeries of heirs called in the deed of entail. The truſter ſubſequent- ly granted a bond and diſpoſition in ſecurity over both eſtates for £1500. S having been ſold and the proceeds applied, in ſo far as neceſſary, to pay the truſter's debts, held that the beneficiaries having the reversionary right to S had no claim for relief of the debt of £1500, or any part thereof, against the heir entitled to B.

Carter v Macarthur, 1870, 8 M. 480; 42 J. 289; 7 S.L.R. 282.

(527)

Between three estates destined to B, with substitutions to C, D, and E, which on B's death passed partly to his heir at law, partly to the substitute heirs of provision.

By mortis causa settlement A conveyed his whole estates, under burden of debts, legacies, and of certain annuities, to his brother B, with a substitution, "under the burdens and provisions before written" in favour of three individuals, C, D, and E, each of whom he substituted to his brother in a particular portion of his heritable estate, and of certain relatives to whom he destined the residue of his estates. B made up a title to the estates as his brother's heir at law, but did not evacuate the destination in his brother's deed except in regard to a portion of the subjects which he conveyed to himself and his heirs at law. In a trust settlement executed by B on death-bed he directed his trustees (1) to pay the said burdens and annuities, and (2) to convey the estates substantially in accordance with his brother's settlement. B's settlement was reduced ex capite lecti as regarded their respective interests by his heir at law, and by C as heir of provision. D and E took under B's settlement the portions of A's heritage conveyed thereby to them. In a question between B's heir at law and C, D, and E, held (1) that the annuities in A's deed were heritable burdens, which became burdens on B when he succeeded to the universitas of A's estate; (2) that as A had not made the annuities specific burdens on his lands, they did not pass as specific burdens on the heirs of provision succeeding to B; and (3) that as B had not in his settlement declared these annuities burdens on the portions of A's estates conveyed by him to D and E, his heir at law remained liable for them.

Park's Curator v Black, 1871, 9 M. 1078; 43 J. 590.

(4) MISDESCRIPTION OF SUBJECT OF GIFT.

(528)

Lease.

A testator left to his sisters "my heritable property at S, and tack thereof, dated in 1807, as described in the translation or assignation thereof granted by A B in my favour." The property in S was held in two tacks, dated respectively in 1807 and 1808, to both of which the testator acquired right by the translation above mentioned, and the property had been occupied by the truster's sisters as one subject. Held, on a consideration of the whole deed, that the sisters were entitled to the subjects contained in the tack of 1808, as well as those in the tack of 1807.

Wright's Trustees, 1870, 8 M. 708; 42 J. 363; 7 S.L.R. 408.

Shares.

By a holograph codicil a testator bequeathed to his son "all the gas companies' shares that were lately bought by me from Mrs. T. Bruce's trustees for £300." There were no gas companies' shares purchased by the testator for £300; but he had about six months before the date of the codicil purchased from Mrs. Bruce's trustees, as one transaction, shares in various gas companies for £798, and some shares in a steel yard for £2. Held that the words "for £300" must be taken as mere falsa demonstratio, and were not used as taxative of the bequest, and consequently that the legatee was entitled to the whole gas shares (but not the steel yard shares) purchased by the testator from Mrs. Bruce's trustees.

Bruce's Trustees v Bruce, 1875, 2 R. 775; 12 S.L.R. 485.

Inter vivos trust—Amount of deposit receipt.

A father by inter vivos trust deed conveyed to trustees, inter alia, "the sum of seven thousand pounds sterling on deposit receipt in my name in the Bank of Scotland, Edinburgh," for behoof of his daughter. He had a deposit receipt with that bank for £5000 but none for £7000. He delivered the deposit receipt for £5000 to the trustees. He had a deposit receipt with the Union Bank for £2000, which he did not deliver to the trustees. He died a month after executing the trust deed. Held that he had conveyed £7000 to the trustees.

Gellatly's Trustees v Royal Infirmary of Edinburgh, (O.H.) 1905, 13 S.L.T. 38.

(531)

Residue—Error calculi.

A truster in a holograph trust disposition and settlement appointed one person to receive two-thirds of the residue, another person to receive one-third, and a third person to receive "the other third." Held that the shares must be paid in the proportion of one-half to the first party and one-fourth to each of the others.

Smith's Trustees v Smith, 1883, 10 R. 1144; 20 S.L.R. 764.

Bequest of estate "left by" father of testator—Inter vivos disposition by father.

A by his last will and testament, dated in 1895, bequeathed "all my right, title, interest, claim, and estate as one of the children and heirs of my deceased father and mother in and to the estate left by them and situated in the city of Glasgow." At the date of the will A had right to the following property in Glasgow:—(1) A share of heritage under an inter vivos deed granted by his father in 1858 in favour of the granter and his wife in liferent and trustees for his children in fee—(the surviving liferenter had died in 1881); (2) part of a brother's share of the heritage under the same deed left to A by his brother's will; (3) heritage to which A succeeded under his father's will. Held that A's bequest included his original share of heritage under the inter vivos deed, but not that which he had acquired under his brother's will.

8. THE BENEFICIARY.

(1) MEANING OF DESCRIPTIVE TERMS.

(a) Heirs.

(534)

"Lawful heirs"—Widow—Moveable subject.

A widow is not one of her husband's "lawful heirs," and is not entitled to share in a legacy of a moveable fund in favour of the lawful heirs of her husband.

Inglis v Inglis, 1869, 7 M. 435; 41 J. 234; 6 S.L.R. 271.

(535)

"Heirs"—Estate consisting both of heritage and moveables.

Held under a direction in a trust deed, by which estate both heritable and moveable was conveyed to trustees with instructions to settle certain heritable subjects upon the trustor's children in liferent allenerly and their heirs and assignees in fee, with a provision that the issue of any predeceasing child should take "equally" the fee of the whole heritable and moveable estate "as if their parent had been in life, or had been liferented by him or her"—that the eldest son of one of the trustor's children, who survived the trustor and enjoyed a liferent right, was entitled to the fee of the heritable property held in liferent by his parent.

Renton's Trustees v M'Culloch, (O.H.) 1881, 19 S.L.R. 216.

"Heirs and assignees"—Husband—Foreign law.

A domiciled Scotswoman, in contemplation of marriage, conveyed her whole estate to trustees for behoof, failing children of her marriage, of her heirs and assignees. She married an Australian, and died in Australia, without issue and without leaving a will. It appeared from the opinion of Australian counsel that the whole moveable estate of a wife predeceasing her husband intestate passed to the husband, but it did not appear that the husband was on that account regarded as his wife's heir. Held that the husband was not entitled to the wife's estate under the destination in the trust deed in respect that he was not an "heir" of his wife either by the law of Scotland or by the law of Australia.

"Heirs and successors."

A testator directed her trustees to pay the following legacies, viz.:—"To" A and B, each £100, whom failing, "then to their heirs and successors equally," "To" C, £200. "To John Craw, doctor of medicine" (her stepson), "and his heirs and successors, the sum of £1000: In the event of the said John Craw, doctor of medicine, predeceasing me without leaving lawful issue of his body, I leave and bequeath to John Craw, my husband, his heirs and assignees, the sum of £500, in consideration of the expenditure incurred by him out of his own funds on my property." Held that the bequest to the husband showed that by the words "heirs and successors" of the stepson in the preceding bequest, the testatrix meant the heirs of his body, and that they were to be so construed.

"Heirs whatsoever"—Deed of entail.

Terms of a deed of entail, in which the words "heirs whatsoever" occurring in the destination were held to mean "heirs whatsoever of the body."

Earl of Northesk v Paul, 1882, 10 R. 77; 20 S.L.R. 62.

"Heir at law"—Direction to sell heritage.

A testatrix directed her trustees to sell certain heritable property particularly described, and her whole other means and estate, heritable and moveable, and after payment of legacies, &c., to pay over the residue "to my heir at law, whom failing to my next of kin." Held that by the term "heir at law" the testatrix did not mean to denote her heirs in mobilibus, but her heir in heritage.

Glen v Stewart, 1874, 1 R. (H.L.) 48; 11 S.L.R. 496.

Nearest heirs "in and through my mother"—Mixed estate—Heir of line or heir of conquest.

A trustor left his property "to my own nearest heirs and assignees whomsoever in and through my mother, hereby excluding the relations by my father, and all others except through my said mother." Held (1) that the estate was not intended to pass as a universitas to his mother's next of kin, but that his mother's heir at law succeeded to the heritage, and her heirs in moveables to the moveables; and (2) that although part of the property was conquest in the trustor, the mother's heir of line, not her heir of conquest, succeeded.

Mitchell's Trustees v Waddell, 1872, 11 M. 206; 45 J. 150; 10 S.L.R. 149.

(541)
"Heirs whatsoever"—Heir of line or heir of conquest—Entail.

A person purchased an estate and entailed it upon himself and his heirs-male, and, after various substitutions, on his own heirs whatsoever. Held that under the destination to his own heirs whatsoever the heir of line was to be preferred to the heir of conquest. Mackintosh v Ross, 1873, 11 M. 636; 45 J. 402; 10 S.L.R. 436.

(542)
"Heirs direct and collateral."

Direction to entail an estate "on my heirs direct and collateral so long as the estate of C is theirs," held to be an effectual direction to entail, in respect that it imported a destination to the trustor's own heirs in blood and therefore a destination which did not coincide with the legal order of succession. Moubray's Trustees v Moubray, 1895, 22 R. 801; 32 S.L.R. 593; 3 S.L.T. 56.

(543)
"Heirs-female"—Heirs-portioners.

A trustor, "in order to make and secure additional provisions for" his second son and the other heirs of entail succeeding him in the lands and estates of Cromartie to enable them to support the dignity and title of Earl of Cromartie, conveyed to trustees certain securities, and directed them, after his death, to pay the free proceeds thereof to his second son and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing to certain substitutes, "whom failing to the heirs-female of the body" of the said second son. The second son, the Earl of Cromartie, died leaving only two daughters, of whom the elder succeeded her father in the title and estates of Cromartie. Held that the direction to the trustees to pay the income to the "heirs-female" of the body of the second son being unambiguous, must receive effect, and that, as the two daughters were heirs-portioners, each was entitled to one-half of the income of the trust funds.

Mackenzie v Duke of Devonshire, 1896, 23 R. (H.L.) 32; [1896] A.C. 400; 33 S.L.R. 628; 4 S.L.T. 12.

"Heirs in mobilibus"—Heirs ab intestato or executor-nominate.

A, in his settlement, directed his trustees to hold the residue of his estate for behoof of certain of his uncles and aunts, declaring that the provisions in their favour should not vest or be assignable, but should be purely alimentary. He gave his trustees power to retain the capital of the shares falling to any of the residuary legatees. He further provided that in the event of any portion of the capital, or income of the share of any residuary legatee remaining in the trustees' hands at the death of the recipients thereof, the trustees should be bound to pay the same to the deceased legatee's heirs in mobilibus. The trustees retained the share of B, one of the residuary legatees, and made periodical payments out of interest and capital to him. B died leaving a will. Held that the balance of B's share vested under A's settlement in B's heirs in mobilibus ab intestato, and not in his executor-nominate.

"Heirs, executors, and successors whomsoever"—Legal heirs or executor-nominate.

Held, in construing a testamentary settlement, that a destination over to "the heirs, executors, and successors whomsoever" of a legatee operated in favour of the legatee's legal heir or heirs and not of his executor-nominate, there being nothing in the settlement which disclosed an intention on the part of the testator that the destination should be construed otherwise.

"Nearest heirs and next of kin whomsoever in accordance with law."

Heirs substitute in deed of entail—Subsequent disentail.

A testator directed his trustees to execute an entail of his estate of Newmore in favour of Mrs. Inglis and a series of heirs specified, and failing the whole persons specified, then to the heirs in possession of the estate of Highfield under the entail thereof for the time, and to the other heirs substitute in said entail in the order set down in the said entail successively. While the estate of Newmore was still in possession of the Inglis series of heirs, Highfield was disentailed. Held that although the substitution in favour of the heir in possession of the estate of Highfield under the entail thereof for the time had become void, the following substitution of the other heirs in the entail was effectual, as it was not qualified by the condition that the successive heirs should be in possession of the estate of Highfield under the entail thereof.

Inglis v Gillanders, 1895, 22 R. (H.L.) 51; [1895] A.C. 507; 32 S.L.R. 478; 3 S.L.T. 30.

—Heir entitled to succeed under deed of entail.

By a general trust disposition and settlement a testator directed his trustees to entail his estate of Kintail upon a series of heirs specified in a destination therein set forth, and gave certain beneficial interests in the residue of his estate "to the heir for the time being entitled to succeed under the said deed of entail," upon his attaining the age of twenty-four. The institute under the tailzied destination upon attaining the age of twenty-one obtained a conveyance in fee-simple, under sec. 27 of the Entail Act of 1848, of the lands directed to be entailed. He evacuated the tailzied destination, and thereafter died without issue before attaining the age of twenty-four. Held, upon a construction of the whole testamentary writings of the testator, that the beneficial interests in the residue above mentioned were conferred upon the heir for the time being under the tailzied destination, and that it was not a condition of such heir taking these beneficial interests that he should at the time be in possession as heir of entail under the deed of entail.

——— Heirs of entail who may be in possession or have right to be in possession of entailed estate.

A testator conveyed heritage to his sister A in liferent, and after her death to his nephew B (who was heir of entail in possession of the estate of X) in liferent, and after his death the testator gave "such liferent use and enjoyment as aforesaid to the heirs of entail who may in succession and for the time be in possession, or have right to be in possession, of the entailed estate of X" under and in virtue of deed of entail. B predeceased A, having disentailed X and evacuated the destination in the entail. On A's death, held that as no one could claim to be heir in possession of X under the deed of entail, the destination in favour of such heirs was inoperative, and that the heritage fell to the testator's heir at law.

——— "Heirs of entail successively entitled"—Disentail.

An onerous inter vivos trust deed provided for the payment of certain sums to "the heirs of entail successively entitled and succeeding to" a certain entailed estate. Held that the disentail of the estate had the effect of evacuating the destination.

Davidson v Davidson, (O.H.) 1906, 14 S.L.T. 337.

(551)

——— "Heirs of entail in possession"—Entail invalid.

A testatrix left a heritable bond to "the heir of entail who might be in possession of" the estate of A at the death of all the daughters of B. The deeds of entail under which the estate of A was held were found to be ineffectual, and the tailzied destination was evacuated, with the result that there was no heir of entail in possession of the estate of A at the death of the last survivor of the daughters of B. Held that the person who would have been heir of entail in possession had the deeds of entail remained in force was not entitled to succeed to the bond, which fell into intestate succession.

Destination to heirs-male of marriage other than heir-male succeeding to certain estates—Sale of estate before succession opened.

At the date of his marriage L held the estate of W under an entail in favour of himself and the heirs-male of his body, and had a contingent right to the estate of B. By his antenuptial marriage contract (which recited the destination of the W entail) L bound himself to convey the estate of B to himself and the heirs-male of his body by the intended marriage. The wife's father settled the estate of E on "the heirs-male of this present marriage other than the heir-male succeeding to the said estates" of W and B. There were two sons of the marriage. L acquired B but sold it during his life. W was disentailed during L's life and was purchased by the eldest son for a full price. Held that the words "heir-male of this present marriage other than the heir-male succeeding to the said estate" of W and B meant the heir-male of the marriage other than the heir contemplated by the marriage contract as entitled to succeed to these estates under the destination recited in the marriage contract, and that the younger son was entitled to succeed to the estate of E, notwithstanding the sale of B and the disentail of W.

Gift of residue to A, B, C, and D and the heirs of E—Heritable estate—Division between E's two sons.

A testator directed his trustees to pay the liferent of the residue of his estate to his widow, and on her death "to pay or divide the then free residue of my whole means and estate heritable and moveable, real and personal, to and among" his daughters, A, B, C and D "and the heirs of my son the deceased E, and that equally between them, share and share alike." The testator was survived by his widow and his four daughters. His son E predeceased, leaving two sons who survived the testator. The residue consisted almost entirely of heritage. Held that the share of residue falling to the heirs of E belonged to E's two sons equally.

(b) Executors, Trustees, Representatives, Assignees.

(554)

Executors—Executors and representatives whomsoever.

A bequeathed the residue of her moveable estate to B and to two other persons, "and failing all or any of them by their predeceasing me, to their several and respective executors and representatives whomsoever." B predeceased the testatrix, leaving a will by which he nominated certain persons to be his executors. Held that the executors of B were entitled to B's share of residue, and that the next of kin of B had no right thereto.

Scott's Executors v Methven's Executors, 1890, 17 R. 389; 27 S.L.R. 314.

(555)

—Certain persons or "the successor of each" appointed executors—Right of successors to share in bequest.

A testator directed certain of his books to "be parted among" his executors. He appointed as his executors, inter alios, his brothers A and B and his sister C, "or their representatives, namely, the successor of each as representing their respective families." B predeceased the testator. C declined to accept office, and her eldest son was assumed as an executor. Held that B's eldest son, being an executor as the successor and representative of his father, was entitled to share in the bequest, but that C's eldest son was not so entitled.

(556)

—Wife's "own heirs, executors, or assignees whomsoever"—Marriage contract executed in Scotland—Wife dying domiciled in England—Lex loci contractus or lex domicilii.

An antenuptial contract of marriage, entered into between a domiciled Englishman and a domiciled Scotswoman, provided that, in the event of failure of children of the marriage, the fund contributed by the wife should belong, on the death of the survivor of the spouses, to the wife's "own heirs, executors, or assignees whomsoever." The fund contributed by the wife consisted originally of a sum secured over Scottish heritable property. The marriage contract was prepared by Scottish solicitors, was in favour of Scottish trustees, and was in Scottish form. It contained provisions peculiar to Scots law, such as satisfaction of legitim, exclusion of the jus mariti and right of administration, and consent to registration for preservation and execution. The wife died domiciled in England, without issue, and survived by her husband, who, in terms of the contract, received the income of the fund during his lifetime. Held that, on his death, the wife's heirs, according to the Scots law of succession, and not according to the English law, were entitled to the fund.

Trustees—Beneficiary named as trustee predeceasing testator.

A testator conveyed his whole estate to A, B, C, and D "and to the acceptors and acceptor, survivors and survivor of them to be my trustees." He then directed the said trustees to pay the income of the trust estate to his sister in lifereit, and on her death he directed "my said trustees the said" A, B, C, and D (naming them) "to divide the free residue . . . amongst themselves . . . declaring that if any of my said trustees" should die before the residue became payable their share or shares should be payable "to their several heirs, executors, and successors, and I appoint my said trustees to pay and deliver the same to them accordingly." A predeceased the testator; the other three trustees survived and accepted office. Held that A's representatives were not entitled to take under the gift of residue as he had never been a trustee.

—Assumed trustees.

Terms of a will on which held that it was not intended that assumed trustees should be beneficiaries under a bequest of legacies to trustees.

Wilson's Trustees v Wilson, (O.H.) 1909, 1 S.L.T. 124.

"Representatives"—"Representatives of both spouses"—Marriage contract.

By an antenuptial marriage contract it was provided that the surviving spouse should have the lifereit of the whole of the property, heritable and moveable, "and on the death of the longest liver the moveable property so lifereited by him or her shall be equally divided between the representatives of both spouses." Held that the true meaning of the term "representatives" depends on the particular terms of the deed in which it is used, and that on the terms of the deed under construction the representative of the widow who survived was her executor-nominate and not her next of kin.

Assignees—Assignees after vesting—Destination on occurrence of certain event to a person named "and his heirs and assignees."

A testator directed his trustees, on the death or second marriage of his widow, "if and when the whole of my daughters are married or when my son is married, whichever of these events shall first happen," to assign and dispose his dwelling-house to his son "and his heirs and assignees." The son died unmarried, predeceased by his mother, but survived by his sisters, of whom one was unmarried at his death. Held that, in a question between the daughters and the testamentary trustees of the son, the former as heirs of the son were the conditional institutes entitled to the conveyance, the son having died before any right had vested in him which he could assign.

Montgomery-Fleming's Trustees v Carre,
S.L.T. 520.

(562)

Appointees or nominees before vesting.

By his trust settlement a testator directed his trustees to hold the residue of his estate for behoof of his children in equal shares, and "to hold and retain each of my children's shares for his or her alimentary use only, and for his or her issue, whom failing, his or her own heirs and assignees whomsoever in fee." Held that the term "assignees" meant "appointees" or "nominees," so that although the share which a daughter life-tenant did not vest in her, it was carried by her will.

Barr v Parnie, (O.H.) 1903, 11 S.L.T. 426.

(c) Next of Kin.

(563)

Observed (per Lord Watson)—"The expression [next of kin] is no longer [since the passing of the Intestate Moveable Succession Act, 1855] equivalent to legal heirs in mobilibus, inasmuch as it does not include all the members of that class. It appears to me, however, that, in its legal sense, the expression is still applicable to those members of the class who would have been the sole heirs before the passing of the Act."

Gregory's Trustees v Alison, 1889, 16 R. (H.L.) 10; 14 App.Cas. 124; 26 S.L.R. 787.

(564)

Observed (per Lord Stormonth-Darling) that "when a testator speaks of 'next of kin' without anything in the context to show that he affixes to it a meaning of his own, it must be construed in its ordinary legal signification."

Fulton's Trustee v Fulton, (O.H.) 1900, 8 S.L.T. 465.

Surviving parent.

Opinion reserved (per Lord Watson) on the question whether the surviving parent of a deceased person can be regarded as one of the next of kin.

Gregory's Trustees v Alison, 1889, 16 R. (H.L.) 10; 14 App.Cas. 124; 26 S.L.R. 787.

(566)

Mother.

A lady, by her antenuptial contract, conveyed certain moveable property to trustees, directing them to convey it after her death to her "next of kin" in certain events (which happened). Her nearest relatives at the time of her death were (a) her mother; and (b) a paternal uncle and a paternal aunt. Held that the uncle and aunt were entitled to the whole property left to the next of kin of the deceased, the mother not being in law one of her "next of kin," and there being nothing in the marriage contract to show that that term was used in another than its technical sense.

EXECUTOR, No. 22.]

(567)

Mother's relatives.

A testator bequeathed a third of his residue to the "nearest of kin" of his first wife. The wife died prior to the date of the will, leaving no relations on her father's side. Held that relatives of the wife on her mother's side were not her nearest of kin, and were not entitled to claim the share of residue.

Andrew's Trustees v Andrew, (O.H.)
1918, 2 S.L.T. 12.

(568)

"Nearest in kin"—Intestate Moveable Succession Act, 1855, sec. 1.

Held that a legacy to a person's "nearest in kin" was not to be construed as a legacy to his heirs in mobilibus.

(569)

"Next of kin who would have been entitled to succeed to my moveable estate had I died intestate."

Held that, in construing the trust disposition and settlement, dated in 1874, of a testatrix who died in 1883, a bequest in favour of "my next of kin who would have been entitled to succeed to my estate had I died intestate," fell to be construed as a gift in favour of the heirs in mobilibus of the testatrix.

"Nearest of kin according to law"—Intestate Moveable Succession (Scotland) Act, 1855.

Held, in construing the terms of a testament, that the expression "nearest of kin according to law" signifies heirs in mobilibus at common law, and does not include the wider class called to succeed on intestacy under the Intestate Moveable Succession Act, 1855.

Murray's Factor v Melrose, 1910 S.C. 924;

(571)

"Next of kin according to the law of moveable succession in Scotland."

Held, on a construction of a trust disposition and settlement, that a destination of residue to "my next of kin according to the law of moveable succession in Scotland" imported a destination to the testator's heirs in mobilibus, and not to his next of kin in the strict sense.

Rutherford's Trustees v Dickie, 1907 S.C.

"Nearest heirs and next of kin whomsoever in accordance with law."

Under a bequest of residue by a testator to his "nearest heirs and next of kin whomsoever in accordance with law," held that, in so far as the residue consisted of moveable estate, the beneficiaries were the testator's next of kin at common law, and not the wider class of heirs under the Intestate Moveable Succession Act, 1855.

International law—"Next of kin"—Marriage contract executed in Scotland—Spouses dying domiciled in England—Lex loci contractus or lex domicilii.

An antenuptial contract of marriage was entered into between an Englishman residing in Scotland and a Scotswoman. The contract was prepared by a Scottish solicitor, was in Scottish form, and contained a provision that a fund provided by the wife should, after her death failing issue, belong to her "next of kin, excluding her husband." Some years after the marriage the parties moved from Scotland to England, and the wife died domiciled there. Circumstances in which held that it was the intention of the parties to the contract that the wife's next of kin entitled to succeed to the fund should be ascertained according to the law of Scotland, and accordingly that brothers and sisters of the half-blood were excluded.

(574)

Sons.

Terms of a trust settlement in which a destination to "sons" was held to be limited, and not to include descendants in a more remote degree.

Magistrates of Perth v Irvine, (O.H.) 1895, 5 S.L.T. 23.

Grandchildren—Gift of intermediate income—Capital payable at majority of youngest child.

A testator directed his trustees to pay the free income of his estates to his widow, and after her death or second marriage to "pay to or apply for behoof of my children until the youngest attain the age of twenty-one years complete the free income of my said estates." The testator further directed his trustees, on the youngest child attaining twenty-one and the termination of the widow's liferent, to pay or convey the residue of his estate to his children, the issue of any predeceasing child coming in place of their parent. Held that the word "children" in the above-quoted clause did not include grandchildren, and that the income accruing between the widow's death and the date when the youngest child attained majority fell to be divided among the surviving children, to the exclusion of issue of predeceasing children.

Adams' Trustees v Carrick, 1896, 23 R. 828; 33 S.L.R. 620; 4 S.L.T. 49.

(576)
Children equally among them—Whether "equally among them" applied to grandchildren.

Heritage was destined to B in liferent and her children in fee equally among them. B had one child who predeceased her, leaving a son and a daughter, who survived B. Held (1) that B was fiar at the date of her death; (2) that the destination to B's children included her grandchildren; and (3) that the words "equally among them" did not apply to the grandchildren, and that the subjects went to B's grandson as heir of provision.

Ranken, 1870, 8 M. 878; 42 J. 523; 7 S.L.R. 544.

(577)
Surviving children.

Terms of a trust settlement under which held that a bequest to "surviving children" did not include surviving grandchildren.

McDonald's Trustees v Gordon, (O.H.) 1909, 2 S.L.T. 321.

(578)
Children of marriage equally among them—Long lease.

Certain subjects were leased for 950 years to A P "and his heirs as after-mentioned," and, failing him, "then the whole subjects to and in liferent only to the present wife of the said A P . . . and after the death of the said spouses . . . then to the children of their marriage equally." Held that the word "children" in this destination did not include grandchildren.

Marquis v Prentice, 1896, 23 R. 595; 33 S.L.R. 415; 3 S.L.T. 314.

Spouses and "their children"—Husband's children by a former marriage.

A father, who had been twice married and had children by each wife, took two railway debenture bonds, payable in five years, in favour of himself and his second wife in liferent and "their children" in fee. Held that the intention and effect of the destination was not to exclude the children of the first marriage, but that the funds in the debentures fell to be divided equally among the children of both marriages.

Buchan v Porteous, &c., 1879, 7 R. 211; 17 S.L.R. 90.

(580)
Children of husband by a second marriage.

A trustor appointed his trustees on the lapse of a liferent to divide the residue of his estate equally among a number of nephews and nieces, the children of any who should predecease him coming into their parent's place. By a codicil he directed his trustees to retain out of the shares falling to one of his nephews, James Whittet, and one of his nieces, Mrs. Jane Whittet, £200, and to divide this sum "among their children equally." James and Jane Whittet were spouses, and at the date of the trust settlement had two children. After the truster's death, but before the expiration of the liferent, Mrs. Jane Whittet died, and Mr. Whittet married a second time, and had, when the liferent expired, six children by this second marriage. Held that the children of the second marriage were not entitled to participate in the sum of £200.

Illegitimate children.

Terms of a trust settlement in which a bequest "for behoof of the children of my said brother A B by his present wife" (i.e. the brother's second wife), held not intended by testator to include a child of the brother and his second wife, who was illegitimate, having been born before the death of the brother's first wife, because the meaning of the word "children," when used in a will, was settled to mean lawful children, unless there was in the will itself the clearest evidence to the contrary.

Govenlock's Trustees v Govenlock, (O.H.) 1895, 3 S.L.T. 163.

Surviving children.

Circumstances in which held that a bequest to "surviving children" did not include illegitimate children. Observed that "where a testator refers to 'children' he is held to mean 'legitimate children,' unless there is something in the will or in the surrounding circumstances which points to a different intention."

M'Donald's Trustees v Gordon, (O.H.) 1909, 2 S.L.T. 321.

(583)

Gift to "lawful children."

Terms of a trust settlement in which the expression "whole lawful children" was held to be intended by the testator to include children alleged to be illegitimate.

Sharp's Trustees v Sharp, (O.H.) 1894, 2 S.L.T. 124.

By his trust disposition and settlement, A M made a bequest of heritage to his son, D M, in liferent, "and to his lawful children at my death equally," whom failing, to his married daughter, Mrs. L, in liferent, "and to the whole children procreated or that may yet be procreated of her body." At the date of the settlement Mrs. L had an illegitimate child, G C, who lived with the testator, and for whom he made special provision by legacy, designating her as his "grand-daughter." D M having died without issue, and subsequently Mrs. L having died, leaving no issue but G C, a competition arose between G C, claiming under the destination to the "whole children" of Mrs. L, and the widow of D M, claiming under his settlement. Held that the word "children" must be construed here in its ordinary meaning as applying to legitimate children only, the testator not having clearly indicated an intention to include G C in the bequest to the children of Mrs. L.

Mitchell's Trustees v Cables, (O.H.) 1893, 30 S.L.R. 969; 1 S.L.T. 156.

Gift to children born or to be born.

A woman in contemplation of marriage executed an inter vivos trust deed, whereby she conveyed her estate to trustees, inter alia, "for behoof of the child or children born or to be born of me." At the time the deed was executed she had two illegitimate children. Held that these children were beneficiaries under the trust purpose. Opinion that illegitimate children born subsequent to the deed would not have been beneficiaries.

Gentle's Trustees v Bunting, (O.H.) 1908, 16 S.L.T. 437.

Marriage with deceased wife's sister.

A testator by his testamentary settlement bequeathed his whole estate "to and in favour of A B, my wife, in liferent for her liferent use alienarly, and to my children C D and E F, and to any child or children that may yet be born to me, equally among them, share and share alike in fee." The "wife" referred to was his deceased wife's sister, and the marriage was not legal according to the law of Scotland. Held that children of this union born after the date of the settlement were intended by the testator to share along with a child of the testator by his former wife.

Allan v Adamson, (O.H.) 1902, 9 S.L.T. 404.

Bequest to grandchildren born before testator's death—Grandchildren illegitimate at testator's death subsequently legitimated—Grandchild in utero at testator's death.

A testator by his settlement directed his trustees to retain the residue of his estate until the youngest child of his son, J F B, "born prior to the date of my death," should attain majority; and on that event to make over the residue equally "to such of the children then surviving of the said J F B who were born prior to the date of my death." The testator also declared that the issue of children who died before the date of division should not take their parents' shares, it being his desire "that only those children of the said J F B who are born prior to the date of my death, and who survive said date of division, shall be entitled to participate in my estate." At the date of the testator's death there were four children of J F B by his first marriage; and there were also two illegitimate children, who were legitimated by his marriage with their mother after the testator's death. Another child of J F B's second marriage was in utero at the testator's death, but was not born till after the marriage. The second marriage took place before all the children of J F B's first marriage had attained majority. Held, on the terms of the settlement, that the two children who were illegitimate, and the child who was in utero, at the date of the testator's death, were not included in the class of residuary legatees.

Right of posthumous child to share—Bequest to two children nominatim.

A father executed a holograph will in 1878, when he was a widower, leaving his whole estates, heritable and moveable, to his two children nominatim. In 1884, before entering into a second marriage, he executed a marriage contract in which he assigned £3000 to trustees to secure payment of an annuity of £150 to his second wife should she survive him, with directions to the trustees on her death, should she survive him, to divide the trust funds among his children of both marriages equally, and, in the event of his wife predeceasing him, to restore the fund to himself, the marriage contract, in that event, containing no provision for children of the second marriage. He died six months after this marriage, survived by his widow, who subsequently gave birth to a posthumous child. This child claimed a share of the provisions made for the other children in the holograph will in addition to a share of the trust fund. The Lord Ordinary repelled the claim.

Findlay's Trustees v Findlay, (O.H.) 1886, 14 R. 167; 24 S.L.R. 56.

"Children of this marriage"—Eldest son.

A clause in an antenuptial marriage contract declaring that the provisions conceived in favour of "the children of this marriage" were in full satisfaction to them of their legal rights, was held not to apply to the eldest son, as the provisions referred to conferred no benefit on him.

Countess-Dowager of Kintore v Earl of Kintore, 1886, 13 R. (H.L.) 93; 11 App.Cas. 394; 23 S.L.R. 877.

(e) Issue.

(590)

Children or descendants generally.

The term "issue" in a destination under a mortis causa deed to a person named "and his issue" has no technical meaning, and it will depend upon the context and the intention of the testator whether it is confined to children, or includes grandchildren and descendants generally. Circumstances in which a gift of heritable subjects in favour of issue was held to be a gift in favour of children to the exclusion of more remote descendants.

Opinion (per Lord Shand) that the term "issue" occurring in a settlement is to be taken in its ordinary or primary sense, and implies a bequest to children, and not to more remote descendants.

Young's Trustees v M'Nab, 1883, 10 R. 1165; 20 S.L.R. 789.

(591)

Held that a destination to a person's "issue" in the ordinary case includes not children only but direct descendants of every degree.

Turner's Trustees v Turner, 1887, 24 R. 619; 34 S.L.R. 468; 4 S.L.T. 332.

(592)

Although the general rule is that the term "issue" includes not children only but direct descendants of every degree, it may appear from the terms of the deed that this was not the testator's intention. Terms of a will on which held that "issue" meant children only and accordingly that the exercise of a power of appointment which gave part of the fund to grandchildren was an invalid exercise of a power the objects of which were "issue."

Bannerman v Bannerman's Trustees, (O.H.) 1906, 13 S.L.T. 754.

Issue of marriage—Marriage contract.

Observed (per Lord Herschell, Lord Chancellor)—"It seems to me that in the natural meaning of the words 'issue of the marriage,' the grandchildren are included as much as the children. I do not accede to the argument that the primary meaning of 'issue' is 'children' only, and that it is departing from the primary meaning of 'issue of the marriage' if you include the children of children."

Macdonald v Hall, 1893, 20 R. (H.L.) 88; [1893] A.C. 642; 31 S.L.R. 279.

"Lawful issue of her body"—Settlement of heritage.

The Court, without determining the general effect of the words "lawful issue of her body" occurring in a deed of settlement of heritage, held, in conformity with the opinion expressed in 1852 at a prior stage of the case by Lord Rutherford, Ordinary (15 D. 176), and by Lord Wood in the Inner House (15 D. 185), that in the particular deed the context showed that they were to be construed as equivalent to "heirs of her body."

(596)

Conveyance of mixed estate.

A testator directed his trustees to pay certain legacies and expenses out of his moveable estate in the first place, and only in event of that being inadequate for the purpose to make up any deficiency by selling or burdening his heritable estate. He further directed his trustees to convey the residue of his estate, heritable and moveable, to his daughter for her life, and to the lawful issue of her body in fee, with this declaration and condition, that any son of the daughter "succeeding to the heritable subjects shall be bound to assume" the testator's surname. Held that the heritable estate was destined to the daughter's eldest son, and the moveable estate fell to be divided equally among the other children. Christie v Wisely, 1874, 1 R. 436.

(f) Family.

(597)

Grandchildren.

A bequest to the "family" of A held not to include the grandchildren of A.

(598)

Held that the word "family" occurring in a testamentary bequest "to A B, my sister, and failing her her family equally," meant children and did not include grandchildren.

Phillips' Trustees v Davies, (O.H.) 1910, 2 S.L.T. 161.

(599)

Held (per Lord Johnston, Ordinary, and acquiesced in) that where a testator directed his trustees to divide the residue of his estate "in equal proportions amongst the families of" B and C, his two brothers-in-law, the word "families" included only the immediate issue of B and C, and did not include a grandchild of B whose parent had died before the date of vesting.

A testator directed his trustees to pay a share of the residue of his estate "to the family of my deceased brother J G surviving at my death equally among them." At the time when the testator made his will one of the daughters of J G had died leaving issue. Held that there was nothing in these circumstances to displace the ordinary signification of the word "family" as being limited to sons and daughters only, and accordingly that the issue of the deceased daughter were not entitled to participate in the bequest.

(601)

"Families" of nephews and nieces.

A testator directed a share of the residue of his estate to be invested for behoof of A in life and her children in fee, and failing children "to go to the survivors of my nephews and nieces or the families of such as may have predeceased." A died without issue. Held that the word "families" included all descendants of nephews and nieces, and that the grandchildren of a nephew were entitled to succeed per stirpes to the share which their predeceasing parents would have had.

Irvine v Irvine, 1873, 11 M. 892; 45 J. 546; 10 S.L.R. 625.

(g) Relatives and Relations.

(602)

"Relatives."

A trustee directed that the residue of his estate should be "equally divided amongst all my relatives, my sister Maria to get half more than the others." Of his four sisters and two brothers only one—Maria—survived him, but several nephews and nieces did. Held that the testator's sister and all his nephews and nieces were entitled to share in the residue, per stirpes, the sister receiving half as much again as any of the other stirpes.

A testator bequeathed certain legacies to his blood relations, whom he mentioned in his will, and included in the list of legatees the name of his sister-in-law. There were also other legacies left to strangers, and a final direction that the residue of the estate was to go to the relatives already mentioned in the will. Held that the term "relatives" was not limited to the testator's heirs in mobilibus. Circumstances in which the word "relatives" held to include a sister-in-law. Opinion that the word relatives in ordinary circumstances is limited to blood relations.

Stewart's Trustees v Stewart, (O.H.) 1917, 2 S.L.T. 267.

(604)

"Relatives according to their legal rights."

Direction to dispose of share of residue among "my relatives according to their legal rights," held to import that the share was to be treated as having fallen into intestacy.

Nearest relatives.

Terms of a trust settlement in which the expression "nearest relatives of me the said A B entitled to succeed to my moveable estate," held to mean A B's heirs in mobilibus, and not to be restricted to his next of kin.

Thomson's Trustees v Thomson, (O.H.) 1903, 11 S.L.T. 67.

Relations.

(606)

Circumstances under which held that the term "relations" used in a trust settlement was not limited to the testator's next of kin.

Tait's Trustees v Bannatyne, (O.H.) 1894, 2 S.L.T. 168.

(h) Cousins.

(607)

The word "cousins" in a testamentary deed means first cousins only, unless there is something in the context of the deed or in the circumstances of the case to show that the word is used in a different sense.

Copland's Executors v Milne, 1908 S.C. 426; 45 S.L.R. 314; 15 S.L.T. 733.

"Second cousins"—First cousins once removed.

A trustor left bequests (1) "to my second cousin and servant, H B" (naming a person who was no relation); (2) "to each of my cousins" (naming them); and (3) "to each of my second cousins other than the first above-named H B." She further left a legacy to J S, "one of my second cousins" (he being in reality a first cousin once removed). Held that the term "second cousins" was used to denote not merely persons standing in that relationship strictly speaking, but also first cousins once removed.

Drylie's Factor v Robertson, &c., 1882, 9 R. 1178; 19 S.L.R. 884.

(i) "Survivors"—Whether Equivalent to "Others."

(609)

Liferent to children, and failing issue, to survivors—Capital to issue—Stirpital survivorship.

A testator directed his trustees to hold the residue of his estate for his three children, a son and two daughters, equally among them in liferent and for their issue in fee. He then directed that, if any of his children should die without leaving issue, or if such issue should die before majority or marriage, the trustees should hold the capital of their shares for "behoof of the survivors" of his said son and daughters, if more than one, or for the survivor if only one, "in the same way as is hereinbefore provided with regard to" their original shares. The testator next directed that, if any of his children should predecease him leaving issue, such issue should receive the capital which would have been liferented by their parent, and that, if any of his children should predecease him leaving no issue, their shares should be divided equally among his surviving children and the issue of predeceasing children per stirpes. Then followed a direction that, failing any survivor of his son and daughters or issue of any of them, his trustees should pay over the shares of his son and daughters to their nearest heirs and representatives in moveables. The testator was survived by his three children. The son died unmarried, survived by the issue of one of his sisters who had predeceased him, and by the other sister and her issue. Held that the word "survivors" was used in the settlement in a stirpital sense, and included not only a child surviving in person, but also one who, figuratively, survived in his or her issue, and accordingly that, while half of the share of the son accresced to the surviving daughter and her issue, the other half accresced to the issue of the deceased daughter.

(609a)

A testator directed his trustees to divide his estate into shares and to hold the shares for his children and their spouses in liferent, and for their respective children in fee. It was declared that the shares of any children dying without leaving issue should accresce "to my other children then surviving in liferent, and to their respective issue in fee." Held that the share of one of the testator's children who died without issue passed to the other children alive at her death in liferent, and to their issue in fee, to the exclusion of the issue of children then dead.

By her trust disposition and settlement a testatrix provided for payment to each of her three daughters a share of her estate in liferent, and to their issue in fee. She further provided that in the event of any of her daughters dying without issue her share should go to the surviving daughters in liferent and their issue in fee. Two of the daughters died leaving issue, but the last survivor of the daughters died without issue. Held that the word "surviving" must be given its ordinary signification, and that, accordingly, the issue of predeceasing daughters were not entitled to any part of the last surviving daughter's share, which fell into intestacy.

Stevenson's Trustees v Stevenson, (O.H.) 1913, 1 S.L.T. 292.

Liferent to beneficiaries with fee to children—Destination over to surviving beneficiaries in liferent and their children in fee.

A testator directed his trustees to hold the residue of his estate for the liferent use of ten persons named, with fee to their children. Failing children of any of the persons named, the testator directed that the shares which would have fallen to such children should "accresce and belong to the survivors of the parties before named in liferent, and to their children in fee, all in the same manner as the proper shares of the parties themselves." Held that "survivors" was equivalent to "others," and that therefore the children of those of "the parties before named" who did not survive to take an accrescing liferent took no accrescing fee. Question, whether the same result would have followed had the childless liferenter been the last survivor of the liferenters, and, consequently, had the question been one of testacy or intestacy.

(611a)

A testator, after providing for the payment of certain annuities, directed his trustees to divide the remainder of the income arising from his estate among his children, share and share alike, for their liferent use allenerly, and upon the death of any of his children leaving lawful issue, to pay the portion of the estate which had been liferented by the decesser equally among the decesser's children on their attaining majority, or being married, "declaring that in the event of any of my children dying without leaving lawful issue, his or her share of the liferent of my means and estate shall thereafter be divisible and payable equally among my surviving children and their issue in liferent and fee respectively in the same manner and subject to the same restrictions as are above specified in regard to the provisions in favour of my children and their issue generally." Held that upon the death of one of the testator's children without issue the share liferented by him fell to be divided equally among the testator's children then surviving and their issue in liferent and fee respectively, the issue of the testator's predeceasing children being excluded.

A testator directed his trustees upon his death to secure and lend upon good and sufficient bonds, payable to themselves, the sum of £700 in trust for behoof of each of his five daughters in liferent allenerly, and the lawful issue of each in fee. The deed provided that in case any daughter should die before the testator, or die without issue, "the sum or sums provided and intended for them and theirs as aforesaid, not only the original sum so provided, but the sum or sums accrescing to her or them by virtue of the present clause shall appertain and accresce to the survivor or survivors of my said daughters in liferent for their liferent use allenerly, and to their issue and children, share and share alike, in fee. . . ." The deed further provided that at the request of any of his daughters, the trustees were to invest her £700 in the purchase of land or houses, and were to take the titles to her in liferent allenerly and her issue in fee, "whom failing, to my said other daughters in liferent, and their respective issue and children in fee, in case of their death or their dying without leaving such issue and children, as in manner before mentioned." The testator left the residue of his estate to his sons. Held that on the death of a daughter without issue her provision fell to her surviving sisters in liferent and their respective children in fee (children of predeceasing sisters being excluded), and that on the death of the last surviving sister without issue, the fee of the fund liferented by her fell into residue.

(613)

A testator directed his trustees to hold the residue of his estate for his sisters nominatim, equally in liferent, and for their children respectively in fee, "declaring that, in the event of the decease of one or more of my said sisters without children, her or their shares shall be held by my said trustees for the liferent use of the survivors and their children in liferent and fee as aforesaid." Held that the word "survivors" in the clause above quoted ought to receive its natural meaning, and consequently that the share set free by the death of the childless sister fell to the testator's surviving sister and her children, in liferent and fee respectively, the children of a sister who had predeceased taking nothing.

Gift to surviving beneficiaries in liferent and "their" issue in fee—Right of issue of predeceasing beneficiaries.

A testator, inter alia, gave a portion of his estate to his grandnieces in liferent allenerly and the fee to the issue of the grandnieces, "whom failing to the survivors of them and my grandnephews, equally in liferent and their issue also equally in fee, after the death of the longest liver of me and my wife." One of the grandnieces survived the testator, but predeceased his wife without issue. One of the grandnephews survived the grandniece but predeceased the testator's wife, leaving a son who survived the widow. Held that the son was not entitled to any part of the share set free by the failure of issue of the grandniece as that share was destined to grandnieces and grandnephews who survived the testator's widow in liferent and the issue of such survivors in fee.

Richardson v Macdougall, 1868, 6 M. (H.L.) 18; 40 J. 466; 5 S.L.R. 454.

Gift of income to beneficiaries and survivors—Fee to issue, whom failing, to issue of survivors—Last survivor of liferenters leaving no issue.

A testator directed his trustees to pay the free income of his estate, after deducting an annuity to his widow, in equal portions to his brother and four sisters, and failing them without issue, to the survivors and survivor. He further directed his trustees, on the death of any of his brothers or sisters leaving issue, to pay to such issue (and the issue of any predeceasers) the capital sum liferent by their parents, so far as this could be done consistently with securing the widow's annuity, and on the widow's death to make over and settle his whole estate "in equal shares upon my said brothers and sisters in liferent allennarly, and the issue of their bodies respectively, whom failing, to the issue of the survivors or survivor in fee." The truster was survived by his widow, his brother, and his four sisters. His brother and three of his sisters predeceased the widow, the brother and two of the sisters leaving issue. The remaining sister survived the widow and died without issue. Held that the words "survivors or survivor" were to be construed as equivalent to "others or other," and that the share liferented by the last surviving sister fell to be divided among the issue of the predeceasing liferenters who had left issue.

Gift of fee to two beneficiaries—Destination over to issue—Failing issue, destination to survivor and issue of survivor—Survivor dying without issue—Accretion to issue of predeceaser.

By a trust disposition and settlement, dated in 1881, a testator directed his trustees to pay to W and R, the sons of his half-sister, equally between them, the sum of £2500, "declaring that should both or either of them be at present deceased, or should, hereafter predecease me, leaving lawful issue, such issue shall take the share that would have fallen to their parent if in life, equally per stirpes, and in default of such issue, the same shall fall and accrete to the survivor of the said W and R, and the issue of the survivor, whom all failing, the same shall fall into and form part of the residue of my estate." The testator died in 1889. Both W and R predeceased him, W having died in 1867, leaving two sons who survived the testator, and R having died in 1872 without issue. Held, upon a construction of the terms of the bequest, that the word "survivor" was to be read as equivalent to "other," and therefore that W's sons were entitled to R's share of the bequest.

Gift of fee to named beneficiaries—Destination to heirs of bodies of persons named—Destination over to heirs of bodies of survivors of persons named—Vesting in heirs of body of predeceaser.

In a mortis causa disposition and settlement the grantor disposed certain heritable subjects to A, his youngest son, "and the heirs whomsoever of his body, whom failing, to the heirs of the bodies of" B, C, D, and E, his other children, one-fourth to each, "and in case of the death of any of the said B, C, D, and E without issue, or that the children of any of them should fail, then to the heirs of the bodies of the survivors or survivor of the said B, C, D, and E, and their heirs, successors, and assignees whomsoever." Held that the words "survivors or survivor" fell to be read as "others or other."

Smith's Trustees v Smith's Trustees, 1905, 7 F. 815; 42 S.L.R. 657; 13 S.L.T. 190.

(j) Servants.

(618)

Blacksmith employed whole time on estate at weekly wage.

The proprietor of landed estates, with a large establishment of servants of all kinds, in a holograph will, left a legacy of £4000 to his factor and certain specific legacies to his butlers, his coachman, and his housekeeper nominatim; he then bequeathed "to each of my other servants who shall be in my service at the time of my death, and who shall have been with me for four years, one year's wages." Held that a blacksmith engaged by the year for whole-time employment was entitled to a legacy.

Servants of testator—Persons employed by trustees of whom testator one—Persons paid by testator for road trustees.

An heir of entail in possession of entailed estates left legacies to his factor, butler, coachman, and housekeeper, nominatim, and "to each of my other servants who shall be in my service at the time of my death, and who shall have been with me four years, one year's wages." At the time of the testator's death about forty persons, including ordinary day labourers, were employed at outdoor work on the entailed estates (Pollok), and had been so employed for the four years immediately preceding. Besides these persons there were some others who had been employed (also at outdoor work) for a greater or less portion of the four years on a contiguous estate called Pollok-shields, which was held by trustees (of whom the testator was one) to be sold in payment of the subsisting debt on Pollok, and the residue, if any, entailed on the same series of heirs as that estate; for the remainder of the four years these persons were employed on Pollok, and they were transferred from the one estate to the other without notice of any change of employment. There were also other persons who had been employed for part of the four years in work on the statute labour roads in the neighbourhood of Pollok and paid, through the testator's managers, out of money intrusted to him for that purpose by the road trustees, but were for the rest of the four years employed on Pollok, and were likewise transferred from the one work to the other without notice of any change of employment. Held (1) that those of the employees who had for a substantial part of the four years in question been employed either on Pollok-shields or in work on the statute labour roads could not be regarded as servants of the testator; but (2) that all the remaining employees were entitled to a legacy.

Stirling-Maxwell's Executors v Grant,
1886, 13 R. 854; 23 S.L.R. 584.

(620)

Employees in the testator's business—Office cleaner.

A testator left legacies "to the employees and workpeople who may at the time of my death be employed in the business" carried on by his firm. Held that a woman whose duty it was to clean out the offices was not entitled to a legacy.

Young v Dick's Trustees, 1904, 12 S.L.T. 20.

(k) Clergy.

(621)

Clergy of Episcopal Church — Clergy of diocese.

A testatrix belonging to the Scottish Episcopal Church directed her trustee to invest a sum of £4000 "and to divide the annual income derived therefrom among the clergy of the diocese of Aberdeen in supplement of their stipends." Held (1) that the Bishop, clergymen instituted to regular incumbencies, clergymen holding the licence of the Bishop and appointed to independent mission charges, curates or assistants to regularly instituted clergymen, and the "supernumerary clergymen," i.e., a clergyman who performed clerical duties when required on behalf of other clergymen in the diocese, were "clergy" of the diocese within the meaning of the bequest, and entitled to participate in the income; but (2) that clergymen formerly officiating in the diocese who had retired and were on the aged and infirm clergy funds, but who still held the licence of the Bishop, were not entitled to participate, as they had no stipends and were under no obligation to perform clerical duties.

Clergy of diocese of A—United diocese.

A testatrix belonging to the Scottish Episcopal Church in Aberdeen by a codicil dated six years before her death (which took place in 1878) directed her trustee to invest a sum of money "and divide the annual income derived therefrom among the clergy of the diocese of Aberdeen." In 1864 the diocese of Orkney was united with the diocese of Aberdeen and thereafter the two sees were administered as one. Held that the clergy of the original diocese of Orkney were entitled to participate in the income as well as those of the original diocese of Aberdeen.

(2) DATE AT WHICH BENEFICIARIES ASCERTAINED.

(623)

Ascertainment prior to death of propositus. Observed (per Lord President Inglis)—"I do not think anybody can fulfil the part of a man's heir during that man's lifetime. A man's heir has no existence until he dies, and it never can be ascertained till he dies who will be his heir."

"Heirs-male of the body."

A testator by his settlement disposed a heritable estate to his brother J F and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing to other substitutes. By a codicil the testator restricted the interest of J F to an alimentary liferent. Held that the heirs-male of the body of J F could not be ascertained until after J F's death.

Ferguson v Ferguson, 1875, 2 R. 627; 12 S.L.R. 435.

"Heir of body of A."

A testator, by his trust disposition and settlement, directed that "after the death of" his father, "the residue of the capital of my estate shall be paid and made over by my trustees to the heirs of the body of" his brother, "whom failing, to the heirs of the body of" his sister, "whom all failing, to my own heirs in mobilibus." There was no provision for the disposal of the income of the trust subsequently to the father's death. The brother, who never was married, predeceased, and the sister survived, the father. In a special case presented on the father's death, and in the lifetime of the testator's sister, her children claimed immediate payment of the residue, on the ground that, as there was no object of the trust requiring a postponement of vesting, the trust must be held to have intended to benefit the children of his sister who might be in existence at his father's death, and that the terms "heirs of her body" must be construed in that sense. Held that effect must be given to the ordinary meaning of these terms, and that vesting was postponed till the death of the testator's sister, until which date the "heirs of her body" could not be ascertained.

Gollan's Trustees v Booth, 1901, 3 F. 1035; 38 S.L.R. 762; 9 S.L.T. 121.

Heirs of marriage.

The heirs of a marriage cannot be ascertained until the dissolution of the marriage. Opinion that they fall in the ordinary case to be ascertained at that date.

(628)

By antenuptial marriage contract, a husband disposed his whole estate to his wife in liferent and to the children of the marriage, and, failing children, to his "heirs whomsoever" in fee, subject to certain powers to his wife to encroach or consume; but, in case these powers were not exercised, the estate, or the residue thereof, at her death should devolve upon the heirs as if the above powers had not been given. The husband predeceased the wife without issue, and the wife died without exercising any of the powers conferred by the marriage contract. Held that the husband's heirs fell to be ascertained at his death.

Howe's Trustees v Howe's Judicial Factor, 1903, 5 F. 1099; 40 S.L.R. 772; 11 S.L.T. 232.

———"Nearest heirs in moveables whomsoever"—Destination over, failing issue of liferenters.

A testatrix directed her trustees to pay the income of the residue of her estate equally between her grandnieces A and B, and on the death of A and B to convey one-half of the capital to the issue of A and the other half to the issue of B. In the event of A and B dying without leaving issue the testatrix directed her trustees to convey the residue to "my own nearest heirs in moveables whomsoever, the division being always per stirpes and not per capita." The testatrix was survived by A and B, who were among her heirs in moveables at her death. Both A and B died without leaving issue. Held (by a majority of seven judges) that the testatrix intended only one date of distribution, the death of the survivor of A and B, and that her heirs in moveables were to be ascertained at that date.

A testator destined a certain sum to his grand-daughter in liferent and in fee to her issue, and failing issue to be divided between his daughters A and B, and failing either of them to her issue, "whom also failing to my nearest in kin." The liferentrix and the daughters survived him, but the daughters and their issue predeceased the liferentrix. The daughters were his nearest in kin at the date of his death. On the death of the liferentrix without issue, held that the parties entitled to succeed were the nearest in kin of the testator at the death of the liferentrix.

Opinion that, in construing the words "nearest in kin" occurring in a testamentary bequest there is no presumption to be founded on any supposed primary meaning of these words as indicating "nearest in kin at the testator's death."

Johnston's Trustees v Dewar, 1911 S.C. 722; 48 S.L.R. 582; 1911, 1 S.L.T. 316.

Terms of a trust settlement under which held that a destination by the testatrix on the expiry of a liferent to "my heirs in mobilibus according to the law of Scotland," conferred a vested right in the testatrix' heirs in mobilibus as ascertained at the time of her death.

(632)

Gift to daughter and her issue—Destination over to testator's heirs, executors, and assignees.

A testator directed his trustees to hold his whole estate for the alimentary liferent of his daughter and for her issue in fee, and on her death without issue "then my trustees shall, as soon as convenient thereafter, pay, assign, and dispose the said residue and remainder of my said whole estate to and in favour of my heirs, executors, and assignees whomsoever." The testator's heir in heritance and in moveables at the time of his death was his daughter, the liferentrix. She died unmarried. Held that the testator's heir was to be ascertained at the date of his death and that the testamentary trustees of the daughter were entitled to succeed.

Barron's Trustees v Barron's Trustees, (O.H.) 1897, 5 S.L.T. 100.

"Nearest of kin."

By postnuptial contract spouses disposed their whole estate to each other and gave the survivor the liferent of the whole. On the death of the survivor, one-half was to be paid to legatees to be appointed in writing by the husband, and failing an appointment by him to his "nearest in kin." The husband predeceased the wife without making an appointment. Held that the next of kin fell to be ascertained at the husband's death, and not at the death of the wife.

Ferrier v Angus, 1876, 3 R. 396; 13 S.L.R. 263.

By a postnuptial marriage contract the spouses conveyed their whole estate to the survivor in liferent and to the children of the marriage in fee. In the event of the dissolution of the marriage by the death of either spouse without leaving children, or of the decease of all the children in the lifetime of the surviving spouse the husband's estate, failing exercise of a power of disposal, was to "fall to and become the property of his own nearest of kin." The marriage was dissolved by the death of the husband. There was one child of the marriage who survived the husband but predeceased the wife, leaving a son who also predeceased the wife. Held that the husband's nearest of kin were to be ascertained at his own death, not at the death of the wife.

Gregory's Trustees v Alison, 1889, 16 R. (H.L.) 10; 14 App.Cas. 124; 26 S.L.R. 787.

(635)

Trustees under a mutual settlement were directed on the expiry of certain liferents to divide the capital "among the lawful issue of all of them in life equally and proportionally, and failing their having issue the same shall descend to our own (the trusters') nearest in kin." Held that the right to a share vested in the "nearest in kin" of the trusters at the date of their respective deaths.

3 S.L.T. 316.

(636)

———"Heir at law"—Destination to "A, whom failing without lawful issue, to my heir at law."

A testator by his trust disposition and settlement gave his wife, if she survived him, a life interest of his heritable estate, and directed his trustees on her death to dispose certain heritable subjects belonging to him "to my son A, whom failing without lawful issue, to my heir at law." The testator was survived by his wife and by A, who was his heir at law as at the date of the testator's death. A predeceased the widow without issue, leaving a settlement. Held, in a question between A's representatives and the testator's heir at law as at the date of the widow's death (1) that the expression "my heir at law," meant the testator's heir at law as at the date of his death (viz., A), the strong presumption being in favour of that interpretation, and the terms of this particular deed not being such as to require a different construction; and (2) that the property in question vested in A a morte testatoris, and was carried by his settlement.

(637)

A testator bequeathed a third of his residue to his "nearest of kin." The bequest vested a morte. Held that the testator's "nearest of kin" fell to be ascertained at the date of his death.

(638)

L and H were married on 1st September, 1874. By antenuptial contract L had conveyed her whole estate to trustees, directing them that in the event of there being no child of the marriage, or no child surviving the period of vesting, which was to take place on arrival at twenty-one years or on marriage, they should on the expiration of the husband's life interest, make over the fee to such persons as she should appoint, "and failing such writing to her heirs and assignees whomsoever." She died on 17th June, 1875, survived by the only child of the marriage, who died on 22nd June, a few days after its birth, and by her husband, who died on 13th July of the same year. She had not executed any writing of appointment. Held, in a question with the Crown as to succession duty that the destination by L in favour of "her heirs and assignees whomsoever," was a destination in favour of a class to be ascertained at the time when the distribution fell to be made, and not at the date of her death.

Lord Advocate v Lamond, (O.H.) 1886, 23

(639)

———"Heirs and executors" of trustor.

Under an antenuptial marriage contract the trustees were directed to pay the income of the funds settled by the wife to her husband during his life should he survive her and, on the death of the survivor of the spouses, to pay these funds (1) to the children of the marriage if and when they attained majority; or (2) should the wife predecease her husband without leaving issue, or should issue survive her but predecease her husband without attaining majority, to such persons as the wife might appoint, and failing appointment, "to her heirs and executors whomsoever." The wife died (without having made any such appointment), survived by her husband and by one child. The child died in infancy during the lifetime of the husband. On the death of the husband the funds were claimed (1) by his testamentary trustees, on the ground that the child, being also the wife's heir, had acquired a vested right therein, which had passed to the husband as its heir, and (2) by relatives of the wife as her heirs, at the date of (a) the child's death, or (b) the husband's death. Held, on a construction of the terms of the marriage contract, that the funds fell to be paid to the heirs of the wife as ascertained at the death of the husband.

———"Heirs in mobilibus."

A testator, by his testamentary settlement, directed his trustees to hold a portion of the residue of his estate in equal shares for his son and daughter in life interest, and for their issue respectively in fee, vesting in the issue being suspended till their parent's death. It was declared that, if either child died without leaving issue, the share life interest by him or her should fall to the testator's "heirs in mobilibus," and that neither of the testator's children should "have any vested right in the capital." Both of the testator's children survived him, and thereafter the daughter died without issue, but leaving a will. Held that the testator's heirs in mobilibus fell to be ascertained at his death and not at the death of the daughter, and, accordingly, that the share life interest by the daughter fell to be divided equally between the son and the daughter's executor.

———"Heirs or assignees" — Marriage contract.

Under an antenuptial marriage contract the trustees were directed to pay the income of the estate settled by the wife to her, and after her death to her husband if he survived her, and, upon the death of the survivor of the spouses and upon the youngest child of the marriage attaining the age of twenty-one, to convey the estate to the children of the marriage. It was declared that the provision to the children should not vest until the occurrence of both of these events; and it was further provided that, in the event of no children surviving the deaths of the spouses, or of all the children predeceasing the period of vesting, the trustees should make over the wife's estate to her "heirs or assignees." The wife died intestate survived by her husband and by one child. This child died in infancy during the husband's lifetime. Held that the heirs of the wife fell to be ascertained as at the date of her death.

Substitution—Marriage contract—Heritable subjects destined to children of marriage, whom failing, to heirs and assignees of wife.

By a marriage contract certain heritable subjects belonging to the wife were disposed in fee "to the children of said intended marriage equally among them, share and share alike, whom failing, to the heirs and assignees" of the wife. The wife died survived by one child, who died in pupilarity. Held that the last clause of the destination was a substitution and not a conditional institution merely; and that the heirs of the wife were to be sought as at the date of the child's death.

(643)

By an antenuptial contract of marriage a husband conveyed the whole estate belonging to him at the date of the contract, or which should belong to him at the time of his death, to and in favour of himself and his wife and the longest liver in liferent allennary, and to the children of the marriage, whom failing, to his own heirs and assignees in fee. The husband died intestate and without issue, but was survived by his widow. Held that the heir entitled to succeed to the husband's heritage fell to be ascertained at the date of his own death, and not at the date of the widow's death.

Brown v Brown, (O.H.) 1913, 2 S.L.T. 314.

(645)

Substitution—Heirs-male of testator—Direction to trustees to convey heritage in terms of destination.

A testator directed his trustees to hold a
v 14

heritable estate for his widow in liferent, and on her death to convey it to G B, "whom failing, to the heirs of his body, whom failing, to my own heirs-male and the heirs of their body, whom failing, to my own nearest heirs whomsoever, excluding heirs-portioners." When the testator died, G B was his heir-male, but he predeceased the widow without issue. Held that the testator's heir-male was to be ascertained at the death of the testator's widow.

Representative of beneficiary—Destination, on expiry of liferent, to a person named "or his heirs in heritage."

A testator, who died survived by his wife, directed his trustees to hold his dwelling-house, the furniture therein, and a sum of £3000, for his wife in liferent, and on the death of the survivor of himself and his wife to convey the house and furniture, and to pay the sum of £3000, to his cousin, A B, "or his heirs in heritage." A B survived the testator, but predeceased the widow. He was survived by his eldest son, who also predeceased the widow without leaving issue. A B's second son survived the widow. Held (1) that the destination to the heirs in heritage of A B was a conditional institution which suspended vesting until the death of the testator's widow; and (2) that the heir in heritage of A B fell to be ascertained at that date. Held, accordingly, that A B's second son was entitled to the legacies.

"Executors"—Gift payable on death of liferenter.

Two spouses conveyed to trustees the estates which should belong to them "respectively" at their deaths, in order to pay the income to the survivor, and "in order that the trustees may and shall at the death of the longest liver" of the spouses convey certain property, heritable and moveable, to A, B, and C, "their heirs and assignees, providing that if A, B, or C should have predeceased their heirs should be entitled to their share of the heritage and their executors to their share of the moveables." Vesting was suspended until the death of the surviving spouse. Held that the executors of the legatees were the persons who would have succeeded them ab intestato at that date.

Stodart's Trustees, 1870, 8 M. 667; 42 J. 330.

(648)

"Heirs"—Gift payable on death of liferentrix.

A testator directed his trustees on the expiry of a liferent to sell his heritable estate and pay an equal share of the proceeds "to each of the said A B, my brother, and C D, my sister, or their heirs." A B and C D both survived the testator, but predeceased the liferentrix. Vesting was held to be postponed until the death of the liferentrix. Held that the heirs of A B and C D fell to be ascertained as at the death of the liferentrix.

Highet's Judicial Factor v Hamilton, (O.H.) 1912, 1 S.L.T. 474.

(649)

——— "Heirs of body" of liferenter.

An estate was conveyed to a father in liferent for his liferent use only, and to the heirs of his body in fee. Held that the heirs of the liferenter's body fell to be ascertained at his death, and that vesting took place at that date.

Black v Mason, 1881, 8 R. 497; 18 S.L.R. 319.

(650)

Heirs at law of A alive at death of B.

Held that a destination in an inter vivos trust deed in favour of "the heirs at law in moveables of A who shall be alive at the death of B" referred to the heirs at law in moveables of A as at A's death.

Stodart's Trustees v Lorimer, (O.H.) 1895, 2 S.L.T. 551.

(651)

——— Heirs-male of marriage — Heirs-female of marriage.

In a marriage contract the wife's father entailed an estate on the spouses and the longest liver in liferent (subject to conditions which restricted their right to a liferent allenarly) and the heirs-male of the marriage, whom failing the heirs-female of the marriage in fee. The marriage was dissolved by the death of the husband, leaving daughters, but no sons. Held that the heirs of the marriage fell to be ascertained at the dissolution of the marriage, and that the estate vested in the eldest daughter at that date.

Maule, 1876, 3 R. 831; 13 S.L.R. 532.

Liferent to A—Fee to children of B, whom failing to children of C—B in life at death of A, but having no issue—Payment to child of C.

Testamentary trustees were directed, after payment of certain annuities, to hold the residue of the testator's estate for behoof of his brother George, and, failing him, his cousin John, in liferent, and thereafter for "payment and delivery" thereof to the children of George, whom failing, for payment of a legacy and the balance to the children of the testator's brother Archibald, whom failing, to the children of the testator's brother William. At the death of the last survivor of George (who never married), John, and the annuitants, Archibald was alive, but had no children, and William was alive, and had an only son. Held that after payment of the special legacy, William's only child was entitled to have the residue made over to him.

Stewart's Trustees v Stewart, 1868, 7 M. 4; 41 J. 5; 6 S.L.R. 3.

Executors of deceased R H—Will dated in 1849—Testator dying in 1867.

A testator, by a will dated in 1849 (prior to the passing of the Intestate Moveable Succession Act of 1855) left a portion of his property "to the executors of the deceased R H," who died in 1841. The testator died in 1867. Held that the persons entitled to take under the bequest were those who would have been the heirs in mobilibus of R H had he died at the same time as the testator.

Ewart v Cottom, 1870, 9 M. 232; 8 S.L.R. 182.

Children—Class gift.

[See VESTING IV.]

(3) INACCURATE DESCRIPTION OF BENEFICIARY.

(654)

Misdescription of object of bequest—Societies.

A lady who occasionally contributed to the funds of "The Scottish Society for the Conversion of Israel," which some years prior to her death became associated with the United Presbyterian Church mission scheme, left a bequest to "The Society for the Conversion of the Jews." It appeared that there was no society with that designation, although there were at least three having a similar object, viz., the Scottish society above-mentioned, and two others in England. The English societies did not claim the legacy. Held that the bequest was not void by reason of uncertainty, and that the society was entitled to it.

Wilson's Executors v Scottish Society for the Conversion of Israel, 1869, 8 M. 233; 42 J. 102; 7 S.L.R. 137.

(655)

A testator made bequests inter alios to "the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, Glasgow," "the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, Paisley," and "the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, Greenock." The two latter societies did not exist, but the Glasgow and West of Scotland Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals had a district branch in Greenock, and although it had no branch in Paisley carried on operations there. Held, after a proof, that the Glasgow society was entitled in addition to the bequest in its own favour to take along with its Greenock branch the bequest to the Greenock society, and also to take the bequest to the Paisley society on giving an undertaking to set up a resident officer there.

(657)

Circumstances in which held that a legacy to "the Mission to the Wynds, Glasgow," was intended for a mission known as the "Wynd Church," which at one time had been carried on in the "Wynds," but before the testatrix's death had been transferred to another district of Glasgow.

(658)

—Individuals.

A testator in a family settlement made a bequest "to Edith Johnstone, of 28 Athole Gardens, Glasgow." There was no one who exactly answered this description, but the bequest was claimed by a grandniece, Ethel Maud Johnstone, who used to live at 28 Athole Gardens, Glasgow, and by a niece, Mrs. Edith Johnstone or Mitford Burgess, who had never lived there. After proof of the circumstances, held that Ethel Maud Johnstone was entitled to the bequest.

(662)

A testatrix left the residue of her estate to be divided equally between her nephew A and the four youngest sons of her nephew B, and the survivors and survivor of them. B had only three sons, and one of the sons was born after the date of the will. B had also five daughters. Held that the residue must be divided into four parts, one to go to A and the other three to the three sons of B.

Lumsden's Trustees v Lumsden, (O.H.) 1921, 1 S.L.T. 155.

Class described as of a certain number — Demonstrative or taxative.

A testatrix directed her trustees to divide the free residue of her estate "equally among the children of my late brother A, of whom there are nine, the children of my brother B, of whom there are ten, and the children of my brother C, of whom there are seven, who may survive me." At the date of the will B had ten children. Before the death of the testatrix three other children were born to him. All B's children survived the testatrix. Held that all the children of B were entitled to share in the residue.

Certain members of class expressly named — Exclusion of members of class not named.

A testator had power to apportion a fund among his children. He directed the fund to be paid amongst and between the whole of his children "videlicet" (then followed the names of five of his six children). Held that the child not named by the testator was excluded from participating in the fund.

(665)

Ragged school in Dundee — Training ship beyond burgh boundaries.

A testator directed a share of the rents of his estate to be paid for a period of years "to the Ragged Schools in Dundee." Claim of the "Mars" Training Ship Institution to participate sustained, though the "Mars" training ship was moored in the Tay beyond the boundaries of the parish and burgh of Dundee, and nearer to the Fifehire than to the Forfarshire coast, but within the limits of the harbour of Dundee.

Charitable purpose—Whether particular institution indicated.

A testatrix left property near Edinburgh to "the blind soldiers who have lost their sight in the present war." The money derived from the property was to go to a home situated in Edinburgh. The Royal Blind Asylum and School, Edinburgh, presented a claim and averred that they carried on a home for training blinded soldiers in Edinburgh, and further that they were the only institution who carried on this work in Edinburgh. The testatrix was well aware of the existence and designation of the claimants, but refrained from naming them in the bequest. Held that the claimants were not entitled to the legacy.

Sanderson's Trustee v Edinburgh Royal Blind Asylum, (O.H.) 1919, 1 S.L.T. 39.

9. DIVISION PER STIRPES OR PER CAPITA.

(1) GENERALLY.

(667)

Gift "equally between" children of A and children of B.

A testatrix directed her trustees to divide the whole of her estate "equally between the children of my late brother A and the children of my late sister B." Held that the division between the children of the deceased brother and sister fell to be made per capita.

Bogie's Trustees v Christie, 1882, 9 R. 453; 19 S.L.R. 363.

"Amongst the families."

A testator directed his trustees to divide the residue of his estate "in equal proportions amongst the families of" B (the brother of his first wife), and C (the brother of his second wife), "in equal proportions, share and share alike." Held that the word "amongst" meant "between," and that the residue fell to be divided in two equal shares between the family of B and the family of C, the share falling to each family being then divided equally among the members of that family.

Equally between A, B, and C, and the children of their deceased sister.

A testator who had one brother and six sisters, of whom two of the sisters predeceased him, by his last will and testament directed his trustees and executors to convert his estate into money and to divide it as follows, viz.:—One-seventh part to his brother, his brother's wife, and their daughter equally; one-seventh part to each of his four surviving sisters; one-seventh part equally among the children of his deceased sister Lucinda Dalrymple; and one-seventh part "equally between Robert Horne, Jessie Horne, Mary, the wife of Mr. Lloyd (the children of my deceased sister, Margaret Horne), and the children of Lucinda Forester, the deceased daughter of the said Margaret Horne." Held that the last-mentioned one-seventh share fell to be divided among the beneficiaries per stirpes and not per capita, and that, accordingly, the nephew and the two nieces of the testator were each entitled to one-fourth part, and the children of his deceased niece to the remaining fourth part equally among them.

(670)

Residue to be paid "equally between A and the children of B equally between them"—Double use of "equally."

A testator directed her trustees to pay the whole residue "equally between John Inglis and the children of Daniel M'Neil . . . equally between them." John Inglis was a nephew of the testator, and Daniel M'Neil's wife was a niece. Both survived the testator. Held that the division was bipartite between Inglis and the M'Neils, and equal again among the M'Neils, of whom there were eight.

Inglis v M'Neil, 1892, 19 R. 924; 29 S.L.R. 795.

(671)

A testator by his trust disposition and settlement left the residue of his estate to his brothers and sisters equally, and provided that "the children of any predeceasing of any issue of beneficiaries entitled to . . . shares of residue shall be entitled equally among them to the shares which their parents would have taken if they had survived." A sister of the testator predeceased, leaving a daughter and seven grandchildren, the children of a predeceasing daughter. Held that the sister's share fell to be divided per stirpes between the daughter and the grandchildren, and that the daughter was entitled to one-half of the share.

(673)

"Among my cousins and among the children of my uncle J H."

A testator left the liferent of the residue of his estate to his widow, and directed that, on the termination of the liferent, "I desire that all of which I am possessed be divided among my cousins, the Blackwells (leaving out Mrs. Buckle), and among the children of my uncle, James Hay, Esq., of Belton." Held that the residue fell to be divided among the members of the Blackwell and Hay families per capita.

To next of kin of spouses equally—Mutual settlement.

Two spouses by contract and mutual disposition disposed their whole estate to the survivor, and on the death of the survivor, "to the nearest in kin of us, the said . . . equally." In a question between the sole next of kin of the wife and three next of kin of the husband, held on a construction of the whole deed, that the estate fell to be divided among the next of kin of both spouses as a single class per capita.

Hogg v Bruce, 1887, 14 R. 887; 24 S.L.R. 651.

Division per stirpes—Question as to heads of stirpes.

A testatrix directed her trustees to pay the residue of her estate to "my own nearest heirs in moveables whomsoever the division always being per stirpes and not per capita." The testatrix was survived by two granddaughters, A and B, of a deceased brother H (through H's only daughter, who predeceased the testatrix), and by a son and three daughters and the issue of six deceased children of a deceased sister, W. On the assumption (contrary to the finding of the Court) that the heirs of the testatrix were to be ascertained at her death, opinions (per Lord President Inglis and Lord Mure) that the effect of the words "the division always being per stirpes not per capita" was to bring in per expressum the rule of representation introduced by the Moveable Succession Act, 1855, and that the nephews and nieces of the testatrix were to be taken as the heads of the stirpes. Opinion (per Lord Shand) that the testatrix intended the heads of the stirpes to be taken as near in relationship to herself as they could be found, and that these were her own brother and sister.

Haldane's Trustees v Murphy, 1881, 9 R. 269; 19 S.L.R. 217.

(2) GIFTS TO RELATIONS OF DIFFERENT DEGREES.

(676)

Residue to be "equally divided amongst all my relatives"—Relatives of different degree.

A trustor directed that the residue of his estate should be "equally divided amongst all my relatives, my sister Maria to get a half more than the others." Of his four sisters and two brothers only one—Maria—survived him, but several nephews and nieces did. Held that the testator's sister and all his nephews and nieces were entitled to share in the residue per stirpes, the sister receiving half as much again as any of the other stirpes.

Direction to divide equally between A and his children and B and his children.

A testator by the residuary clause of his will provided—"I bequeath the remainder of my estate . . . to be divided equally between my brother P and his children and my brother G and his children, my nephews J and A, sons of my brother P, not to participate in this last bequest." Held that the bequest was not one to the brothers with a conditional institution of their respective children, but was a bequest to the brothers and their children (other than the two who had been excluded) concurrently, and that the division among them fell to be made per capita and not per stirpes.

Gift equally between surviving brother and sisters and issue of decessors—"Share and share alike."

A testator bequeathed the residue of his means and estate "to be divided between my surviving brothers and sisters, and the lawful issue of those who may be deceased, share and share alike." Held in a competition between the surviving brother and sisters, and the issue of a brother who was dead when the settlement was made, that the division fell to be made per stirpes, and not per capita.

Gift to nephews and nieces and issue of predeceasing and survivors of them.

A testator directed his trustees to pay the liferent of the residue of his estate to his widow, and on her death to convey and make over one-half of the residue to his nephews and nieces, and to the lawful issue of such of his said nephews and nieces as may have died leaving lawful issue their deceased parents' share equally among them, and failing any of his said nephews and nieces without leaving lawful issue, to the survivors of them equally, whom also failing to their nearest lawful heirs whomsoever. The testator died, survived by his widow and all the beneficiaries called by him. Between his death and the death of the liferentrix three of the beneficiaries died, one without issue, the others both leaving issue. On the death of the liferentrix held (1) that the words of the primary clause imported a division per stirpes among nephews and nieces who had survived the liferentrix and the issue of those who had predeceased, and (2) that the share which would have fallen to the nephew dying without issue, if he had survived the liferentrix, fell to be divided per stirpes among the nephews and nieces of the testator and those grandnephews and grandnieces named or instituted as primary legatees in the settlement who had survived the liferentrix.

Gift to A, B, C, D, and the heirs of E—"Equally between them, share and share alike."

A testator directed his trustees to pay the liferent of the residue of the trust estate to his widow, and on her death "to pay or divide the then free residue of my whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal, to and among" his daughters, M, N, J, and A, "and the heirs of my son, the deceased J, and that equally between them, share and share alike." The testator was survived by his widow and by his four daughters. His son J, who predeceased, left two sons, who survived the testator. Held (1) that the division fell to be made into five equal shares, of which the four daughters each took one, and the "heirs" of the son one.

Residue to relatives named in will—Children entitled only under conditio.

A testator left the residue of his estate to his relatives already mentioned in the will. There was a legacy in favour of B in liferent and to her children in fee; a legacy to C with destination over to his issue; and to D, a relative mentioned in the will, but who predeceased the testator. D's children were not mentioned in the will, but were entitled to her legacy in virtue of the conditio si sine liberis. Held that the children of B and C were entitled to an equal share per capita with the relatives who were entitled to share, but that the children of D were only entitled, among them, to the share which D would have taken on a division per capita, had he survived.

Stewart's Trustees v Stewart, (O.H.) 1917, 2 S.L.T. 267.

Gift to children in life at date of distribution—Destination over to issue of children—Distribution among issue—Double use of terms importing equality.

Testamentary trustees were directed on the death of the last of three liferentices, "to divide the whole estates and effects hereby conveyed, and to pay the free proceeds thereof among and to the whole of my sons and daughters that may then be in life, share and share alike, and failing any of them by death, to any child or children they may have respectively left, also in equal portions." All the testator's children predeceased the last liferentrix, three of them leaving issue, some of whom also predeceased the last liferentrix. Held that the division among the grandchildren fell to be made per stirpes and not per capita.

Direction to divide capital equally among liferenter's children and grandchildren per stirpes—Whether children and grandchildren took concurrently.

Mellis' Trustees v Ritchie, 1909 S.C. 606; 46 S.L.R. 479; 1909, 1 S.L.T. 179. No. 936, infra.

Gift to families—Right of grandchildren.

A testator directed a share of the residue of his estate on failure of certain prior institutes "to go to the survivors of my nephews and nieces or the families of such as may have predeceased." A died without issue. Held that the word "families" included all descendants of nephews and nieces and that the grandchildren of a nephew were entitled to succeed per stirpes to the share which their predeceasing parents would have taken.

Irvine v Irvine, 1873, 11 M. 892; 45 J. 546; 10 S.L.R. 625.

(3) GIFTS TO ISSUE OF LIFERENTERS.

(635)

To children in joint liferent and their issue in fee.

A testator destined a share of his estate to his daughter A in liferent, and after her death to her children in joint liferent, "and to the issue of her said children in fee." By a subsequent codicil he confirmed the destination of A's share to herself and her children in liferent, and provided that the fee "be paid to the lawful issue of her said children, and that equally, share and share alike." In dealing with possible accretions to A's share the testator further provided that the fee of any accreting share should, "as in the case of her, the said A's, own share, be . . . paid equally amongst the issue of her children, and that equally, share and share alike." Held that the fee of A's share, whether original or accreting, was divisible among the issue of A's children equally per capita and not per stirpes.

To children equally in liferent alienably and to their children equally in fee—Preference to sons over daughters to extent of £10 per annum—Direct disposition of heritage.

A testator conveyed his heritable property to and in favour of his children (all of whom were unmarried at his death) nominatim, "in liferent equally during all the days and years of their lifetimes for their liferent uses alienably, and to their lawful children, also equally in fee and property, but always under the preferences provided to my sons and their lawful children over my daughters and their lawful issue as after specified." He directed that after paying certain annuities, &c., the rents of the property should be divided "equally among my children during their respective lives, but each of my sons shall have and be entitled to £10 sterling yearly therefrom more than their equal shares thereof, or than each of my daughters, and which preference of £10 sterling to my sons shall, when the succession to the fee of said heritable subjects takes effect, descend to their children equally, and the same shall be valued accordingly, above the shares thereof due to the children of my daughters: and in case any of my said children die unmarried, or without leaving lawful issue, the shares or share of such shall accrete, and be equally divided among my surviving children in liferent only, and to their lawful issue, equally, in fee and property as aforesaid." In a question between the children of two of the testator's daughters nominated in the deed, held that, on a construction of these clauses of the deed, the division of the heritage fell to be made per stirpes and not per capita.

Allen v Flint, 1886, 13 R. 975; 23 S.L.R. 703.

Liferent to brothers and sisters with fee to issue—Destination over of lapsed share to issue of "other" liferenters.

A testator directed his trustees on the death of his widow to make over and settle his whole estate "in equal shares upon my . . . brother and sisters in liferent . . . allanarly, and the issue of their bodies respectively, whom failing to the issue or survivors or survivor in fee." The testator was survived by his widow, his brother, and his four sisters. The brother and three sisters predeceased the widow, two sisters leaving issue. The remaining sister survived the widow and died without issue. It having been held that the words "survivors and survivor" were equivalent to "others or other," held also that the fee of the share liferented by the last surviving sister fell on her death to be divided among the then surviving issue of the liferenters per stirpes.

Liferents to daughters and their husbands—Liferent of accrescing share to survivors—Fee to be "divided equally amongst their lawful children, share and share alike."

A testator left the residue of his estate to be liferented by three daughters and their husbands equally, the fee of the share liferented by each daughter to go in each case on her death to her issue. In the event of any of the daughters dying without issue, it was provided that the share liferented by her "shall, after the death of her said present or future husband, be held by the said trustees for the liferent use and behoof allanarly of her surviving sisters . . . and failing them or either of them, then the said third part or share shall be divided equally amongst their lawful children, share and share alike, on their respectively attaining majority." One daughter died without issue. Held that, the testator having directed the share of a daughter dying without issue to be liferented by her surviving sisters, the fee fell to be divided among their children per stirpes, and not per capita.

Home's Trustees v Ramsay, 1884, 12 R. 314; 22 S.L.R. 221.

Liferent to two sisters and sister-in-law—One-half of fee to families of sisters.

A testator gave the interest on the residue of his estate equally among his two sisters and a sister-in-law, "the families of the annuitants to get the interest of their mother until the death of the last annuitant," when the residue was to be divided into two parts, one part going to the Free Church, the other to "the families of my two sisters." All three annuitants had families, and the children of the sister-in-law and one of the sisters enjoyed their mother's interest during the survivance of the longest liver of the sisters. On the death of the last annuitant, held that the half of the residue should be divided between the families of the two sisters per stirpes.

Gift in fee to issue of children of testator's brothers—Failing child or children of brother without leaving issue to be applied for children of other brother.

A trustee directed his trustees to divide the residue of his estate into three parts, one of which was to be paid to one of his brothers in the event (which happened) of his surviving him and being then unmarried. The other two parts were to be held for each of his other two brothers in liferent, and for their children also in liferent for their behoof "equally, and share and share alike," the fee to go after their death to the "lawful issue whomsoever of the said child or children of my said brothers respectively, equally and share and share alike." Failing "the child or children of any of" his brothers without leaving lawful issue the share of such child or children was to be applied for behoof of "the child or children surviving of any other brothers, each family succeeding equally." Each of these two brothers of the trustee left several children, and a child of one of them having died without issue, but having two sisters, the share liferented by him was claimed by the family of the trustee's other brother. Held (1) that it did not pass to them, but remained in the family of that child's father; (2) that the liferent of it did not accresce to the two sisters of the deceasing child, but that the fee of it fell at once to their issue per capita and not per stirpes.

10. INTEREST TAKEN BY BENEFICIARY.

(1) WHETHER BEQUEST BENEFICIAL OR IN TRUST.

(a) Generally.

(691)

Appointment of "executor" and "universal intromitter."

By holograph writings a testator appointed one of his nieces to be "executor" and "universal intromitter" with his "goods and money," "except what is otherwise mentioned afterwards" "under the following burdens, to pay my debts, and the following legacies." Held that the executor had been named universal legatary, and was entitled to the residue of the estate.

Jamieson v Clark, 1872, 10 M. 399; 44 J. 225; 9 S.L.R. 233.

(692)

Bequest to "A for behoof of his family."

A testator by his holograph will bequeathed one-fifth share of residue to his brother A "for behoof of his family."

Held (1) that this expression was equivalent to "in trust for his children," and that the beneficial right was in the children only; and (2) that the children being of full age were entitled to immediate payment.

Michie's Executors v Michie, 1905, 7 F. 509; 42 S.L.R. 386; 12 S.L.T. 738.

Bequest to A "for the benefit of herself and of B."

Held that under a bequest "to A for the benefit of herself and of her sister B," each sister had a vested beneficial right in fee to one-half of the bequest, but that A was bound to retain B's share during their joint lives as trustee for her.

Macpherson v Macpherson's Curator Bonis, 1894, 21 R. 386; 31 S.L.R. 271; 1 S.L.T. 449.

Money given to A for behoof of B—Power to dispose of balance not paid in B's lifetime—Uncertainty.

Bequest of income to W for maintenance and education of his children.

By a mutual settlement a husband and wife directed their trustees to apply the annual proceeds of a share of their estate in payment of the premiums on two policies of insurance, the surplus, if any, to be paid to their son W for the education and support of his children. The proceeds of the policies when payable were directed to be paid to the children of W. Held that the bequest of surplus income was a provision in favour of W, not a trust in him for the benefit of his children.

Chalmers' Judicial Factor v Chalmers, 1903, 5 F. 1154; 40 S.L.R. 814; 11 S.L.T. 236.

Bequest of whole estate to wife under obligation of maintaining children — Power of sale.

A testator, who was survived by his wife and a child and also by pupil and minor children of a former marriage, left a will bequeathing to his wife his whole estate, heritable and moveable, and appointing her his sole executrix under the obligation of her bringing up and educating his children, and appointing her sole guardian and curator of his children, and granting her full power of sale of his estate. By a codicil of even date the testator appointed two persons named "to act along with my wife as executors and curators to my said children." Held that a trust was constituted for behoof of her and the children.

Residue to be placed "entirely under control" of daughter.

A holograph letter in the following terms:—"Should any accident occur to me . . . until my will is completed and signed by me that the whole of my property, heritable and moveable, belonging to me in part, or wholly, shall be placed entirely under the control of my daughter, to allocate to the members of my family as she thinks proper, and may be guided (if her pleasure) to consult her brother"—held to import an absolute beneficial right and not to create a trust.

Miller v Miller, (O.H.) 1906, 13 S.L.T. 770.

Trust or substitution.

A testator bequeathed his whole estate, consisting of heritage and moveable property, to his wife "and heirs and assignees, heritably and irredeemably," and proceeded—"But these presents are granted and shall be accepted by the said Elizabeth Walker, and the foresaid lands and other heritages hereby conveyed are disposed with and under the burden of the payment of my whole just and lawful debts, and sickbed and funeral charges, and of the payment of the following legacies, viz.: At my wife's death what she had from me shall go to my nephews and nieces, all to have an equal share. Would like the old house where we were all born to be kept in the family." By a subsequent codicil he provided—"I appoint James Stephen, William Stephen, and David Stephen to be trustees; also my wife Elizabeth Walker. I confirm the above will with the exception that I leave my wife Eliza Walker sole trustee, to use principal of money if she requires it." His wife survived and entered on possession of the estate, but did not make up a title to the heritage. On her death, without disposing of it, held that whether the deed imported a trust or a substitution, the testator's nephews and nieces were entitled to the property in preference to the wife's relations.

Walker's Factor v Cumming, 1899, 37 S.L.R. 115.

(b) Precatory Bequests.

(699)

"I would like."

A wife left a testamentary writing addressed to her husband, bearing—"I wish to leave everything that may be considered mine, money or personal property, entirely at your disposal, knowing that you will do as I wish with it." Then, after directions as to the disposal of her jewels, it proceeded—"I would like you, from the interest of my money, to give R W, J W, and last not least yourself, a handsome remembrance of me, although they should require to wait some time." In an appeal by the husband from a deliverance of the trustee on his sequestrated estate the husband averred that he had received verbal instructions from his wife to divide her separate estate among her own relations. Held that the writing imported an absolute gift to the husband, and did not make him a trustee for carrying out his wife's wishes.

(700)

"Desire"—Erroneous recital in codicil of terms of will.

By his will a testator directed his trustees to pay one-half of the residue of his estate to his son, and to hold the other half for his widow in life and his daughter in fee. By a holograph codicil after erroneously narrating that, "as expressed in my last will and testament that, should my wife survive me she is to be life tenant in whatever means I may be possessed of, and at her death the same to be divided between my son . . . and my daughter . . ." the testator continued, "I wish that to be carried out, but I hereby specially desire, that at the death of my son, should he die without issue, his portion shall pass to my daughter." Circumstances in which held that the expression of "desire" that the son's share should, on his death without issue, pass to his sister, was a mere request, which had no effect in law and did not limit the son's absolute right to his share.

"Desire"—"Should like."

A testator bequeathed his moveable estate to his widow, and stated in his will his "desire" that at her death some part of the estate should go to his brothers' and sisters' families—"In particular, I should like not less than £50 sterling left to" his brother's widow, "and I desire that my wife may make a settlement providing for this." The testator's widow having died intestate, held that her executor was not bound to give effect to the testator's request.

Garden's Executor v More, 1913 S.C. 285; 50 S.L.R. 249; 1912, 2 S.L.T. 422.

"Anxious desire"—"Hope."

A testator bequeathed his moveable estate to his widow, expressing in the testament an "anxious desire," and, in a subsequent writing, a "hope" that she should make a testament bequeathing one-half of the means which might belong to her at her death to certain of his relatives. The testator's widow having died intestate, held that her executor was not bound or entitled to give any effect to the testator's request.

Barclay's Executor v M'Leod, &c., 1880, 7 R. 477; 17 S.L.R. 311.

(703)

"I wish."

A testator by his trust disposition and settlement, dated in 1877, left the residue of his estate to his daughters in life and their children in fee. In a holograph letter by the testator to his trustees the following passage occurred:—"Should a daughter marry, the single one to have at least £600 a year, and balance to go to the married sister. In the event of both being married, then my capital to be equally divided between them. I wish, however, that £200 be paid to Mrs. G S annually during her lifetime, in consideration of her great kindness to me and for her care of my dear children. I do not think they will object to this." Held that the letter contained no valid bequest of an annuity to Mrs. G S, and did not impose any burden of such an annuity on the shares of the daughters.

"I would prefer" construed as "I wish."

A testator left a letter addressed to one of his testamentary trustees containing instructions to pay to a lady "on the first of each month after my death the sum of twelve pounds ten shillings, being at the rate of £150 a year. But in lieu of this I would prefer that as soon as you conveniently can, that the sum of £3000 . . . should be taken from my life insurance funds and paid over to her . . ." Held that the words "I would prefer" were to be construed as "I wish," and were a form of command; and, accordingly, that the trustees were not given a discretion to pay either the monthly payments or the capital sum, but that the bequest must be construed as a bequest of the capital sum, the monthly payments being merely a temporary expedient until the capital sum should be available for payment.

"I authorise you" to make new settlement—Exercise of power to test.

By mutual settlement a husband and wife conveyed their whole estates to the survivor. In the event of his predecease the husband reserved power to test on three-fifths of the funds remaining at the survivor's death. He predeceased the wife, leaving a holograph writing whereby, on the narrative that the funds of the spouses were £5000, and of this £2000 belonged to the wife in her own right, he provided—"I . . . authorise you . . . my wife after my death to make another settlement, and to leave to my relations the following sums of which they will receive after your death." He then enumerated a number of legacies to his relations, amounting to £2770 and dealt with the residue of the £3000. Held that the holograph writing was an exercise of the power to test reserved in the mutual settlement and was binding on the wife, and was not a mere recommendation to the wife to give effect to the husband's wishes.

(2) FEE OR LIFE RENT.

[See FEE AND LIFE RENT.]

(3) WHETHER GIFT TO CONDITIONAL INSTITUTE INDEPENDENT OF GIFT TO INSTITUTE.

(706)

Revocation of gift to institute—Effect on conditional institution.

By trust disposition and settlement a testator bequeathed one-tenth part of the residue of his estate to his niece, A, declaring that, in the event of her dying without leaving lawful issue at the time of the division of his estate, the share to which she would have been entitled should "fall to and devolve upon" B. By a codicil the testator, in respect of A's death, recalled the bequest to her, adding this declaration—"Declaring always that these presents shall noways infer a revocation of my said trust disposition and deed of settlement and codicil, but that the same shall stand in full force with these additions, and alterations thereto." Held that the conditional institution of B was not revoked.

(707)

A father by settlement directed his trustees to hold the residue for behoof of such of his surviving children as should, if sons, attain the age of twenty-five years, or if daughters, attain that age or be earlier married, and for the lawful issue (if any) of such of his children as should die without becoming entitled, equally among said children and issue per stirpes; and upon the surviving daughters attaining twenty-five years, or being married, the trustees were further directed to hold or place with other trustees the shares of such daughters in trust "for their life rent use only, and for the lawful issue of said respective daughters, or failing lawful issue, for their next of kin in fee." Thereafter by certain informal holograph writings he excluded one of his daughters "from any right, title, or interest," in his estate personal or moveable whatsoever. Held (1) that these writings were part of his will; (2) that they were effectual to exclude the daughter from her share of his estate; but (3) that they were ineffectual to exclude her child, as her issue had a separate and independent interest in the testator's estate.

Calder v Millar, 1890, 28 S.L.R. 230.

A lady in her settlement directed her trustee "to invest . . . £200 sterling for behoof of" her brother J L, "and out of the sum so invested to pay" to him £3 per month and "to divide whatever balance is over of the sum so invested equally among" his children, and in the event of his predeceasing "instead of investing the said £200 to divide the same equally among" his children. A codicil written by her own hand after her brother's death bore—"October, 1879, I hereby cancel and annul the legacy bequeathed . . . to J L now deceased, but in all other respects hereby ratify and confirm the foregoing settlement." Then followed another codicil, undated, which bore—"I hereby bequeath to G C and S L my late brother's daughters the sum of £20." Held that the codicils cancelled the contingent legacy in the settlement in favour of J L's children.

(709)

A testator, by his trust disposition and settlement, bequeathed certain legacies and, inter alia—"To my niece, A B, and her heirs the sum of £100 sterling." He directed that "after payment of the above legacies the residue of my estate, if any, shall be disposed of at the discretion of my said trustees." In a codicil he made the following statement:—"My niece, A B, having died, the legacy to her has lapsed." Held that the codicil showed that the testator regarded the legacy to A B as extinguished, and accordingly that it did not pass to A B's heirs as conditional institutes, but fell into residue.

Davidson v Christie, (O.H.) 1895, 3 S.L.T. 126.

(710)

Where a legacy left to A with a destination over to family of A was subsequently revoked by a codicil, question whether the revocation by codicil also revoked the conditional institution of the family.

Stewart's Trustees v Stewart, (O.H.) 1917, 2 S.L.T. 267.

(711)

Bequest to children of A excluding one child otherwise provided for—Right of issue of excluded child.

Alexander Macfarlane senior, who died in 1863, directed his trustees, after the decease of the longest liver of himself and his wife, and upon the death of the longest liver of his son Alexander Macfarlane junior and his wife, to divide certain shares of his estate among Alexander Macfarlane junior's children, excluding Alexander Macfarlane tertius. He also provided that should grandchildren predeceasing the term of payment leave issue, then such issue shall be entitled to their parent's share. Alexander Macfarlane junior was survived by four children, but only one of them, Robert, survived the period of vesting. Held that the exclusion of Alexander Macfarlane tertius excluded his child from all participation in the bequest of the three shares.

Macfarlane's Trustees v Macfarlane, 1906, 8 F. 787; 43 S.L.R. 494; 13 S.L.T. 915.

Institute in debt to testator.

A testator directed his trustees to accumulate one-third of the income of his estate for behoof of B, and to pay the remaining two-thirds to C. If either B or C died without issue before B attained the age of twenty-five the share of the predeceaser was to accrete to the survivor. C died before B attained the age of twenty-five, and died within a year of the death of the testator. He owed the testator a sum in excess of the amount of income which accrued prior to his death. Held that the legacy to C must be imputed pro tanto in extinction of his debt.

Paris' Trustees v Gow, 1870, 8 S.L.R. 184.

Direction to pay legacies to sons at majority—Application to conditional institution of issue.

A testator, by the fifth purpose of his settlement, directed his trustees to divide the residue of his estate among his children, in the case of sons, on their attaining majority, vesting being postponed till then, and there being directions as to further postponement. Held that the clauses postponing payment until a son attained majority did not apply to a destination over in favour of the son's issue.

Power to invest legacy under conditions—Application to conditional institution.

A testator left a legacy of £1500 to a married niece who was of unsound mind, adding—"This legacy may be paid" to the husband of the niece, "or invested for behoof of their children, and under such conditions as shall to my trustees appear most for their benefit." Held that the discretionary power given to the trustees applied only to the legacy in favour of the mother, and that the sons were entitled to unconditional payment.

Power to restrict beneficiary's interest and invest for issue—Destination over to issue subject to restrictions—Vesting in issue free from restrictions.

By his trust disposition a testator left a legacy of £1500 to a married niece who was of unsound mind, adding, "This legacy may be paid" to the husband of the niece, "or invested for behoof of their children, and under such conditions as shall to my trustees appear most for their benefit." The testator also bequeathed legacies to other nephews and nieces, and declared that the whole legacies should only become payable after his death and the death of his wife, and that the lawful issue of any of the legatees predeceasing the longest liver of himself and his wife should succeed to their parents' share in equal portions, and also that the share of any of them predeceasing the testator and his wife without lawful issue should fall into residue. The testator's niece survived him, but predeceased his widow, leaving two sons. After the death of the testator's widow his trustees executed a minute, by which they restricted the sons' interest in the legacy to an alimentary life-rent, with a testamentary power of disposal of the fee. Held that on a construction of the deed the legacy vested in the sons as conditional institutes on the death of the testator's widow.

Liferent to testator's widow—Power to trustees to pay fee to son—If son marry and fee not paid to him, liferent to son and his wife with fee to issue—Son predeceasing testator's widow.

A testator granted his widow the liferent of the residue of his estate, and gave his trustees, on her death, a discretionary power to pay the whole or any part of the residue to his only son, and, in the event of his son marrying, he directed them, "should they not have deemed it prudent to hand over" the residue to him absolutely, to hold or to convey the residue in trust for the spouses in conjunct liferent, and their issue in fee, "such conveyance to be made in such terms and under such conditions, provisions, and declarations, as my trustees in their discretion may think proper," and in the event of the trustees not paying over the residue to the son, or to or for behoof of him and his widow and children, they were directed to apply it for charitable purposes. The son married during the life of the testator's widow, but predeceased her, leaving a widow but no children. Held that the provision conceived in favour of the son's wife and children was not conditional on the son surviving the testator's widow.

Accreting share—Limitation of rights of institute—Application to conditional institute.

A trustor directed his trustees to realise his whole estate and "divide" it amongst his children, the daughters' shares being limited to a liferent, with a gift of fee to their children. With reference to the daughters' shares, it was further provided, "if no children, then in that case her share shall revert and be divided, share and share alike, among my other children." A daughter having died unmarried, held that the share liferented by her was to be conveyed absolutely to her brothers and sisters, without any restriction of the latter to a liferent, as in the case of the shares falling to them directly.

- (1) DIRECTIONS TO CONVEY OR TO SETTLE PROPERTY.

(719)

Whether direction imported conditional institution or substitution.

A testator by his trust disposition and settlement conveyed his whole estates, heritable and moveable, to trustees, directing them after his death to convey certain lands named "to Gavin, my youngest son, whom failing to his lawful issue equally among them." Gavin survived his father. The trustees conveyed the lands "to Gavin whom failing to his children equally among them whom failing to his heirs and assignees whomsoever." The disposition was recorded on behalf of Gavin. He died intestate, survived by two sons. In a competition between the sons, held (1) that the provisions of the trust disposition and settlement imported a conditional institution and not a substitution; (2) that the destination inserted in the conveyance of the trustees was unauthorised and had no effect; and (3) that Gavin's elder son as his heir at law was entitled to the whole lands.

Marshall v Marshall, 1900, 2 F. 1023; 37 S.L.R. 775; 8 S.L.T. 64.

To convey with heritable destination.

A testator directed his trustees to hold heritage for his widow in liferent and on her death to convey it to G B, "whom failing to the heirs of his body, whom failing to my own heirs-male and the heirs of their body, whom failing to my own nearest heirs whomsoever excluding heir-portioners." When the testator died G B was her heir-male, but he predeceased the widow without issue. Held that the heir-male was to be ascertained at the death of the widow (per Lord President Dunedin and Lord Kinnear), because the trustees were bound to insert in their deed of conveyance the destination in the trust disposition and settlement and a destination of heritage in such terms meant that the heir called on the failure of the institute was to be ascertained at the opening of the succession.

Direction to settle daughters' shares.

A testator directed his trustees to retain the residue of his estate for his children equally, the shares of each to be payable at the first term after the youngest should attain majority, but directed, inter alia, that on the marriage of his daughters a certain proportion should be settled on them in liferent and the children of their marriage in fee. At the time of division one daughter was a widow with children. Held that the trustees were bound to settle the proportions, not in the precise words of the direction, which would have given her the fee, but in such a way as to secure the fee to her children, giving her a liferent allanarly.

(724)

Direction to entail—Definition of executory trust.

When a testator directs his trustees to make a valid entail of lands such an express trust will not be impaired by a specific direction to insert clauses which taken alone would be inadequate for that purpose. But when a trustee confers no power to make an entail and the trustees are directed to carry out the intention of the trustor by a definite method they must conform their action exactly to the directions so given even although it may be apparent that the testator had some object in view which cannot be effectually attained by the methods prescribed.

A testator by his will directed his trustees to divide his estate into as many shares as he had children, and to invest his daughters' share in heritable securities taking the title to them in liferent only, and their children in fee. Held that the daughters had a bare liferent of their shares and had no interest in the fee.

To make over to parent in liferent and his children in fee.

A testator by holograph will directed his trustees "to make over" certain heritable properties to his eldest son "with the burden upon them of thirty pounds sterling to his two oldest children of his first marriage during his lifetime, and at his death so as to equally divide amongst his other children." Held that the testator had expressed his intention that his son should have a liferent only, and had directed his trustees to take the necessary steps to carry this into effect, and accordingly that the trustees were bound to execute a conveyance of the property in favour of the son for his liferent only and of his children (other than the two eldest) in fee.

Direction to settle daughter's property on marriage—Daughter marrying in testator's lifetime.

A testator directed his trustees to set aside one-third of his estate for his daughter, and he further directed that in the event of her marriage her property should be settled on herself in liferent and her family in fee. Held that the direction to the testamentary trustees to settle the daughter's share on her marriage applied only to the event of the daughter marrying after the testator's death.

(730)

Direction to settle daughters' share by antenuptial contract—Application to daughters married at date of will—Impossibility of literal fulfilment.

A testator directed his trustees to realise and divide the residue of his estate among his children equally, "declaring . . . that the term of the vesting of the foregoing provisions of residue shall, as regards daughters, be on their respectively attaining majority or being married, whichever of these events shall happen first: As regards said provisions to my daughters, I hereby appoint that the capital of the same shall not be paid to them (except as after mentioned), but that my trustees shall pay to my daughters the revenue of their respective provisions while they remain unmarried, and on their marriage my trustees shall see to it that the said provisions, both revenue and capital, be secured in trust . . . by antenuptial settlement upon my daughters and their children to be born . . . Further, notwithstanding what is before written, my trustees shall have power on the marriage of such daughter to pay to her, or to pay to any daughter already married at my death, for her own absolute use, such portion (not exceeding one-tenth part) of the capital of her provision as my trustees shall think proper." The testator was survived by two married daughters, whose marriages took place before the date of the settlement. Held that the testator's intention that the shares of the daughters, married as well as unmarried, should be secured to them and their children being sufficiently plain, that intention was not to be defeated simply because he had indicated a method of carrying out his wishes which was not precisely applicable to every case, and that the trustees were bound (subject to the power to advance) to settle the shares of daughters, married at the date of the testator's death, in trust in names of the trustees or of other trustees for the daughters' behoof in liferent and otherwise as directed by the testator.

Power to restrict beneficiary's interest to alimentary lifeferent—Partial payment without exercise of power—Arrestment by beneficiary's creditors—Subsequent exercise of power.

A testator directed his trustees to hold the residue of his estate for behoof of his children equally among them, "with and under the exceptions and modifications to be afterwards stated." The shares of residue were made payable six months after the testator's decease to those children that were major, and they were declared to vest at the testator's death in those children that survived him. There then followed a provision that, "notwithstanding the periods above appointed for the payment of the shares of the residue," the trustees should have power to restrict the right of the children to a lifeferent, and settle the fee of their shares on their issue under such condition as the trustees should deem expedient. The trustees made payments to account of his share to J C, a son of the testator, but the balance of his share was arrested in their hands by certain of his creditors, who subsequently brought a furthcoming. At the date of the arrestment the trustees had formed no resolution to postpone the payment to J C of the balance of his share of residue, but in their answers to the action of furthcoming they announced their resolution to postpone the payment of the residue to J C, and to apply the annual proceeds thereof for his aliment, and thereafter they executed a deed of trust restricting his right to a lifeferent, and settling the fee on his children. Held that, although prior to the arrestment the legatee had a vested right to the fund in the trustees' hands, it remained subject to the power conferred by the deed upon the trustees, and that their right to exercise the power was in no way affected by the arrestment, which could only attach the legatee's right tantum et tale as it stood in him, and that the trustees had validly exercised the power.

Power to retain share—Exercise of power—No formal minute—Presumption.

A testator directed his trustees to divide the residue of his estate among his children on their attaining majority, and provided that the capital of one-half of the sons' share should not be payable until they respectively attained twenty-five. Power was conferred on the trustees to pay any part of the capital of the said half after the sons had attained majority, and also to withhold payment of the capital after the sons had attained twenty-five. One of the sons survived the father and died two years after attaining twenty-five without having received payment of the whole of his half share of residue. The trustees had not recorded any minute determining to exercise the power to withhold payment. Held that in retaining the portion of one-half-share it must be presumed that the trustees had acted in exercise of the power conferred on them, and there being no evidence to the contrary, that the power had been validly exercised.

Discretionary power to retain.

By his settlement a testator directed his trustees to realise his whole estate "and thereafter (subject always to the discretionary power vested in my trustees hereinafter mentioned) to divide" the proceeds equally among his children and the issue of predeceasers. There followed a declaration that "notwithstanding the power of division above mentioned" the trustees should have an absolute discretionary power to retain any of the shares, and to pay over only the annual income, and to pay the capital at such times and by such instalments as they might determine; and a further special declaration "that the whole provisions hereunder in favour of my son J W are purely and strictly alimentary, and the same shall not be attachable by the debts or deeds of the said J W, nor attachable by the diligence of his creditors," and that any share retained by the trustees under their discretionary power should be subject to this declaration. There was no ulterior destination of the shares of residue. In a special case the trustees stated that they were prepared to hand over J W's share to him if they had power to do so, and that they saw no reason to exercise their discretionary power. Held that under the direction to divide the estate among the children a right of fee was conferred on J W which was not withdrawn by the subsequent declarations.

Power to apportion, exclude, or restrict right of beneficiaries—Exercise of power.

By his trust disposition and settlement a testator directed his trustees to hold a specified share of his estate for behoof of the children of his deceased brother James, to apply the income for their benefit until the youngest should attain majority, and on the youngest attaining majority, to pay over the capital to the children then surviving in equal shares. By a codicil, the testator altered this bequest and conferred the following discretionary powers on his trustees:— (1) A power to apportion the share among the children; (2) a power to exclude any child; and (3) a power, "if they see cause, in place of paying over to one or more of the said children the share or shares which the trustees may apportion to them, . . . to retain the same under their trust for behoof of such child or children, either during their lifetime or during such period as they consider necessary, my intention with regard to the said share of residue falling to the children of my said brother, and interest thereof, being to give my trustees the same powers in apportioning, withholding, or dealing with the same, or interest thereof, as I could have myself were I in life, and the children of my said brother nor their issue shall have no vested interest in the provisions in their favour contained in my said settlement and this codicil, but shall be in the matter of the said provisions entirely under the control of my trustees." The trustees by minute "apportioned and set apart" for Alexander, one of James's children, a specified sum, but resolved that the same should be invested for his behoof, and the annual income or interest should be paid over to him half-yearly, or at such other period as the trustees might fix from time to time. Held, on a construction of the settlement and codicil, and of the trustees' minute, that the fee of the share of the testator's estate, by the minute apportioned and set apart for Alexander, vested in him and fell to be applied in terms of his settlement.

(741)

Power to postpone payment, apply interest, and settle fee.

A testator empowered his trustees to postpone payment of the shares of all or any of his children beyond the period of payment, and to apply the interest on said shares during the period of postponement for behoof of said child or children, and authorised them to settle the fee of such shares on said child or children or their issue on such conditions as they might deem most expedient.

Held that the trustees had power to restrict the interest of a child to a life interest and settle the fee upon his issue, but such power must be exercised before the beneficiary reached majority.

Obligation to maintain testator's children—Separate residence of child.

A trustor directed his trustees to pay to his wife, if she survived him, a certain annuity, and to permit her to have the occupation during her lifetime of a dwelling-house and the use of the furniture therein, declaring that she "shall out of the foresaid provisions educate and maintain my children . . . in a way befitting their station in life, until they shall respectively attain the age of twenty-one years or, if daughters, be married." He was survived by his wife and by several sons and daughters of that and of a prior marriage. The settlement left undisposed of part of the income and most of the capital of his estate, which was of considerable amount. Held that one of the daughters of the first marriage, who was over twenty-one years of age and desired to live apart from the widow, was not entitled under the settlement to a separate maintenance out of the widow's annuity, it being sufficient implement of the widow's obligation that she offered to maintain the daughter in family with her in the dwelling-house left by the trustor.

A testatrix, who lived in America, bequeathed the residue of her estate to G A

"of Scotland, who I wish to divide what falls to him with my relatives of like degree in Scotland living at the date of my death." Held that a relative in the same degree of relationship to the testatrix as G A, whose home and ordinary residence was in Australia, but who happened to be in Scotland on a visit at the time of the death of the testatrix, was not entitled to participate in the bequest.

Argo v Elmslie, 1905, 8 F. 67; 43 S.L.R. 23; 13 S.L.T. 480.

"Provision" held to mean "provisions."

A declaration in a trust disposition and settlement that "the foregoing provision in favour of my said son shall be accepted and held by him in full satisfaction of his claim of legitim," held (notwithstanding the use of the word "provision" in the singular) to apply to the whole provisions in favour of the son contained in both the trust disposition and a subsequent codicil.

(760)

"Real security."

Held that an English will authorizing investments on "real security" authorised investment on a railway mortgage.

Direction to sell heritage if bond called up—Part of bond called up and replaced.

In the event of a bond over a heritable subject which, "if not sold as after-mentioned," was settled on a certain series of heirs, being called up prior to the date appointed for conveyance, the subject was directed to be sold, and the balance of the proceeds divided among a different set of beneficiaries. Held that the calling up of part of the loan, which was provided for by assigning to a new lender, did not entail a sale or entitle the second set of beneficiaries to claim.

Bryson's Trustees v Clark, 1880, 8 R. 142; 18 S.L.R. 103.

(762)

"Sale or mortgage"—Granting trust deed.

Chaplin's Trustee v Hoile, 1891, 19 R. 237; 29 S.L.R. 190, No. 1211, infra.

"Term of payment"—Heritage.

A testator directed his trustees to convey certain heritable subjects to certain of his children and to divide the residue of his estate, subject to a declaration in case any of his children should predecease "the term of payment of their provisions." Held that this declaration applied to the provisions of heritage.

Muirhead v Muirhead, 1890, 17 R. (H.L.) 45; 15 App.Cas. 289; 27 S.L.R. 917.

X. ADMISSIBILITY OF EXTRINSIC EVIDENCE.

1. WITH REFERENCE TO VALIDITY OF TESTAMENTARY WRITING.

(764)

Unsubscribed document.

Held that a document that was not subscribed could not receive effect as a will, and that no evidence was admissible to set it up.

Foley v Costello, 1904, 6 F. 365; 41 S.L.R. 286; 11 S.L.T. 660.

Holograph writing—Proof of grantor's intention.

In an action of declarator that a holograph writing was a valid settlement, held that proof that the writer did not regard it as such, but regarded it only as an instruction to his law agent to draw a formal will was incompetent, and that the only competent inquiry was whether or not it was holograph of the deceased.

Robb's Trustees v Robb, 1872, 10 M. 692; 44 J. 383; 9 S.L.R. 454.

(766)

Pencil alterations on a will.

Unsigned pencil alterations made by a testator on his testament written in ink will be presumed to be 'deliberative merely, but if there is evidence, parole or otherwise, to show that he intended them to be final, they will receive effect.

Lamont v Magistrates of Glasgow, 1887, 14 R. 603; 24 S.L.R. 426.

[See also Pattison's Trustees v University of Edinburgh, (O.H.) 1888, 16 R. 73. Writ, No. 163.]

2. IN QUESTIONS OF REVOCATION.

(767)

Holograph memorandum dated one day earlier than will—Memorandum referring to will of even date.

(768)

Mutual settlement between sisters—Funds subsequently invested with special destination—Proof that investments not authorised by testators.

(769)

Testator destroying will containing clause of revocation—Earlier will in existence at date of death—Action for declarator that he died intestate.

A testator, who had executed a will in 1878, executed another will in 1885, by which he revoked all previous testamentary writings. He retained the will of 1885 in his possession, and subsequently destroyed it animo revocandi. At the time when that will was being prepared by his law agents he sent them the will of 1878, with a note of the alterations required for the new will, and the will of 1878 was still in their possession at the time of his death. In an action at the instance of the testator's heir for declarator that the will of 1878 was not operative as a testamentary writing, the pursuer averred, inter alia, that the testator believed that that will had been destroyed, and that, when he destroyed the later will, he believed he was annulling the only deed which regulated his succession. The pursuer also averred that the testator had stated that he was leaving no will, and that his property would devolve upon the pursuer or her son. The Court allowed a proof before answer.

Re-execution of will—Effect on intervening codicil.

A testatrix, by her will dated 13th January, 1904, directed her trustees to pay the income of a sum of £5000 to her daughter; and on the daughter's death to pay £500 thereof to a grand-daughter and "to pay a further sum of £1500 thereof in the manner directed by me in any writing or writings to be hereafter executed by me." The will contained a clause revoking "all previous writings." The testatrix left no writing subsequent to 13th January, 1904, but there was found in her repositories a holograph document by which she bequeathed the £500 to certain beneficiaries. The will of 13th January, 1904, was in its main provisions the same as a previous will executed on 16th December, 1903, but contained certain alterations, one of them being the provision with regard to the £1500 which did not appear in the previous will. Held that extrinsic evidence (consisting mainly of a correspondence between the testatrix and her law agents) was not admissible for the purpose of establishing that, notwithstanding the clause of revocation in the later will, the testatrix intended the document of 21st December to form part of the testamentary writings.

No express clause of revocation — Effect on codicil to earlier will.

(772)

Re-execution of codicil — Erroneous belief that first codicil badly executed.

Stirling Stuart v Stirling Crawford's Trustees, 1885, 12 R. 610; 22 S.L.R. 391, No. 373, supra.

(773)

Cancellation—Proof of animus revocandi—Unsigned writings holograph of testator.

In a question as to whether portions of a holograph testamentary paper which had been scored out in pencil had been deleted by the testator animo revocandi, held that it was competent to look at unsigned and undated pencil writings which were holograph of the testator.

Lamont v Magistrates of Glasgow, 1887, 14 R. 603; 24 S.L.R. 426.

[See also Pattison's Trustees v University of Edinburgh, (O.H.) 1888, 16 R. 73. Writ, No. 168.]

(774)

Cancelling trust disposition and settlement —Proof prout de jure that deed destroyed by authority of testator.

[Cf. Leckie v Leckie, &c., 1884, 11 R. 1088; 21 S.L.R. 737. EVIDENCE, No. 346.]

Implied revocation of will by birth of child —Extrinsic evidence to negative—Presumption.

At the date of making his will, a testator had one child in existence. Subsequently another child was born. In an action at the instance of the second child for reduction of the testator's trust disposition and settlement, the trustee averred an express declaration by the testator that the will should stand. Parole evidence allowed to prove the trustee's averments.

Chrystal v Mackinlay, (O.H.) 1919, 1 S.L.T. 250.

3. IN RELATION TO EVACUATION OF SPECIAL DESTINATIONS.

(776)

Evacuation of special destinations by general disposition.

Observations (per Lord Selborne (Lord Chancellor) and Lord Colonsay) as to the admissibility of extrinsic evidence.

Opinions on the competency of a proof of facts and circumstances to show that the granter of a general disposition did not intend to include in the conveyance an estate which he held under an entail, of which the fetters did not apply to him.

Thoms v Thoms, 1863, 6 M. 704; 40 J. 364; 5 S.L.R. 418.

(778)

Observations (per Lord Selborne (Lord Chancellor) Lord Hatherley, and Lord Blackburn) on the difference between the law of Scotland and the law of England with regard to the admissibility of extrinsic evidence.

Campbell v Campbell, 1880, 7 R. (H.L.) 100; 5 App.Cas. 787; 17 S.L.R. 807.

It is a question of intention whether an estate which has been disentailed but which still stands on the tailzied destination is carried by a general disposition granted by the heir in possession. Observations (per Lord President Inglis) to the effect that the relation which the granter of the deed bears to the estate in question, the condition of the parties interested in the previous settlement of the estate, and their relation to the granter of the deed, and, above all, the mode in which the granter of the deed has dealt with the estate which is said to be conveyed in other deeds and transactions regarding that estate, and also the way in which she has dealt with her succession generally, if the general disposition is a disposition intended to settle the affairs of the trustor, are fair elements for consideration in dealing with this question of intention.

—Admissibility of revoked general disposition.

Question whether, in considering whether a special destination was evacuated by a general disposition it was competent to look at a revoked general disposition by which the special destination was evacuated.

Currie v M'Lennan, 1899, 1 F. 684; 36 S.L.R. 494.

—Deeds executed by testator — Inter vivos deeds.

In the construction of a settlement containing a general conveyance of the granter's whole heritage held that it was competent to refer to other deeds executed by the granter with reference to his heritage, though not testamentary, as evidence that it was not the granter's intention to include in the conveyance lands held under an invalid entail.

Catton v Mackenzie, 1870, 8 M. 1049; 42 J. 618; 7 S.L.R. 687.

[Held in the House of Lords that the entail was valid, 1872, 10 M. (H.L.) 12; L.R., 2 H.L. Sc. 202; 44 J. 191; 9 S.L.R. 425.]

(782)

—Destination in moveable bond—Proof of authority to make investment.

Mutual settlement—Fund subsequently re-invested on special destination—Proof that investments not authorised by testator.

Two sisters executed a mutual disposition and settlement, giving their whole property each to the other in liferent and to certain beneficiaries in fee, but reserving power to each to alter during their respective lives. Thereafter their whole funds were reinvested under the superintendence of two friends, and the new investments were taken in terms such as to confer an absolute title of property in the survivor. The surviving sister left a new settlement, conveying her whole means to trustees. Held (1) that it was competent to prove by parole evidence that the sisters had given no authority to change the terms of the investments; and (2) upon proof that no such authority had been given, that the predeceasing sister's property still remained under the operation of the mutual settlement.

Renton's Trustees v Alison, 1876, 3 R. 1142; 13 S.L.R. 696.

4. IN RELATION TO CONDITIO SI TESTATOR SINE LIBERIS DECES- SERIT.

(784)

Facts and circumstances showing intention of testator.

5. TO AID CONSTRUCTION OF TESTA- MENTARY WRITINGS.

(785)

Testator's circumstances as at date of will.

Subsequent to the date of making his will a testator changed the character of a considerable portion of his estate from moveable to heritable with the result that there was intestacy quoad part of his heritage and insufficiency of moveable residue to meet certain legacies directed to be paid out of it. Held that a testator's intention must be ascertained by a construction of his will, which speaks as at his death, and not from a consideration of the state of his affairs as at the date of his will, and from his presumed intentions as at that date.

Boyd v Boyd's Trustees, (O.H.) 1906, 13 S.L.T. 875.

(786)

—Expressions of intention — Memoranda.

In the construction of a will and codicils, the Court is entitled to have regard to the state of the testator's circumstances at the dates when they were written, but not to indications of intention appearing in jottings or memoranda by him.

Trustees of the Free Church of Scotland v Maitland, 1887, 14 R. 333; 24 S.L.R. 290.

See also Craw's Trustees v Blacklock, 1920 S.C. 22; 57 S.L.R. 20; 1919, 2 S.L.T. 231, No. 470, supra.

(787)

Revoked trust disposition.

Question, whether, in construing a holograph will, it was competent to look at a prior trust disposition and settlement, prepared by a law agent, which had been expressly revoked.

Maclean v Maclean, 1891, 18 R. 874; 28 S.L.R. 656.

Instructions to prepare will—Writings subsequent to date of will.

In a case where the question was whether a heritable estate was carried by a gift of residue, observed (1) that instructions to prepare a mortis causa deed are not admissible in construing the deed as evidence of the testator's intention; but (2) that deeds and holograph writings made subsequently are admissible.

(789)

Letter written by testator.

A letter, which, if extrinsic, must have been rejected, was admitted as testamentary.

Ritchie v Whish, &c., 1880, 8 R. 101; 18 S.L.R. 81.

(790)

Subsequent to date of settlement.

Question (per Lord Colonsay), whether a letter written by a testator subsequent to the date of his settlement may be referred to as extrinsic evidence in its construction.

Unauthenticated holograph marginal addition.

Opinions (per Lord Young and Lord Craighill) that an unauthenticated holograph marginal addition could not be admitted to qualify the terms of a holograph document.

Ambiguity in designation of beneficiary.

Where there is an ambiguity as to the identity of the party to whom a testator has bequeathed a legacy, the fact that the description of one only of the claimants corresponds exactly with the description of the legatee given by the testator does not per se conclude the question in favour of that claimant, and does not preclude inquiry into the question whether another claimant, whose description does not exactly correspond, may not be the legatee intended by the testator; but there is a strong presumption in favour of the party exactly described which cannot be overcome except by cogent positive evidence. A Scotsman, living in Scotland, left, among other legacies to charities, all of which were Scottish, a legacy to "The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children." In a competition between "The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children," a society working in England, and "The Scottish National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children," a society working in Scotland, held that the legacy fell to be paid to the English society in the absence of clear proof that the testator intended that it should go to the Scottish society.

Direction to entail—Construction of destination—Reference to prior deeds related to that under construction.

A testator directed his trustees to entail lands on A and his heirs whatsoever, whom failing other substitutes. Observed (per Lord Watson) that in the ordinary case it was incompetent to refer to other deeds executed by the testator with a view to showing that he used the phrase "heirs whatsoever" in the sense of "heirs whatsoever of the body," but that the earlier deeds might be so closely connected with the latter as to let in the reference.

Incidence of burdens—Special legacy of heritable subjects—Heritable security in excess of value of subjects—Bond destroyed by testator.

By a codicil a testator conveyed his house and grounds of L to his sister-in-law in liferent allenerly and her daughter in fee. The house and grounds were burdened by a bond for £4000. The beneficiaries under the codicil brought an action against the trustees of the testator for declarator that the sum in the bond fell to be deducted from the moveable estate. The pursuers averred that the bond had been granted by the deceased without any request on the part of the creditor; that although it had been recorded in the Register of Sasines, it remained in the testator's own hands, and was not intended to be acted on except in the event of his bankruptcy; and that the testator had destroyed the bond in the belief that it was thereby rendered inoperative. The pursuers further averred that the sum in the bond exceeded the value of the property by £1000, and that the testator intended them to have the property disburdened of the bond. Held that the pursuers' averments were irrelevant.

Brand v Scott's Trustees, 1892, 19 R. 768; 29 S.L.R. 641.

6. WITH REFERENCE TO SATISFACTION OF LEGACIES AND PROVISIONS.

(795)

Satisfaction of marriage contract obligation by testamentary provision—Testator leaving "legacy" to daughter—Competency of proving that he intended a "provision."

Johnstone v Haviland, 1896, 23 R. (H.L.) 6; [1896] A.C. 95; 33 S.L.R. 511; 3 S.L.T. 279, No. 846, infra.

(796)
Satisfaction of legacy by payments in testator's lifetime—Evidence to prove legatee's knowledge of terms of will.

M'Laren v Howie, 1869, 8 M. 106; 42 J. 52; 7 S.L.R. 56, No. 859, infra.

XI. LEGACIES.

[See also REVENUE VII. 1.]

1. CLASSIFICATION.

(797)
General or specific legacy—Stock—Shares.

By his trust disposition and settlement a testator directed his trustees "to transfer" to the A C Curling Club "two five per cent. guaranteed shares of £100 each of the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co." No part of the capital of the railway company consisted of guaranteed shares of £100 each, but the testator held £460 ordinary stock, £310 preference consolidated stock, and £70 perpetual guaranteed stock, interest at the rate of five per cent. being payable on the two latter stocks. Held that the bequest was not a specific legacy, but a legacy of such sum as might be required at the date of the testator's death to purchase the stock described in the will.

Barr's Trustees v Ardrossan Castle Curling Club, 1901, 3 F. 903; 38 S.L.R. 658; 9 S.L.T. 84.

Sum of money in hands of legatee.

By a general disposition and settlement a testatrix bequeathed her whole estate to her daughter F "with the exception of £300 sterling of mine which my son A has invested for me, and which I do hereby leave and bequeath to himself." At the date of the settlement A had in his possession a sum of £300 belonging to his mother on which he paid interest. Held that the legacy to A was a specific legacy of £300 in his hands at the date of the settlement.

Maclean v Maclean's Executrix, 1908 S.C. 838; 45 S.L.R. 672; 16 S.L.T. 38.

Debt due to testator.

A testator bequeathed to his nephew A "the £100 due to me from A H (whose security the said A holds), also the two endowment policies of £100 each with profits due on the said policies." The two policies (both on H's life) had been assigned to the testator merely in security of the debt. Held that the legacy was a specific legacy of the debt due by H.

Proceeds of policy of insurance.

A testator directed his trustees to keep up a policy of insurance for £4000 which he had taken in his own name on the life of his wife, and on her death to divide the proceeds equally among his children then alive and the issue of predeceasers. Held that the legacy was a specific legacy.

Davidson's Trustees v Davidson, 1901, 4 F. 107; 39 S.L.R. 106; 9 S.L.T. 253.

Deposit receipt.

A testatrix addressed a letter to her law agent which contained the following testamentary direction:—"I empower you to uplift the deposit receipt lying with you for £4000, to lodge it in your own name, and to hold it in trust for my mother's brothers and sister and for their children." Held that this legacy was a specific legacy of the sum contained in the deposit receipt.

Anderson v Thomson, 1877, 4 R. 1101; 14 S.L.R. 654.

Sum of £2000 or fund held by trustees.

L, who died in 1896, by her settlement directed her trustees—"With respect to the disposal of £2000 in which I am liferented under the will of my late uncle A, and of which I consider I am entitled to dispose, I direct that the said sum or so much thereof as may remain at my death shall be divided equally among" certain legatees. L had become entitled to the fee of the residue of Dr. A's estate, and in 1881 Dr. A's trustees had made over said residue to L except two ground annuals which they retained with L's consent to meet her liferent, the minute bearing that as the then value of the ground was in excess of £2000 the surplus was to be at L's disposal. At L's death the ground annuals had further increased in value. Held that on a sound construction of L's settlement the bequest was limited to the sum of £2000, the surplus value of the ground annuals falling into residue.

Demonstrative legacies.

Question, whether a direction to pay a legacy out of a particular residue rendered the legacy a demonstrative legacy.

Chivas' Trustee v M'Leod, 1881, 9 R. 86; 19 S.L.R. 49.

(804)
Demonstrative or specific legacy—Legacies to be paid out of fund of uncertain amount.

Held that legacies directed to be paid out of arrears of interest due to the testator, the amounts of which were uncertain, were general legacies, the direction as to the source of payment being demonstrative not taxative.

Douglas's Executors, 1869, 7 M. 504; 41 J. 268; 6 S.L.R. 324.

(805)
Sum payable out of life insurance funds.

A testator left a letter addressed to one of his testamentary trustees containing instructions to pay to a lady "on the first of each month after my death the sum of twelve pounds ten shillings, being at the rate of £150 a year. But in lieu of this I would prefer that as soon as you conveniently can, that the sum of £3000 . . . should be taken from my life insurance funds and paid over to her . . . I had hoped to make this bequest from another source, but have found it impracticable." The life insurance policy being burdened with securities, the life insurance funds were insufficient to pay the legacy in full. Held that the bequest of £3000 fell to be paid in full, the reference to the life insurance funds being demonstrative and not taxative.

—Sum received from estate of husband.

A testatrix directed her trustees "to divide the sum of £400 which I received from the estate of my late husband" equally between her children. Held that this constituted a demonstrative and not a specific legacy.

M'Kenzie v Barker's Trustees, (O.H.) 1905, 13 S.L.T. 501.

(807)

—Alleged specific legacy occurring in residue clause.

A testatrix directed her trustees "to hold the . . . residue . . . of my estates (and without prejudice to the said generality, all real property and mortgages over real and personal property in Demerara or elsewhere)" in trust for behoof of her husband. Held that this did not constitute a specific bequest of the property in Demerara of the class described.

M'Kenzie v Barker's Trustees, (O.H.) 1905, 13 S.L.T. 501.

(808)

The holograph will of a testatrix, after providing for payment of a number of pecuniary legacies, contained the following clause:—"Fifty pounds to each of my executors, and the residue, with all right to and interest in the monies due to me from my late aunt A W's estate to be given to L." Held that the testatrix had not bequeathed to L a specific legacy of her interest in A W's estate, but only, subject to payment of all legacies, the residue of her own estate, including therein her interest in A W's estate.

Fraser's Executor v Dickinson, (O.H.) 1905, 13 S.L.T. 435.

(809)

—Bequest of whole estate in Scotland.

Held that a bequest by a person who had property both in America and Scotland, of "all I have or may be entitled to in Scotland," to a beneficiary named, was not a special legacy, and that the Scottish estate was liable for his debts, rateably along with the rest of his property.

Flowerdew v Lowson, 1874, 12 S.L.R. 65.

2. ADEMPMENT OF SPECIFIC LEGACIES.

(810)

Specific bequest of heritage—Sale of subject under statutory powers—Sale not completed at testator's death.

A testator directed his trustees to convey to A certain heritable subjects, including subjects in N Street, Glasgow, "so far as the same shall belong to me at my death, but under all burdens affecting the same." After the date of the settlement notice to acquire the subjects in N Street was served on the testator by the Glasgow corporation, acting under statutory powers, and he thereafter, by missive, sold the subjects to the corporation, with entry at the Martinmas following, but he died (before Martinmas) without having executed a conveyance to the corporation. After his death his trustees executed a conveyance in favour of the corporation, and received payment of the price. Held that, as the testator had died without executing a conveyance in favour of the corporation, the subjects in N Street belonged to him at the time of his death, under the burden of implementing the sale to the corporation; that A's right under the settlement was a right to a conveyance of the subjects by the trustees under the same burden; and therefore that the trustees were bound to make over the price to him.

Sale of subject—Suspensive condition—Sale not completed at testator's death.

A testator by his will bequeathed to his daughter, as a special legacy, a hotel of which he was the proprietor. Shortly before his death the testator sold the hotel to William Steven, and signed a minute of sale which bore that "it shall be a condition of this agreement being binding on both parties that Mr. Steven applies for and obtains a transfer of the licence certificate of the said hotel." The transfer was not obtained until after the death of the testator, and thereafter a formal conveyance was executed in favour of the purchaser, and the price paid. Held (by a Court of seven judges) that the contract of sale being subject to a suspensive condition—namely, the transfer of the licence, the hotel remained part of the testator's estate at his death, and, accordingly, that the legacy had not been adeemed, and that the price of the hotel belonged to the daughter. Opinion that even if there had been no suspensive condition there had been no ademption, the hotel, or the right to its price, remaining part of the testator's estate.

M'Arthur's Executors v Guild, 1908 S.C. 743; 45 S.L.R. 551; 15 S.L.T. 1023.

(812)

Will directing sale of property—Price to be re-invested in lands to be entailed—Property sold by testator.

A testator directed his trustees upon his death to sell a Highland property, and to purchase with the proceeds an agricultural estate, to be entailed on his only son and a series of substitute heirs. He also made provisions for his widow and younger children, which were conceived in reference to the estate to be purchased, and left the residue of his means and estate to his son. He afterwards sold the property himself, and mixed up the proceeds with his other means. He died two years after the sale, without having executed any new testamentary deed, and leaving only moveable property, of which the total amount was less than the price of the property. Held (1) that the direction to purchase an estate was evacuated by the act of the testator in selling the Highland property; (2) that the provisions in favour of his widow and children were effectual, and must be construed so as to give effect to his intentions; (3) that the son was entitled to the residue as residuary legatee.

Sale by curator bonis—Bequest of shares—Change in denomination of shares.

A testator by his will bequeathed to each of certain beneficiaries "100 £5 shares of the Empire Guarantee and Insurance Corporation, Limited." Four months before his death the testator became insane, and a curator bonis was appointed, who, in the course of his administration, sold the entire holding of the testator in the corporation, not as a necessary act of administration for the maintenance of his ward or otherwise, but only because he considered it prudent to do so. Between the date of the will and the date when the curator was appointed each of the £5 shares had been converted into five £1 shares. Held that the legacies had not been adeemed, either by the change in the denomination of the shares or through the sale by the curator, and that the legatees were entitled to receive the value of the shares sold by the curator as a surrogatum for their specific bequests.

"Shares in Paisley Gas Company"—Termination of company—Substitution of corporation mortgages for company's shares—Paisley Corporation Gas Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. xxxv.), sec. 23.

A testator bequeathed a legacy of "the shares standing in my name in the Paisley Gas Company." Before the date of the will a local Act had transferred the right of supplying gas to Paisley to the corporation, substituting annuities payable to the shareholders of the Paisley Gas Company for the shares in the company, and had provided that the annuities should be conveyed or affected by any deed or will which disposed of the shares. Subsequently to the will, and before the death of the testator, these annuities had been redeemed by the corporation, and the price of the testator's annuity had been lent to the corporation on a mortgage over the gas undertaking. Held that the legacy was not adeemed, and that the legatee was entitled to the mortgage as representing the shares.

Legacy of sum in hands of legatee—Repayment.

By a general disposition and settlement a testatrix bequeathed her whole estate to her daughter F, "with the exception of £300 sterling of mine which my son A has invested for me, and which I do hereby leave and bequeath to himself." At the date of the settlement A had in his possession a sum of £300 belonging to his mother, on which he paid interest to her. This sum he subsequently repaid to her before her death. Held that the legacy to A was a specific legacy of a sum of £300 in his hands at the date of the settlement, and that as there was no sum in his hands at the death of the testatrix, it had been adeemed.

Legacy of debt due to testator—Debt paid prior to testator's death.

A testator by will, executed in 1907, bequeathed to his nephew A "the one hundred pounds due to me from H (whose security the said A holds), also the two endowment policies of one hundred pounds each, with profits due on the said policies." The two endowment policies (both on H's life) had been assigned to the testator merely in security for the debt. One became a claim in 1910, and by arrangement with the testator the proceeds were paid to H; the other matured in March, 1911, when the testator received payment of the £100 debt and interest out of its proceeds. By codicil, dated 21st April, 1911, he directed his executors "to give effect generally to the bequests of the said will," and added—"I confirm the whole bequests of my said will so far as not modified by these presents." Held that the legacy to A was not a general legacy which fell to be made good out of the testator's general estate, but a special legacy of the debt due by H, and that, the debt having been paid, the legacy had been adeemed.

Deposit receipt—Sum uplifted.

A lady on 23rd March, 1875, left a sealed packet with her law agent, marked "to be opened only in the event of my death," containing a letter dated the same day addressed to the law agent, with, inter alia, the following testamentary direction—"I empower you to uplift the deposit receipt lying with you for £4000, to lodge it in your own name, and to hold it in trust for my mother's brothers and sister and for their children." She at the same time verbally instructed her law agent to transfer the £4000 on deposit receipt to his own name, promising to send written instructions as to its disposal, which were not sent. The law agent at the same time said that he had made advances for her of £200, and would keep that sum out of the £4000, to which she agreed, and the balance was put in deposit receipt in his name "in trust." On 12th May, 1875, the law agent suggested to her the investment of this sum upon a heritable security for the purpose of obtaining higher interest. She agreed to £3500 being so invested, and this was done. The testatrix died on 8th June, 1876. Held that the legacy was special, and had been adeemed. Observations (per Lord Justice-Clerk Moncreiff) on the doctrine that ademption does not depend upon intention.

Anderson v Thomson, 1877, 4 R. 1101; 14 S.L.R. 654.

Policy of insurance in testator's favour—Payment.

A testator directed his trustees to keep up a policy of insurance for £4000 which he had taken in his own name on the life of his wife, and on her death to divide the proceeds equally among all his children then alive and the issue of predeceasers. The testator was predeceased by his wife. Shortly before her death he had become incapax, and a curator bonis was appointed. He continued incapax down to his death. The proceeds of the policy were received by the curator, who, after making certain payments for behoof of the ward, invested the balance of £3900 on a deposit receipt in his own name, and the sum remained so invested at the date of the testator's death. Held that the legacy was a specific legacy of the contents of the policy, and could not receive effect, as these had been merged in the testator's general estate before his death.

Davidson's Trustees v Davidson, 1901, 4 F. 107; 39 S.L.R. 106; 9 S.L.T. 253.

Alternative legacy—First alternative bequest partly adeemed.

A testator directed his trustees to make over to his sister his farm lease and stocking, furniture and £300, or otherwise, in her option, to pay her £1000. After making his will, the testator left the farm and realised the stocking. Held that the sister was entitled to claim £1000 under the will.

Findlay's Executor v Findlay's Trustees, (O.H.) 1921, 1 S.L.T. 247.

3. OPTIONS TO LEGATEES.

(820)

Construction.

A testator directed his trustees after his death to pay over to his widow one-half of his whole means and estate, or, in her option, to pay to her a free yearly annuity of specific amount, and to deliver to her the whole, or such part as she should select, of his household furniture, &c., as her absolute property, or further, in her option, to make payment to her of the "whole interest and annual produce of his means and estate" during her life. Held, on a consideration of the terms of the settlement, that the bequest of furniture was an adjunct of the second mode of provision, and that the widow, who had elected the third alternative provision, was entitled to the furniture not as her absolute property, but only in life interest.

Murray, &c., 1873, 45 J. 574.

(821)

—Date when exercisable.

A testator provided that his wife was "to be life interest in my house Stanley . . . (Seventh). At the death of my wife my son Peter, or failing him my son Ernest, . . . to have the option of buying Stanley as it then stands" for a specified sum; "failing them my daughters to have the same option; and failing them the property to be sold and the money put into general estate." The testator also provided—"The estate of Lounsedale to be offered in turn" at a price specified, "which sum is to be added to my general estate, to my sons Peter and Ernest, or failing them to my daughters; or failing them to be sold and the proceeds treated as above stated." Lounsedale was not life-rented by the widow. Held (1) that the option to purchase Stanley could not be exercised until the death of the testator's widow, and was limited to children then in existence; but (2) that the option to purchase Lounsedale fell to be exercised forthwith.

Coats' Trustees v Coats, 1903, 5 F. 401; 40 S.L.R. 330; 10 S.L.T. 585.

—Option to take over heritable subjects at specified price—Enhancement of value after date of settlement—Recompense—Mora.

By trust disposition and settlement, dated in 1868, and codicil dated in 1871, a trust directed his trustees to carry on his business, assuming as a partner his eldest son, and to assume his second and third sons as partners with shares of profits when and as soon as the trustees should think proper, and to retain the balance of the profits for the general purposes of the settlement. The sons assumed as partners were to have the option of taking over the business premises, subject to a bond for £20,000, at the price of £8000. In 1872 the business premises, which had cost £29,500, were totally destroyed by fire. The testator recovered from insurance companies £11,550, giving security to the bondholder that he would rebuild the premises. The testator approved of plans for their reconstruction on a more expensive scale, and partially carried out the building prior to his death in 1873. The trustees expended £13,000 beyond the insurance money in completing the buildings. The new buildings were valued in 1884 at £51,000. The trustees with the eldest son carried on the business, and in 1884 the second son was assumed as a partner, and in 1891 the third was assumed. After the assumption of the latter the three brothers intimated to the trustees that they exercised the option of taking over the business premises. Held (1) that the three sons had not lost their right to exercise the option by delay; and (2) that they were entitled to have the subjects conveyed to them on the conditions set forth in the settlement, without compensating the general estate for the sums expended on them since the testator's death.

Death of legatee before option exercised—Right of legatee's representatives to exercise option.

A testator directed his trustees to make over to his sister certain property, or otherwise, in her option, to pay her £1000. The sister survived the testator but died before making her option. Held that the sister's representatives were entitled to elect between the alternative bequests.

Findlay's Executor v Findlay's Trustees, (O.H.) 1921, 1 S.L.T. 247.

4. WHETHER LEGACIES FREE OF DUTY.

(824)

"Free of legacy duty"—To what legacies applicable.

A holograph letter of instructions left by a testator contained a direction to pay legacies, first to relatives and then to servants, concluding—"all which legacies I desire my trustees to pay over," &c. On the margin of the page from this point the words "all free of legacy duty," which were authenticated by the testator's signature, were written upwards. There was no mark to indicate where the words were to be introduced. The page on which they were written contained the legacies to servants. Held that the application of the words not being limited, the words must be read as applicable to all the legacies, and not merely to the legacies on the page on which the words were written.

Bequest of corporeal moveables—Bequest of residue.

A testator, inter alia, directed his trustees to "make offer to the town council of Aberdeen on behalf of the community of that city, free of legacy duty, of my collection of oil paintings, pen and ink drawings, and etchings, together with one-third of the residue of my estate." Held that the words "free of legacy duty" applied only to the bequest of paintings, &c., and not to the bequest of residue.

Macdonald's Trustees v Magistrates of Aberdeen, 1902, 4 F. 907; 39 S.L.R. 745; 10 S.L.T. 177.

(826)

Annuity—Substituted annuitant.

A testator by his settlement directed his trustees to pay certain annuities, "each free of legacy duty." By a supplementary will he nominated four persons, a nephew and nieces of the annuitants, as "heirs to the annuities" of the uncle and aunts, as these should become vacant by the deaths of the annuitants. Held that the trustees were not bound to pay the succession duties exigible on the "heirs" becoming entitled to the annuities.

Provisions in will regarding legacy duty—Whether applicable to gifts in codicil.

[See IX. 3 (2) (a).]

(827)

Expenses of trust charged on share of residue—Legacy duty—Estate duty.

A testator directed the residue of his estate to be divided into five shares, and after disposing of three and three-fourths of these directed that the remaining one and one-fourth share should be devoted to certain purposes, and, inter alia, "discharging the necessary expenses connected with this trust." Held that the expenses chargeable against the one and one-fourth share did not include estate duty and legacy duty.

5. APPORTIONMENT OF INVESTMENTS TO MEET LEGACIES—SEVERANCE OF TRUST.

[See TRUST V. 3.]

6. CUMULATIVE OR SUBSTITUTIONAL.

(828)

General rule.

When a testator bequeaths the same sums in two separate testamentary writings to the same legatees, the legacies must be regarded as cumulative, unless there is something to show that a different construction is necessary and that the latter legacies were substitutional.

Royal Infirmary of Edinburgh v Muir's Trustees, 1881, 9 R. 352; 19 S.L.R. 249.

Legacies in different writings of same amount to same persons.

A testator conveyed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to executors, with directions to pay, inter alia, a legacy of £100 to A. By a subsequent deed the testator appointed different executors with power to deal with his moveable estate, and directed them to pay, inter alia, a legacy of £300 to A and his heirs. Held that the second legacy was not intended to be in substitution for the first, and that both were payable.

Hood's Executors, 1869, 7 M. 774; 41 J. 402; 6 S.L.R. 503.

(830)

Legacy in will—Legacy in codicil of same amount to same persons.

By trust disposition and settlement, dated

12th July, 1893, a testatrix directed her trustees to pay certain legacies to each of eight cousins or families of cousins, including a legacy of £800 to Mrs. Isabella Fraser, "whom failing, her children." By a separate informal writing, dated 2nd August, 1893, the testatrix left legacies to the same groups of legatees, including one of £800, "to be divided between the late Isabella Fraser's five sons" (who were her whole children). The other seven legacies were not given on precisely the same conditions as those under the settlement, and two individual legatees under the settlement were omitted in the codicil. In every instance except one the amount of the legacies was the same in both deeds. Held that the legacy to Mrs. Fraser's sons in the codicil was additional to the corresponding legacy in the settlement.

Fraser v Forbes's Trustees, 1899, 1 F. 513; 36 S.L.R. 469; 6 S.L.T. 310.

Legacies in different codicils of same amount to same persons.

A person possessed of moveable estate, amounting to £175,000, on 2nd February, 1880, executed a codicil to his trust disposition and settlement, by which he bequeathed legacies to certain charitable institutions, and to two private individuals. On 30th April, 1880, he executed another codicil in similar terms, by which he bequeathed legacies of exactly the same amounts to the same charitable institutions and persons, with one exception, a legacy of £10 to one of the private persons being doubled. There were in addition legacies to two charitable institutions and to two persons not mentioned in the prior deed, making a total of eighteen legacies, amounting to £6840, as against fourteen in the first deed, amounting to £6310. After the testator's death the second deed was found enclosed in an envelope along with his trust disposition and settlement, but the first was found within the folds of a title deed having no relation to his testamentary affairs. All the documents were found in the same box. Held (1) that the testator intended both codicils to receive effect as testamentary writings; and (2) that as there was nothing to indicate that the bequests in the second codicil were to be construed as in substitution of those in the first, they were to be regarded as additional.

Royal Infirmary of Edinburgh v Muir's Trustees, 1881, 9 R. 352; 19 S.L.R. 249.

(832)

Will containing legacies and disposing of residue—Subsequent holograph writing containing legacies, but not disposing of residue—Certain beneficiaries favoured by both deeds—No express revocation.

Low's Executors, 1873, 11 M. 744; 45 J. 452; 10 S.L.R. 505, No. 402, supra.

(833)

Circumstances in which held that a number of legacies of the same amount in favour of the same beneficiaries contained in separate testamentary writings were substitutional.

Miller's Trustees v Kirkcaldy, (O.H.) 1905, 13 S.L.T. 73.

(834)

Two separate special provisions for same person.

A testator left two testamentary writings dated within six months of each other. By the earlier he bequeathed £4000 to a trustee for behoof of a natural son, A B, the sum to be paid to A B on his attaining twenty-five years of age. Failing A B, by death before reaching that age, the £4000 was to be divided equally among the testator's unmarried female cousins. By the later deed the sum of £6000 was left to three trustees—of whom the trustee named in the earlier deed was one—for behoof of A B, the sum to be paid to A B on his attaining twenty-four years of age. Failing A B, by death before reaching that age, the £6000 was to be divided equally as before, except that £1000 was to go to a married cousin named. Held that the provision of £6000 was substitutional.

(835)

A testator made a number of bequests of the same amount to each of a number of legatees, some by testamentary writings delivered to the legatees and some by writings which he retained in his own possession. Circumstances in which held that some of the bequests were cumulative and some merely reiterative.

Rennie's Trustees v Watt, 1904, 12 S.L.T. 195.

(836)

Legacy to class—Residue to members of class.

A testator directed his trustees to pay legacies of £5000 to A B and C B, two out of three sons of his sister B, and to R K, the third son of his sister K, a legacy of £2000, and to each of his brothers (of whom there were seven) the sum of £1000. He then left the residue of his estate, which exceeded £200,000, to be divided equally between R B, the elder brother of A B and C B, and T K, the eldest brother of R K. Held that T K was entitled to a legacy of £1000 in addition to his half of the residue.

Kirkpatrick v Bedford, 1873, 6 R. (H.L.) 4; 4 App.Cas. 96; 16 S.L.R. 315.

(837)

Bequests of residue in will to issue as conditional institutes to parent—Gift of residue in codicil to same persons nominatim.

A testator, by his will, left the residue of his estate to his next of kin, declaring that if any of his next of kin predeceased him leaving issue, such issue should succeed to their parent's share. One of his brothers had predeceased at the date of the will, leaving three children who survived the testator. By a codicil the testator declared that these three children should be his residuary lega-tees, along with other persons. Held that the bequest in the codicil was in substitution of the bequest contained in the will.

Legacy in will taken under conditio si sine liberis—Direct legacy in codicil.

A testator in his settlement left legacies of £100 each to his nephews and niece, A, B, C, and D. By a codicil he left "to the family of my nephew A," who had died between the date of the settlement and codicil, £1200; to B, who survived the execution of the codicil, but predeceased the testator, £500; to C, who likewise survived the execution of the codicil, but predeceased the testator, £500 in liferent allenarly and to her children in fee; and "to the family of the late" D, who died between the date of the settlement and codicil, £500 equally among them. It having been held that the conditio si sine liberis decesserit applied to the four legacies in the settlement, held further that the legacies in the codicil in favour of the families of A and D, as well as those in favour of B and C, were in addition to those in the settlement.

Bryce's Trustee, 1878, 5 R. 722; 15 S.L.R. 412.

(839)

Legacy of capital sum in will—Annuity in codicil.

In the construction of a settlement and codicil, held that a legacy of an annuity of £40 in the codicil was in addition to a legacy of £100 in favour of the same person contained in the settlement.

Bryce's Trustee, 1878, 5 R. 722; 15 S.L.R. 412.

Gift of liferent in will—Subsequent gift of fee of same sum in bond over local rates.

A father bequeathed £400 to his daughter A, £400 to his daughter B, and directed his trustees to invest £400 for behoof of his daughter C in liferent allenarly, and of her children in fee. After the death of C's husband her father took her to live with him, and gave her from £40 to £50 a year for her support. He subsequently lent £400 on the security of local rates, the destination in the bond being to C and her heirs. The bond was found in the father's repositories at his death. The Court, looking to the terms of the deeds and to the circumstances of the case, found that it was the testator's intention that his daughter C should receive both the provision under the will and that under the bond.

Milne v Scott, 1880, 8 R. 83; 18 S.L.R. 72.

(841)

Legacies repeated with variations.

A lady who had previously executed a formal settlement left three holograph writings or codicils of later date. Of these the first, dated 22nd May, 1877, bequeathed a number of legacies. The second, dated 6th February, 1878, began thus—"In my former bequests the sums I left to particular friends I now wish to be." Then followed the names of five of the legatees under the former codicil, with larger sums opposite their names, and of four other persons. The third, dated 16th March, 1878, began thus—"In my former bequests the sums left to particular friends I now wish to increase as mentioned below, therefore I leave and bequeath to," &c. Then followed the names of the five persons named in both the prior writings, with the sums opposite their names as in the writing of 6th February, 1878, and a revocation of the legacies given by the codicil of 22nd May, 1877, "to all these parties." Then, after repeating the names of three only out of the four other persons mentioned in the codicil of 6th February, 1878, with the same sums opposite their names, the testatrix proceeded to bequeath legacies to a number of persons not named in either of the prior writings. Of these codicils the first and third were delivered by the testatrix to her agent soon after they were respectively executed. The second was found after her death, which took place on 7th May, 1878, in her writing desk, which was open. Held (1) that the writing of 6th February, 1878, was a subsisting testamentary instrument; (2) that the legacies contained in it and the legacies to the same persons in the codicil of 16th March, 1878, were not cumulative; (3) that the person named only in the writing of 6th February, 1878, was entitled to the legacy there mentioned.

Tennent v Dunsmore, 1878, 6 R. 150; 16 S.L.R. 87.

Two legacies of £500 to A in two holograph writings—Legacy of £500 to A in subsequent universal settlement.

By holograph writing a testatrix bequeathed legacies of jewellery, and "£500 to my dear niece L." By a second holograph writing, dated a month later, she, inter alia, bequeathed £500 to L out of a special fund. By a formal universal settlement, dated three months later still, she bequeathed £500 to L out of the same special fund, and with regard to the division of her jewellery referred to a memorandum to be left by her. The settlement contained no revocation of prior testamentary writings. The first holograph writing was enclosed in a separate gummed envelope, addressed to the brother of the testatrix, and with this memorandum endorsed, dated a month after the execution of the settlement, "to be given to him by and by." Held that the legacies to L were substitutional, the earlier holograph writing being preserved in force merely as regarded the disposal of the jewellery.

Where double legacies would cause an abatement.

A testator in his settlement, dated in June, 1862, bequeathed (subject to his widow's liferent, which extended over the whole estate) a sum of £6000 to the general trustees of the Free Church of Scotland, towards an endowment of a Free Church college, subject to certain discretionary powers given to the General Assembly of that church. He bequeathed the residue to three nephews, to whom also he gave special legacies of £2000 each. In a codicil to the settlement executed in March, 1864, he directed his trustees, "in addition to all sums therein bequeathed by me, and particularly in addition to the sum of £4000 therein bequeathed by me to my brother F C M, to pay to him the annual interest on the sum of £6000, and if they see cause to do so, to set apart the said sum for his liferent use and behoof; . . . and at decease of both these liferenters," namely, F C M and his widow, "to pay the said principal sum of £6000 to the general trustees of the Free Church of Scotland for the benefit of the Free Church College in Edinburgh, to be applied in such manner as the General Assembly of the said Free Church may direct." It appeared that the testator had entered annually in his books an estimate of his estate. The memorandum of January, 1862, showed a residue available for residuary legatees of £1931 Os. 10d. The memorandum of 20th January, 1864 (being three months before the date of the codicil) showed a residue available for residuary legatees of £3176 3s. 2d. The testator died in September, 1865. The effect of the codicil as in 1864, assuming it to have created a new legacy of £6000, would have been to extinguish the residue and to diminish the prior legacies pro rata, including the legacy to F C M. Held that the codicil could not be construed as giving a second legacy of £6000 to the Free church.

Trustees of the Free Church of Scotland v Maitland, 1887, 14 R. 333; 24 S.L.R. 290.

7. LEGACIES IN SATISFACTION OF PROVISIONS.

(844)

General rule—Marriage contract provision—Bequest of residue.

There is no presumption against a gratuitous testamentary provision by a parent to a child being in addition to and not in satisfaction of a previous provision in obligatione. Circumstances in which held that a bequest of a share of residue was not intended to be in satisfaction of a provision under a marriage contract.

Cowan v Dick's Trustees, 1873, 1 R. 119; 11 S.L.R. 25.

Marriage contract provision—Legacy of similar amount.

Observed (per Lord Justice-Clerk Moncreiff) that the question whether a bequest is to be held in satisfaction of or in addition to a prior provision in obligatione depends entirely on the intention of the testator, and that, while the circumstance that the testator is already bound to give so much may be an important element in discovering the intention, it raises no more than a presumption of fact.

Extrinsic evidence.

In an antenuptial marriage settlement between S and C, his intended wife, J, a stranger covenanted to pay, at his death, to the marriage contract trustees £4000 free of duty, with interest at 4 per cent. from that date till payment, to be held for C and her husband, or survivor, in liferent, and their children in fee, and, failing children, to be held for J absolutely. By the marriage contract C was bound to assign acquiescentia to her marriage contract trustees to be held in trust for behoof of herself and her children, and, failing children, her executors. By his trust disposition and settlement J directed his trustees to pay "a legacy" of £4000 to C, providing that she should be allowed 5 per cent. interest so long as she should allow it to remain "as part of the share of the indigo concern." Held (1) that this legacy was not in satisfaction of the marriage contract provision, and that J's trustees were bound to pay both sums; and (2) that J's trustees were not entitled to lead evidence to show that J used the word "legacy" as meaning "provision."

Johnstone v Haviland, 1896, 23 R. (H.L.) 6; [1896] A.C. 95; 33 S.L.R. 511; 3 S.L.T. 279.

Marriage contract provision—Bequest of residue.

A father, in his daughter's marriage contract, bound himself to pay to the trustees named therein "a sum of not less than £1000," on the death of the survivor of himself and his wife, for behoof of the daughter and her children in liferent and fee respectively. Four years later he executed a holograph testamentary writing by which he directed his trustees to hold his whole estate for behoof of his widow in liferent, and on her death to divide it among his children in equal proportions, share and share alike, and further directed that a sum of £200 advanced to his daughter for marriage outfit should be deducted from her share of his estate. Held that a sum of £1000 fell to be paid to the marriage contract trustees as a debt due by the testator before the estate was divided, and that the married daughter was entitled to an equal share of the residue along with the other children.

Keith Johnston's Trustees v Johnston's Trustees, 1894, 22 R. 28; 32 S.L.R. 24; 2 S.L.T. 277.

(848)

A father, in his daughter's antenuptial marriage contract, bound himself to pay at his death a sum of £1000 to her marriage contract trustees. He afterwards executed a trust disposition and settlement, by which he directed his trustees to pay his debts and divide the residue of his estate equally among his children. Held that the provision in the marriage contract was a debt due by the deceased, and was not to be deducted from the daughter's share of residue.

Elliot v Bowhill, 1873, 11 M. 735; 45 J. 446; 10 S.L.R. 610.

(849)

Marriage contract provision to children—Bequest to children with conditional institution of their issue—Deduction of marriage contract provision from share falling to issue.

A testator, by his settlement, bequeathed the residue of his estate to his children equally, "the issue of any of them predeceasing taking the parent's place and share," vesting being postponed till the occurrence of a particular event. This bequest was declared to be in satisfaction of a provision to the children already made in the testator's marriage contract. A son of the testator survived him, and thus became entitled to claim a share of the marriage contract provision, but died before the term of vesting of the residuary bequest, leaving issue. On his death his share of the marriage contract provision was claimed by his executor; his share of the residuary bequest, on the other hand, passed to his issue. Held that the amount of the marriage contract provision payable to the son's executor fell to be charged exclusively against the share of the residue falling to his issue, and not against the whole residuary estate.

Scott v Graham, 1913 S.C. 467; 50 S.L.R. 299; 1913, 1 S.L.T. 69.

Annuity — Marriage contract annuity — Legacy of larger annuity.

By antenuptial contract of marriage a husband settled an annuity of £200 on his wife, in the event of her surviving him. He died, leaving a trust settlement for the purpose, inter alia, of paying his widow an annuity of £400. Held upon a construction of the settlement, that the widow was not entitled to both annuities, but that the testamentary annuity was in satisfaction of the annuity provided by the marriage contract.

Thomson v Thomson's Trustees, (O.H.) 1868, 5 S.L.R. 742.

Marriage contract obligation to provide annuity—Testamentary direction to implement—Subsequent purchase of larger annuity from limited company.

A husband, who was bound in his antenuptial contract of marriage to provide an annuity of £400 a year to his widow, executed a settlement, of which the second purpose was to satisfy this provision. He afterwards, in exchange for certain rights, took from a limited company an annuity of £500 a year to himself and to his wife if she survived him. The wife had become permanently insane before the execution of the settlement. Held that the purchase by the husband of the annuity of £500 from the limited company was to be regarded not as in addition to, but as in satisfaction of, the annuity provided in the marriage contract, but that the husband's estate must remain liable for the £400 annuity in case the company should at any time be unable to pay the £500 annuity.

Buttery's Trustees v M'Clelland, 1879, 6 R. 564.

(852)

Legacy accepted as in satisfaction of marriage contract obligation—Clause of discharge in settlement.

By antenuptial marriage contract the husband assigned to trustees two policies of insurance and his household furniture. The trustees had power to demand £200 in lieu of the furniture. The husband also bound himself to pay his widow £20 for mournings. In the event, which happened, of the husband predeceasing, the estate was to be conveyed to the widow. The trustees never assumed office. The policies of insurance lapsed. By a subsequent trust settlement the husband conveyed his whole estate to trustees, providing for an annuity of £70 to his widow, and declaring that this provision was made and should be accepted as in lieu and in full satisfaction of all claims competent on his estate through his death. The widow elected to take the annuity of £70, but claimed in addition the marriage contract provisions of £200 and £20. She abandoned all other claims under the marriage contract. Held that the widow's claims for the sums of £200 and £20 were claims competent on the husband's estate through his death, and were accordingly excluded by the clause in the settlement.

Proctor's Trustees v Proctor, 1905, 42 S.L.R. 566; 13 S.L.T. 114.

Obligation in inter vivos deed to pay annuity—Subsequent bequest of annuity of like amount.

A father was party to a deed of separation between his son and daughter-in-law, in which he undertook, on behalf of himself, his heirs, executors, or administrators, to pay to the lady an annuity of £1000, for her separate estate, and with restraint on anticipation, terminable on her renewing cohabitation with his son. In his trust disposition and settlement he directed his trustees to pay to his daughter-in-law an alimentary annuity of £1000, restricted to the sum of £250 per annum in the event of her entering into a second marriage. Circumstances in which held that the annuity conferred by the settlement was in substitution for, and not in addition to, the annuity secured by the deed of separation.

Obligation to pay sum to children—Obligation to educate—Legacy.

In a voluntary contract of separation a father bound himself, inter alia, to settle £2000 on each of his children, payable at the first term of Whitsunday after his death. He further bound himself to be at the expense of a suitable education for his children. Of the same date, he executed a mortis causa settlement whereby he directed his trustees to pay to each of his children £2000 at the first term of Martinmas or Whitsunday after his death, and on their respectively attaining majority, with legal interest until that period from the first term of Martinmas or Whitsunday after his death.

Held (1) that the provision in the trust settlement was in implement of the obligation in the contract of separation, and (2) that the children were entitled to the expenses of education until they attained majority, the obligation thereon not being terminated by the death of the testator.

Heir of entail—Bond of provision—Partial implement—Legacy—Whether to be imputed to deficiency.

An heir of entail in possession, in implement of an obligation in his marriage contract, granted a bond of provision in favour of younger children, binding himself and the heirs of entail for a sum equal to three years' rent at the date of his death. He thereafter granted bonds of provision in their favour, bearing to be in full of the provisions under the first bond, but amounting in all to a smaller sum than the full obligation, and also bequeathed a sum of money to them in his settlement. The children having been found entitled to the full amount set forth in the first bond, held that they were not bound to impute the money legacy to make up the deficiency under the subsequent bonds of provision, and that the maxim debitor non præsuntur donare did not apply, as the donor of the legacy was not the debtor in the bond.

Hope Johnstone v Hope Johnstone, 1880, 7 R. 766; 17 S.L.R. 547.

Bequest to son—Direction to hold for son's marriage contract trustees—Legacy or security.

A testator bequeathed a share of residue to each of his sons and with regard to the share of one son he directed that it should be held and applied by the trustees for behoof of the son's marriage contract trustees, and should be in full of all claims competent against the testator under the son's marriage contract. Held (by a majority of seven judges) that the share of residue was not a legacy to the marriage contract trustees for behoof of the beneficiaries under the contract, but a security merely for implement of the testator's and the son's obligations under the contract.

Brown's Trustees v Brown, 1868, 40 J. 145.

8. SATISFACTION OF LEGACIES BY ADVANCES.

(857)

Intention to divide estate equally among family.

A testator directed the residue of his estate to be divided equally among his children. He also left a legacy of £1000 to his only son, on the narrative that his daughters had each received from him a present of £1000. Subsequent to the date of the will the testator made an additional payment of £1000 to each of his daughters, and a payment of £2000 to his son. Held that the son's legacy of £1000 had been satisfied by the payment of the £2000.

Johanson v Johanson's Trustees, 1898, 1 F. 244; 36 S.L.R. 169; 6 S.L.T. 230.

Testator acceding to trust for creditors of legatee—Interest.

A testator bequeathed a share of residue to his daughters in life rent only and their children in fee, but declaring "that all advances which I have made, or may hereafter make, to my respective sons-in-law, shall be deducted from the respective shares" life-rented by his daughters. On various occasions the testator had lent or guaranteed sums to a firm of which one of his sons-in-law was sole member. The son-in-law's firm, and he, as sole member thereof, suspended payment, and their affairs were wound up under a trust deed. The testator acceded to this deed, took payment of dividends, and granted receipts therefor, which bore that he accepted the dividends in terms of the trust deed, and discharged his son-in-law. At the date of the testator's death there was still a balance due to him on the above transactions. Held that the balance of the advances, which had not been repaid, but without interest, fell, as at the date of the testator's death, to be imputed as a payment to account of the share of residue falling to the daughter's children.

Smith's Trustees v Sellar, 1894, 21 R. 633; 31 S.L.R. 538; 1 S.L.T. 542.

Admissibility of parole evidence.

A testator bequeathed to his daughter a sum of £40 and directed his trustees to deliver to her a bill for £15 granted by her and her husband. The will further declared that "the provisions hereby conceived" in favour of children were in full of legitim. During the testator's lifetime the daughter had received payments amounting to £40 for which she and her husband granted a receipt which bore that the payments were in full of the share of her father's estate which would fall to be paid to the daughter on his death. It was proved that when the receipt was granted the daughter was aware of the terms of her father's will. Held that the testamentary provision was satisfied by the payments.

M'Laren v Howie, 1869, 8 M. 106; 42 J. 52; 7 S.L.R. 56.

9. SURROGATUM.

(860)

Direction to entail lands—Part of lands sold to pay legacies—Moveable fund subsequently emerging.

A testator directed his trustees after payment of debts and legacies to entail his estates "or such part thereof as they might not find necessary to dispose of for answering the purposes of this trust" on a series of heirs. The moveable property was insufficient to pay the legacies, and the trustees sold part of the heritage, and entailed the unsold lands. Subsequently it appeared that shares belonging to the estate had been sold below their value in consequence of misrepresentation by the company, and the trustees recovered a sum exceeding the value of the heritage sold. Held that a sum equal to that obtained by the sale of the heritage fell to be invested in lands to be entailed as a surrogatum for those sold.

Stanton's Trustees v Dawson, 1868, 6 M. 240; 40 J. 128; 5 S.L.R. 168.

Legatum rei aliena—Testator in belief that subject belonged to her.

A person who was proprietrix of one pro indiviso half of a house, and had the life-rent of the other half, in the belief that the whole belonged to her disposed it mortis causa to a beneficiary in life-rent. Held that the beneficiary was not entitled to a surrogatum out of the deceased's general estate for the pro indiviso half which was not carried by the conveyance.

Traquair v Martin, 1872, 11 M. 22; 45 J. 28; 10 S.L.R. 36.

Bequest of shares—Shares sold by curator bonis.

10. RANKING—ABATEMENT.

(863)

Whether legacy payable out of particular or general residue.

A testatrix, after bequeathing a large number of legacies in her trust deed and relative codicils, executed another codicil, dated 2nd January, 1877, whereby she directed her trustee, "after paying and making provision for the whole legacies" in the trust deed and "codicils thereto executed by me prior to the date hereof, to set apart and invest from the free residue thereafter remaining" £1000 for behoof of a legatee named. By subsequent codicils she left, inter alia, additional legacies to legatees named in her codicils prior to 2nd January, 1877. The estate having proved insufficient to pay all the legacies, held (1) that the £1000 legacy was not to be paid out of the said free residue preferably to subsequent legacies; and (2) that it was not postponed to subsequent legacies, but fell to be ranked pari passu along with them.

Chivas' Trustee v McLeod, 1881, 9 R. 86; 19 S.L.R. 49.

(864)

Legacies bequeathed by will conveying whole estate—Subsequent will conveying moveable estate to different executors.

A testator, by disposition and settlement, conveyed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to executors for payment of legacies amounting to £1000, and for payment of the residue to J. H. He subsequently executed a last will and testament, whereby he conveyed his moveable estate to different executors for payment of debts and of legacies to the amount of £600. The residue was directed to be paid to J. H. The heritable estate was not sufficient to pay the legacies left by the first deed, but the whole estate, heritable and moveable, was more than sufficient to pay the legacies left by both deeds. Held that the legacies left by the earlier deed were not chargeable against the moveable estate, but only against the heritage, and must suffer a proportional abatement.

Hood's Executors, 1869, 7 M. 774; 41 J. 402; 6 S.L.R. 503.

Abatement for temporary purpose.

A testator directed his trustees to divide his whole estate equally among his sons and daughters, with the proviso that should his only unmarried daughter's "share of the division not amount to £150 per annum," the trustees were to "invest in good and safe security as much as will realise that amount." The testator gave no directions as to the disposal of the capital so invested. The daughter's share of the estate was not sufficient by itself to provide £150 a year. Held that the additional sum which it was necessary to invest for this purpose belonged to the other children, from whose shares it had been taken, subject to the life interest of the daughter.

Mackenzie's Trustees v. Mitchell, 1875, 2 R. 469.

(866)

Express provision for abatement—"Married daughters' shares."

Muir's Trustees, 1869, 8 M. 53; 42 J. 25, 7 S.L.R. 24, No. 752, supra.

(867)

Competition between annuity payable out of capital and legacies payable on death of annuitant.

A testator directed his trustees to pay to his widow an annuity of £1000 a year in lieu of her legal rights and of her claims under an antenuptial marriage contract, and disposed of the rest of his estate in legacies, some of which he directed to be paid within three months after his death, and others after the death of the widow. The income of the trust estate was insufficient to pay the annuity. Held that the annuity was preferable to the legacies of which payment had been postponed, and that the widow was entitled to have it paid in full whether the revenue of the estate yielded the full amount or not.

Kinmond's Trustees v Kinmond, 1873, 11 M. 381; 45 J. 255; 10 S.L.R. 244.

(868)

Preference among annuities.

A testator left to his wife an annuity of £400, and to his mother, "if my estate will permit," an annuity of £100. He left no other testamentary provision. Held that both annuities were payable out of capital, but that the wife's annuity was preferable to that of the mother.

Adamson's Trustees v Adamson's Executors, 1891, 18 R. 1133; 23 S.L.R. 869.

Conditional legacy—Effect of fulfilment of condition—Deficiency of funds—Preference.

A testatrix bequeathed a sum of money on condition that the legatee should ratify a settlement executed by a sister of the testatrix. The deed to be ratified did not benefit the testatrix or her estate. In a question between the conditional legatee and other legatees, held that implement of the condition did not render the legacy preferable to other legacies in the event of a deficiency of funds.

Effect of widow claiming legal rights.

Held that the general rule by which special legacies rank preferably to general legacies, and general legacies to bequests of residue, applies in cases where a general settlement of a testator's whole estate has been disturbed by his widow refusing to accept the provisions therein made for her in lieu of her legal rights, and claiming jus relictæ.

11. WHETHER LEGACY A REAL BURDEN.

(871)

Declared a real burden—Not entering records—Liability of heir.

A testator, by mortis causa settlement, disposed his whole estate to his wife in lifereit and to his heirs in fee. By a codicil the testator bequeathed to his wife a legacy of £600, which he declared should form a real burden on his heritable estate, and he also gave her power to sell the heritage. The wife survived, but did not exercise the power of sale, and the legacy was not paid during her life. The testator's heir at law made up a title to the heritage by service passing over the settlement. Held that although the legacy was not a real burden which would have been effectual against creditors or singular successors, yet there was conferred on the wife a right to make her legacy effectual out of the heritage, and that the heir at law, having taken up the succession gratuitously, was bound to pay the legacy to the wife's executors.

Storeys v Paxton, 1878, 6 R. 293; 16 S.L.R. 199.

(872)

Annuity—Right of annuitant to have annuity made real burden on heritable subjects.

The right of an annuitant to have his annuity made a real burden upon heritable subjects depends upon the language employed in the dispositive instrument. Either the term "real burden" itself must be employed, or else by some express words, or by clear implication, the heritable subject itself must be affected. A testator who died possessed of heritable and moveable property directed his trustees to pay to his wife and his son John certain annuities, and, as soon as convenient after his own decease to make over to his son George the whole residue of his estate, heritable and moveable, "but that always with and under the burden of" a certain lifereit, "and also under burden of the payment of" the annuities. Held that the testator had not created and had not directed the trustees to create the annuities a real burden on the heritable estate.

Buchanan v Eaton, 1911 S.C. (H.L.) 40; [1911] A.C. 253; 48 S.L.R. 481; 1911, 1 S.L.T. 422.

By a mortis causa disposition and settlement, a proprietor conveyed certain lands to his son, "but always with and under the burden of payment to" each of the son's sisters of a certain sum of money on her attaining majority. The son completed his title to the lands by a notarial instrument, which contained no special reference to the burden. Held that the burden was not a real burden, on the ground that the words declaring the burden were not directed against the lands themselves so as to leave no room for doubt, and that the omission of the word from the notarial instrument rendered the burden ineffectual as against bona fide creditors who had acquired a security title without knowledge of the alleged real burden.

Mackenzie v Clark, (O.H.) 1903, 11 S.L.T. 428.

12. PAYMENT.(1) GENERALLY.

(874)

First term day "six months after my death"—Calendar or lunar months.

A testatrix directed her trustees, with all convenient speed, to collect and realise her moveable estate, and "as soon as convenient after my death to deliver, and at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas six months after my death," to pay such bequests and legacies as should be directed by any writings under her hand. Lastly, the trustees were directed to pay the interest of the whole residue of the estate to the heir of entail in possession of a particular estate "at the said term of Whitsunday or Martinmas six months after my death"—the first term's payment of said interest to commence "as at the term of Whitsunday or Martinmas twelve months after my death." The testatrix died at nine in the morning of 15th May, 1880. A question having arisen as to whether the legacies became payable at Martinmas, 1880, or not until Whitsunday, 1881, held that on a reasonable construction of the settlement, and in accordance with the evident intention of the testatrix, Martinmas, 1880, was the first term six months after the testatrix's death, and that the legacies became payable then.

When "suitable and convenient."

A testator left legacies to each of his nieces to be paid "when my trustees shall find it suitable and convenient to pay the same." The will also bore that the legacies should be so secured to the nieces as his trustees might consider best for their benefit, that the legacies were given for the alimentary liferent use of the nieces, and that the simple receipt of the nieces without the concurrence of their husbands should be a sufficient discharge to the trustees. Held that, although the trust estate was in a condition conveniently to pay the legacies, the trustees were not bound to make immediate payment to the nieces.

Cunninghame's Trustees v Duke, 1873, 11 M. 543; 45 J. 348; 10 S.L.R. 357.

Liferents to A and B—Fee of one-half to issue of A and of one-half to issue of B—Destination over to testator's heirs—Payment on death of surviving liferenter.

A testatrix directed her trustees to pay the income of the residue of her estate equally to and between A and B in their lifetime respectively, so long as both are alive; on the death of the said A and B to convey one-half of the capital of the said residue to the issue, if any, of the said A, and the other just and equal half to the issue of the said B, declaring that if there should be issue of either of them, who should be under twenty-two years of age, her trustees should have power to delay the division till the child or children should arrive at that age, they paying the child or children the free interests and profits to be drawn in the meantime, with a destination over to her nearest heirs. A and B survived the testatrix, but died, neither leaving issue. Held (by a majority of seven judges) that the testatrix intended only one period of distribution, viz., the date of the death of the last survivor of the liferenters.

Haldane's Trustees v Murphy, 1881, 9 R. 269; 19 S.L.R. 217.

Legacy vesting a morte testatoris — Disappearance of reasons for postponing payment.

A testator directed his trustees to make over his business and whole stock in trade to his son John, subject to "a legacy or debt of £2000 in favour of" his son James, "to be paid to him by his brother John at the first term of Whitsunday, twenty years after my decease (payment of the above legacy or bequest being postponed by me for such a length of time in order that my son John may not be unduly burdened in conducting the said business); and, in the event of my son James dying before the said legacy of £2000 becomes payable to him, then I direct my trustees to pay and divide the same equally among his lawful children." The testator died in 1876, and his son John in 1885, leaving a widow, but no children. Held, in a question between the trustees, James, and James's children, that the legacy to James vested a morte testatoris, and that, as the reasons for postponing the date of payment had disappeared, the payment might be anticipated, under discount, in respect the legacy did not carry interest until the term of Whitsunday, 1896.

Legacies payable on death of liferenter — One legatee desiring payment — Liferenter willing to renounce—Possible insufficiency of funds to pay whole legacies.

A testator conveyed his estate to trustees, and gave the liferent of the residue to his wife. On the death of the survivor of himself and his wife, the testator directed his trustees to pay a sum of £18,000 to his son and a sum of £8000 to each of his four daughters, and to hold the residue for the son. These provisions vested in the children a morte testatoris. The testator was survived by his widow and the five children. The son applied to the trustees for payment of the sum of £18,000. The widow consented to the application, and offered to discharge her liferent in regard to that sum. The trustees held funds at the date of the application which were amply sufficient to meet the children's provisions. Held that the trustees were not bound to accede to the son's demand, as the daughters were entitled to pari passu payment of their provisions along with the son, and it was possible that when the date of payment arrived the estate might be insufficient to pay the provisions in full.

Refusal to pay because of possible claim for legitim.

Held that testamentary trustees who were called on to pay a legacy left by the truster to "J L, my reputed son," were not entitled to require, as a condition precedent to payment, a discharge which would exclude a claim for legitim in the event of the legitimacy of J L being established.

(880)

Direction to invest trust funds in lands and to convey lands to series of heirs—Trustees to be judge of lands to be purchased and date of purchase—Right of beneficiary to payment in cash.

In a trust settlement the trustees were directed to lay out the residue of the trust estate (amounting to £60,000) in the purchase of lands, and when the whole residue, or within £300 thereof, was so invested, to deliver a disposition of the lands to the brother of the testatrix in liferent, and to his son and the heirs whatsoever of his body in fee, whom failing, to certain other persons. The trustees were declared to be the sole judges of what lands were to be purchased, and of the date at which the purchase should be made. The testatrix was predeceased by her brother, and the nephew took a vested interest a morte testatoris. The trustees having invested the whole residue in lands except a sum of £20,000, held that the nephew was entitled to payment of the £20,000 in cash.

Spens v Monypenny's Trustees, 1875, 3 R. 50; 13 S.L.R. 25 and 45.

(881)

Gift of whole or portion of annual income of fund—Gift subject to conditions and restrictions as trustees think fit—Exercise of trustees' discretion.

Train v Clapperton, 1908 S.C. (H.L.) 26; [1908] A.C. 342; 45 S.L.R. 682; 16 S.L.T. 45. TRUST, No. 439.

(882)

Repayment—Conditional bequest—Repayment on failure of condition.

Young's Trustee v Deacons of the Eight Incorporated Trades of Perth, 1893, 20 R. 778; 30 S.L.R. 704; 1 S.L.T. 72, No. 1185, infra.

(2) INTEREST.

(883)

Right to interest—Postponed payment and vesting.

A testator bequeathed legacies of £10,000 to each of his children, declaring that these should be "payable as at my death, and on" the legatees "respectively attaining twenty-one years of age, or in the case of females on their respective marriages before attaining said age, and the same shall not vest until the period of payment." Power was given to the trustees to make advances of income, and to anticipate the period of vesting and payment. Held that the interest accruing on each legacy between the date of the testator's death and the period of payment belonged to the legatee.

Cf. Playfair's Trustees v Hunter, 1890, 17 R. 1241; 27 S.L.R. 991, No. 916, infra.

(884)

Date when interest begins to run.

The general rule is that legacies of money bear interest from the date of the testator's death until payment.

May's Trustees v Paul, 1900, 2 F. 657; 37 S.L.R. 470; 7 S.L.T. 402.

(885)

Direction to pay legatees at majority—Interest from date when eldest attained majority.

A testator directed his trustees to pay the residue of his estate to five persons named, equally, "as they respectively attain the age of twenty-one years." One of the legatees was of age at the testator's death; the others attained majority at subsequent dates. Held that the legatee who was major at the death of the testator was entitled to payment at that date, and that each of the other legatees was entitled to payment of one-fifth of the residue at majority with interest from the date when the first mentioned legatee became entitled to payment.

Fergusson v Smith, 1867, 6 M. 83; 40 J. 50; 5 S.L.R. 79.

(886)

Legacies payable from "first and readiest of my saleable estate"—Sale delayed by litigation.

A testator directed his trustees to sell as soon as possible heritable estates, and bequeathed certain legacies to be paid "from the first and readiest of my saleable estate." The sale was delayed by a litigation for about two years after the death of the testator. In a question whether interest was due on the legacies from the date of the testator's death, held that the terms of the direction did not take the case out of the ordinary rule, and that interest was due from the date of the testator's death.

Kirkpatrick v Bedford, 1878, 6 R. (H.L.) 4; 4 App.Cas. 96; 16 S.L.R. 315.

(887)

Funds insufficient to pay legacy until after death of liferentrix.

Opinion that the principle underlying all rules for payment of interest on legacies is that the capital is or ought to be in the hands of the executor or trustee as an interest-bearing subject, and consequently that interest can never be due so long as by the act of the testator there is nothing in the hands of the trustee or executor wherewith to pay the capital of the legacy. During the life of a liferentrix trustees had insufficient funds to pay certain legacies. Held, after her death, that no interest was due for the period prior to that date.

Ewing v Mathieson, (O.H.) 1904, 41 S.L.R. 594.

[Cf. Ewing's Trustees v Mathieson, (O.H.) 1901, 9 S.L.T. 367. ALIMENTARY PROVISION, No. 87.]

(888)

Rate of interest.

A testator by partial trust disposition and settlement assigned to trustees £5000 out of the means and estate belonging to him at the date of his death. Quoad ultra he died intestate, and an executor was appointed. Held that the trustees under the settlement were entitled to interest on the £5000 at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum from the date of death until payment by the executor.

Rate of interest—Postponement of payment of legacy owing to delay to elect.

Where the payment of a legacy was postponed for several years owing to the delay of the beneficiary to elect between her legal rights and the provisions under the trust settlement, held that the legatee could not claim a higher rate of interest than had been actually received by the trustees down to the date of her election.

Observed (per Lord President Inglis and Lord M'Laren), that there is no general rule that the rate of interest payable on legacies is 5 per cent. where the trustees are not in mora.

Inglis' Trustees v Breen, 1891, 18 R. 487.

(890)

Interest—Ultra vires advances.

A trust left his estate to be divided among his family of four daughters, vesting being postponed till the period of payment, viz., the majority of the youngest daughter. He empowered his trustees "to make advances" to his daughters "on their marriage," which advances were to be accounted as part of their shares, and to be deducted from their shares of the residue on the final division taking place. Three of the daughters were married during the subsistence of the trust. The trustees on the occasion of each marriage paid the daughter a sum of £1000, and made her an annual allowance of £300. Held (1) that the annual allowances were ultra vires of the trustees; (2) that the allowances so paid to each married daughter, with interest thereon to the date of division, were to be imputed to account of her share of residue; (3) that the interest was to be calculated at the rate which the rest of the trust fund was yielding; and (4) that no interest was chargeable on the sums of £1000.

Baird's Trustees v Duncanson, 1892, 19 R. 1045; 29 S.L.R. 862.

13. PRESCRIPTION.

(891)

Long negative prescription.

Held that the negative prescription applied to a claim against an executor for payment of a legacy.

Jamieson v Clark, 1872, 10 M. 399; 44 J. 225; 9 S.L.R. 235.

14. LAPSE.(1) WHETHER LEGACY HAS LAPSED.

(892)

Legacy a burden on gift of heritage—Lapse of gift of heritage.

A trust disposition and settlement contained the following provision:—"Upon my son William attaining the age of thirty years, I direct my trustees to convey over to him my properties of A and T, but he shall be bound immediately on receiving such conveyance to pay to my second son Robert the sum of four thousand pounds sterling, or to execute a bond and disposition in security for that sum over the said properties in favour of the said Robert." William and Robert survived the testator, but William died before attaining the age of thirty, and consequently the direction to convey the properties of A and T was held to lapse. Held that there was a bequest of £4000 to Robert which was not conditional on William taking the properties of A and T.

Funds left to pay debts on family estate—Estate sold.

A died in 1840 leaving a settlement by which he directed his trustees to convey the lands of X in favour of B, his eldest son, whom failing of C, his second son. B died in 1863 without having taken a conveyance to the estates and without issue, leaving a settlement by which he directed his trustees on the death of his widow to pay certain funds to his father's trustees, to be applied by them in liquidation of the debts on the lands of X. On the death of B, C in 1863 obtained a conveyance of the estates from his father's trustees. In 1865 he sold the estates and paid the heritable debts affecting the same. He died in the same year. B's widow died in 1869. Held that though the heritable debts had been extinguished before the sum destined by B to be applied in payment thereof had become payable, C's trustees were entitled to the fund.

Sutherland's Trustees v Sutherland, 1870, 8 M. 716; 42 J. 371.

(894)

Legacy to purchase commission in army—Abolition of purchase.

By a trust settlement the trustees were directed to settle £18,000 on the truster's nephew in liferent and his children in fee; and further, "in case of my not having advanced money during my lifetime to purchase a captain's commission in his regiment for the said John Dunbar, I direct my trustees to make payment to him of a further sum of £2000 sterling for that purpose." She did not advance money for the purchase of a commission, and purchase in the army was abolished before the testator's death. Held that although a commission could not be purchased, the sum of £2000 was payable.

Dunbar v Scott's Trustees, 1872, 10 M. 982; 44 J. 556; 9 S.L.R. 632.

(895)

Heritage conveyed to trustees for purposes set forth in English will—English will cancelled.

The proprietor of a heritable estate in Scotland, by mortis causa deed disposed the estate to his wife in liferent and to trustees in fee with direction to sell the estate on the expiry of the liferent, and to apply the proceeds to purposes set forth in a prior English will, which he subsequently cancelled. A subsequent English will revoked "all former wills." Held that though the mortis causa conveyance was not thereby revoked, the destination of the fee and the direction to sell had fallen in consequence of the failure of the trust purposes through the cancellation of the first English will, so that the Scots estate fell to the heir at law of the granter.

Thomas v Tennent's Trustees, 1868, 7 M. 114; 41 J. 59; 6 S.L.R. 115.

(896)

Unclaimed legacy—Legacy consigned in Court.

A testator bequeathed £100 to the children of his deceased sister, who had resided abroad. She was believed to have had five children. For upwards of 50 years the legacy was unclaimed, and nothing was known of the beneficiaries. Held that the legacy could not be treated as having lapsed, but that it should be consigned in Court under supervision of the Accountant of Court, and the judicial factor on the trust estate discharged.

(2) DISPOSAL OF LAPSED LEGACY.

[See also XII. 1, infra.]

(898)

Residue or intestacy.

Terms of settlement under which held that a legacy which lapsed by the death of the legatee before it vested did not pass into intestate succession, but was carried by the residuary clause into residue.

Dymock's Trustees, 1873, 45 J. 289; 10 S.L.R. 263.

(899)

Residue to go in supplement of other legacies—Legacy void from uncertainty.

A testator's will contained a declaration that "in case the residue of my estate . . . should realise a sum exceeding in amount the sum sufficient to meet in full" the legacies, these should "all be increased in proportion to the amount by which the said residue shall exceed the amount of the said legacies." Held that a legacy which was void from uncertainty did not fall into intestacy, but went to increase the other legacies as provided by the declaration.

McGrouther's Trustees v Lord Advocate (O.H.) 1907, 15 S.L.T. 652.

Liferent of testator's estate to children, with fee to issue.

A testator directed his trustees to divide his estate into as many shares as he had children, and to invest his daughters' shares in heritable securities, taking the titles to them in liferent for their liferent use only, and their children in fee. The trustees did not invest the estate in heritable security. One of the daughters, who survived her father, died without issue and intestate. Held that her share became intestate succession of her father, and did not fall into residue under his settlement.

Fulton's Trustees v Fulton, 1880, 7 R. 566; 17 S.L.R. 377.

Lapsed legacy a burden on residue.

A testator, by his holograph will, left his whole estate to his sister and two brothers equally, and the survivor of them, subject to the payment of certain legacies, inter alia, a legacy "to the deserving working people in the parish of Annan, five hundred pounds, which sum I desire my brothers to divide amongst them according to their good judgment and discretion." The testator was survived by one of his brothers and by his sister, who were confirmed his executors. Thereafter the sister died, and the surviving brother, having paid away part of the legacy, himself also died. The trust for the deserving working people was held to have lapsed on the death of the surviving brother. Held that the remaining part of the legacy did not fall into intestacy, but passed to the representatives of the two disponees who survived the testator, because the trust for the deserving working people was conceived as a burden upon the gift to them.

Laurie v Brown, (O.H.) 1911, 1 S.L.T. 84.

(902)

Lapse of contingent legacy.

Held that contingent legacies were only burdens on the residuary estate, which vested in the residuary legatee at the testator's death, although it was not until several years after that event that the amount was ascertained by the contingencies upon which the legacies depended being purified.

Predecease of term of payment—Liferented share.

A testator directed his trustees to divide the residue of his estate into four shares and pay one to each of three of his children, and to invest the other for behoof of a fourth child in liferent only and his children in fee. He further directed—"If any of my children predecease the term of payment of their provisions, the said provisions shall . . . become part of the residue of my estate." Held that the capital of the share liferented by the fourth child was not carried by this clause, but fell into intestacy.

Scott v Gowans, (O.H.) 1916, 1 S.L.T. 404.

(904)

Terms of residue clause.

Terms of a trust settlement which were held wide enough to cover certain legacies which had lapsed through failure of the fiars, the liferenters of the legacies having died without issue.

Ramsay's Factor v Smith's Trustees,
(O.H.) 1910, 1 S.L.T. 87.

—Disposal of forfeited share after equitable compensation complete.

(906)

Legacy of residue of particular sum—Lapse of legacy charged on sum.

Brown v M'Lae's Trustees, 1877, 5 R. 37; 15 S.L.R. 27, No. 912, infra.

Legacy a real burden—Relief of heir or benefit of residue.

A father in his settlement conveyed the heritable estate of X to his eldest son under the real burden of £6000, declaring that £1500 thereof should "belong in liferent to each of my daughters, F and M, viz., £3000 betwixt them, and to their children in fee." The father also conveyed the residue of his estates to two of his sons. Held that the death of one of the truster's daughters unmarried relieved the heritable estate of the burden of £1500, and did not benefit the residuary legatees.

Mutual settlement—Survivor fiar of whole estate—Heirs of predeceaser or of survivor.

By mutual settlement a husband and wife conveyed to each other the whole estate which should belong to each at his or her death. The survivor was given full power to dispose of the whole estate, and, on the death of the survivor, "the portion of the joint estate which may remain" was to be divided among certain relatives of the spouses. The wife survived, and during her survivorship the value of the estate left by the husband was largely increased by accumulations. One of the relatives of the husband, to whom a portion of the joint estate was destined, predeceased the wife. Held that the predeceaser's share of the estate fell to the wife's heirs in mobilibus as intestate succession.

Berwick's Executor, 1885, 12 R. 565; 22 S.L.R. 357.

XII. RESIDUE.

1. WHETHER GIFT IS GIFT OF RESIDUE.

(909)

"Residue"—Holograph will—Words "any residue" occurring in immediate collocation with a reference to a particular fund.

The presumption is that the word "residue" occurring in a testamentary writing carries the residue of the testator's whole estates, and not merely the balance of a particular fund.

A lady by holograph testamentary paper left legacies amounting in all to £1000, including one of £100 "to my old and valued friend J M," under the declaration that these legacies were to be paid free of legacy duty; and then concluded as follows:—"The £1000 so bequeathed is in the hands of my brother . . . —also £200 which latter, if not expended by me before my decease and still in his hands will be—to be taken for all just and lawful debts to give mournings to J, my servant, to the extent of £2—also mournings to" the wife of a nephew "to the extent of £5—any residue to be given to J M." By later testamentary papers the testator nominated an executor and left a number of legacies of specific articles. Her whole testamentary papers were found after her death in an envelope, on which were the words, holograph of her, "My will," and her subscription. She left property amounting to £1514, without deducting debts, which were of small amount. In a competition between J M and the testator's next of kin claiming ab intestato, held that the words "any residue" in the first testamentary paper carried the residue of the testator's general estate to J M, and not merely the balance of the sum of £200 mentioned in the immediately preceding clause of the paper.

Millar v Morrison, 1894, 21 R. 921; 31 S.L.R. 772; 2 S.L.T. 102.

Implied bequest of residue—"Residuary legatees"—Any surplus to be applied to payment of legacy duty—Express exclusion of next of kin.

A testator in his last will declared his executors "accountable to the residuary legatees hereinafter named" for their introductions. He bequeathed various sums to certain institutions and individuals, and further directed—"If there is as much money left after all the bequests is fully made, I appoint my executors to pay the Government legacy tax on all these legacies, and if any return ever comes from the Western bank, as I paid all my calls in full, my executors is fully empowered to give in proportional parts to the above-mentioned institutions and persons mentioned." He expressly excluded his next of kin from right or interest in his moveable succession. Held that the legatees named were entitled to the residue.

Robertson v Scoular, 1867, 40 J. 6; 5 S.L.R. 4.

(911)

"Executor" and "universal intromitter"—Right to residue.

By holograph writings a testator appointed one of his nieces to be "executor" and "universal intromitter" with his "goods and money," "except what is otherwise mentioned afterwards," "under the following burdens—to pay my debts and the following legacies." Held that the executor had been named universal legatary, and was entitled to the residue of the estate.

Jamieson v Clark, 1872, 10 M. 399; 44 J. 225; 9 S.L.R. 233.

(912)

General or particular residue.

A testatrix directed her trustees to pay a sum of £10,000 to two persons in liferent, and a third person and his heirs in fee, and also a large number of other legacies to different persons, and she appointed a residuary legatee. By a codicil, on the narrative that the intended fiar of the £10,000 had predeceased, she recalled the appointment to pay the sum to him and his heirs, and after the expiry of liferents she directed legacies to be paid out of the £10,000 to five different charities (amounting in all to £6700), and to pay "the balance of the fee of said principal sum of £10,000, being £3300, to A B and C D, equally between them, and their respective heirs." A legacy of £1000, one of the five left to charities, lapsed. Held that it fell into the general residue of the estate, and was not included in the legacy to A B and C D.

Brown v M'Laë's Trustees, 1877, 5 R. 37; 15 S.L.R. 27.

Bequest of corporeal moveables—Appointment of residuary legatee—Ejusdem generis.

Terms of a holograph writing disposing of specific articles of jewellery and other corporeal moveables and constituting "my daughter J my residuary legatee," which were held not to revoke the residuary bequest contained in a prior general settlement, but to carry only corporeal moveables ejusdem generis with those enumerated in the context.

Gore Booth's Trustee v Gore Booth, 1898, 25 R. 803; 35 S.L.R. 606; 5 S.L.T. 381.

Residue clause or clause operating on what was not bequeathed—Lapsed legacy.

Held that the words "What there may be over is divided among heirs hereto mentioned" occurring at the end of a holograph will was not a proper residue clause, but was intended only to operate upon what the testator had not already bequeathed, and consequently did not carry lapsed legacies.

M'Crorie's Curator Bonis v M'Crorie, (O.H.) 1909, 1 S.L.T. 544.

(915)

"Whatever more money."

A testatrix directed as to the residue of her estate that her trustees were to make over the same, and any accumulations thereof, in such manner and way as she should direct, and failing any such directions, "then to my own nearest heirs, executors, and successors whomsoever." By codicils to the settlement a number of legacies of sums of money and of specific articles were left to various persons. One of these codicils contained the following clause:—"Whatever more money I leave after paying my lawful debts to be divided amongst my legatees." Questions having arisen as to who was entitled to the residue of the estate, held that on a sound construction of the deeds the trustee intended by the words used in her last codicil to divide the residue of her estate among the legatees to whom pecuniary legacies had been bequeathed.

Keith v Fraser, 1883, 20 S.L.R. 785.

2. SUBJECTS FORMING PART OF RESIDUE.

(916)

Undisposed of income of particular fund.

A testator conveyed his whole estate to trustees, and directed them to divide and pay over to the children of his niece, "after the youngest child has attained the age of twenty-five years complete, but not till then, the sum of £10,000 equally amongst them, share and share, and it is specially provided and declared that said provisions in favour of the children of my niece shall not become vested interests in them until the same shall be absolutely conveyed, paid, or made over to them by my said trustees. (Third) I direct and appoint my said trustees to hold as much of my means and estate as will pay the foresaid sum of £10,000 as aforesaid, and at the first term of Martinmas happening six months after my death, to divide, convey, and make over the whole remainder or residue of my means and estate" to certain persons named. Held that the sum of £10,000 fell to be paid from the general estate only on the youngest child attaining twenty-five years, and therefore that any accumulations prior to that date fell into residue.

—Vesting of legacy suspended until legatee twenty-five.

A testator directed his trustees to convey certain estates in India to his eldest son on his attaining the age of twenty-five. The son did not take a vested right until that date. The income accruing between the testator's death and the date when the son attained twenty-five was not expressly disposed of, and the testator directed that until that date arrived the trustees were to expend a sum not exceeding £200 on the son's maintenance and education. A clause in the will dealing with provisions to daughters contained an express direction to accumulate. There was a residue clause whereby the testator directed his trustees to divide and make over the whole residue and remainder of his estate among his children on their respectively attaining twenty-one. Held that the income of the Indian estate was not to be accumulated for the eldest son but fell into residue.

Brodie v Brodie's Trustees, 1893, 20 R. 795; 30 S.L.R. 713; 1 S.L.T. 71.

Legacies payable "as at" testator's death and on legatees attaining majority.

A testator bequeathed legacies of £10,000 to each of his children, declaring that these should be "payable as at my death, and on" the legatees "respectively attaining twenty-one years of age, or, in the case of females, on their respective marriages before attaining said age, and the same shall not vest until the period of payment." Power was given to the trustees to advance the available income of the legacies for the education and maintenance, or otherwise for the benefit of the children respectively, and to anticipate, if they pleased, the period of vesting and payment. Held that the interest accruing on each legacy between the date of the testator's death and the period of payment belonged to the legatee.

Undisposed of rents of heritage.

A testator directed his trustees as soon as convenient after his death to sell his estate of A and apply £4000 of the price in reducing the debt on his estate of B. On the death of his brother the testator directed his trustees to convey B to certain persons subject to the burden of the existing debt on the estate less the £4000 to be paid by the trustees. A was not sold until seventeen years after the testator's death, and when sold it realised less than £2500. Held that the rents of A accruing between the testator's death and the date of the sale fell into residue.

Adam's Trustees v Wilson, 1899, 1 F. 1042; 36 S.L.R. 819.

Undisposed of income of residue—Two residues.

A testatrix directed her trustees, in the fourth place, as soon as they should think expedient after her death, to realise the "whole residue and remainder" of her estate, and to hold the proceeds thereof for behoof of her two sisters in life, and to pay over the annual proceeds to "them equally during their joint lives, and in the event of either of my said sisters predeceasing me, or upon the death of either of them after my decease, my trustees shall pay over one-half of the said free proceeds or income to her children equally, share and share alike, if more than one, during the lifetime of the survivor of my said sisters, and the other half to such survivor." The testatrix then in the fifth place directed that after the death of the longest liver of her sisters "my trustees shall pay over and divide the whole free residue and remainder of my said means and estate" to certain persons specified. After the death of one of the sisters and of her only child, survived by the other sister, held that the life interest of one-half of the residue directed to be realised in the fourth purpose did not accrete to the surviving sister, nor fall into intestacy, but was to be accumulated and divided, as part of the residue, under the fifth purpose.

(921)

Gift of fee to issue of marriage, payable at death of husband—Fee vesting in children at wife's death—Disposal of income accruing prior to husband's death.

By an assignation in trust made in contemplation of marriage, the wife conveyed her estate to trustees in trust, inter alia, after her death, if there were no issue of the marriage, for behoof of the husband in life, so long as he remained unmarried, for behoof of the issue, if any, of the marriage "then" surviving, and the issue per stirpes of predeceasing, payable at majority or marriage, whichever of these events should first happen, after the decease of the longer liver of the spouses, if the wife should be the survivor, "but after the decease or second marriage of" the husband "if he shall be the longer liver." The wife died intestate, survived by the husband and by two children of the marriage, who were both major. Held that the fee vested in the children on the death of their mother, and that the income until the period of payment did not fall into intestacy, but belonged to the children as an accessory of the fee.

Bate's Trustees v Bate, 1906, 8 F. 861; 43 S.L.R. 660; 14 S.L.T. 95.

Accumulations of income before fee has vested.

A testator gave a life interest of an equal share of the residue of his estate to each of his children and the fee to the issue of such child, vesting being postponed till the issue should attain majority or be married. The trustees were empowered, in the event of a life tenant dying leaving issue, to apply "the annual proceeds of their presumptive shares," or such part thereof as they might think proper, towards the maintenance and education of such issue till they should attain majority or be married. One of the testator's children died survived by a child, for whose maintenance and education the trustees applied part of the income of the share which the parent would have life-tenanted. They accumulated the remainder of the income until the child's majority. Held that the income so accumulated did not accrue to the child's share, but fell into residue.

Vesting suspended until death of life tenant—Life tenant restricted to one-third on remarriage—Disposal of remaining two-thirds.

A testatrix directed her trustees to pay the income of her whole estate to her husband, the provision in his favour being restrictable to one-third in the event of his remarriage. The vesting of the fee was suspended until the death of the life tenant. There was no provision for the disposal of the two-thirds of the income which would be set free in the event of the husband entering into a second marriage. The husband having remarried, held that the two-thirds of the income accruing between his second marriage and his death fell into intestacy.

(924)

Gift to heirs of B's body—B in life at testator's death—Disposal of income accruing prior to B's death.

A testator directed his trustees that the residue of his estate should be made over to the heirs of the body of A, whom failing, to the heirs of the body of B. The income of the residue was not specifically disposed of. The testator was predeceased by A without issue and survived by B, and the heirs of the body of B could not be ascertained until her death. Held that there was an implied direction to accumulate the income until the death of B.

(925)

Lands of X entailed—Direction to pay off entailor's debts out of proceeds of unentailed lands—Direction to entail unentailed lands so far as unsold—Income of estate extended on formation of streets and drains—Right of heir of entail to repayments by feuars.

A died in 1865, leaving (1) a disposition and deed of entail conveying his estate of X to his nephew B and the heirs of his body; and (2) a trust disposition and settlement whereby he directed that his trustees should, "out of the proceeds" of certain unentailed lands, "pay off the remainder of the said heritable debt affecting the estate of X, and interest thereon," and should have full power to sell or feu for that purpose. He also provided that, if any part of the lands remained unsold after the whole debt should be paid off and discharged, then the trustees should entail the same upon the same series of heirs; but, if they should have sold more than should be necessary to pay the debt, the balance should form part of the general trust estate. The whole free residue of the trust estate, if any, was to be paid to B and his heirs. On A's death his trustees, of whom B was one, continued feuing the unentailed lands, in accordance with a plan used by A himself, and also sold part thereof. They cleared the debt off the entailed estate of X, and in 1880 entailed the remainder of the unentailed lands on the eldest son of B, who had died in 1878. In carrying out the feuing plan they spent nearly the whole income of the unentailed lands and others in making streets, sewers, and drains, the amount spent in such works to be gradually repaid by proportional payments by each feu on taking up his feu. Held that the sums received and to be received from time to time from feuars in respect of the said streets, &c., did not form part of the executry estate of B, but belonged to the heir of entail in possession of the estate of X at the time when the sums became payable.

Bequest of whole means and estate—Marriage contract funds held subject to contingent divestiture.

By antenuptial contract of marriage trustees were directed to pay the income of £2500 contributed by the wife to the spouses and the survivor of them, and at the death of the longest liver to hold the capital, and in the event of there being no children or issue of children then alive, to pay the same to the assignees, executors, or nearest of kin of the wife. The wife predeceased her husband, survived by three children of the marriage, leaving a holograph will by which she bequeathed her "whole means and estate, real and personal," to F, one of her three children. All the children of the marriage predeceased the husband. Held that by the marriage contract the wife was not divested of her right of property in the fund paid by her to the trustees, but that at the time of her death she held the same subject to a contingent divestiture, and that her right being in bonis of her was carried by her will to F.

Goodwill of business carried on by trustees.

The lessee of a public-house having died at a time when he was under notice from a railway company that they were to take the premises under compulsory powers, his testamentary trustees, on their own responsibility, secured a lease of other premises in the neighbourhood, and obtained a new licence for them, on the representation that the deceased's daughters were unprovided for, and that the new licence would take the place of the old one. The goodwill of the business was of no value. Held that the goodwill of the business carried on by the trustees in the new premises was not part of the deceased's estate.

(930)

Residue divisible in proportion to legacies and annuities—Præcipuum out of residue—Right of annuitant.

A testator, having bequeathed a number of legacies, including one to his niece E, directed his trustees to pay the residue of his estate, to the extent of £500, to E, "and the balance thereof above £500 to and among the above-named legatees and annuitants in proportion to the amount of their respective legacies." Held that E was entitled to £500 out of the residue as a præcipuum, and also to share in the balance of the residue in proportion to the bequests in her favour other than the said £500; and that an alimentary annuitant was entitled to a share of residue proportional to the capitalised value of her annuity in cash, and was not bound to accept it in the form of an addition to her annuity.

(932)

Gift of heritage—Conveyance to residuary legatee with clause of warrandice—Liability of residue to satisfy warrandice.

In a trust disposition and settlement, executed in 1853, the grantor conveyed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees, for the purpose, inter alia, failing heirs of his body, of conveying his estate of M, and his other lands in the county of L, to his brother, and the heirs of his body, under the fetters of an entail. By the same deed he directed his trustees, failing his own issue, to make over the whole residue of his estate to the person who should succeed to M. By a codicil, dated in 1876, he disposed to his wife, in the event of her surviving him, the lands of B and A (which were among the lands originally directed to be entailed), and bequeathed to her the whole residue of his estate. The disposition of B and A contained a clause of absolute warrandice. In 1882 the truster granted a bond and disposition in security for £250,000 over the estates of M, B, and A. Held that the obligation of warrandice was a personal obligation which fell to be satisfied out of the moveable estate before the residue could be ascertained, and that the widow was not entitled to be relieved by the truster's heir.

Direction to sell estate A and apply £4000 out of the price in disburdening estate B—Estate not realising £4000—Whether balance payable out of residue.

A testator directed his trustees, as soon as convenient after his death, to sell his estate of A and to apply £4000 of the price in reducing the debt of £14,000 with which his estate of B was burdened, and, after the death of his brother, to convey B to certain persons "subject to the real burden of the bond presently affecting the said lands to the extent of £10,000, part of the principal sum of £14,000 therein contained (the sum of £4000 being payable by my trustees in part of the principal sum as herein provided)." The price received for A was only £2400 or thereby. Held that the persons to whom the testator had left B were not entitled to have that estate disburdened of the balance of the £4000 which the price of A did not cover.

Legitim—Special destinations in bonds.

By a trust disposition the testator left the residue of his estate to his children. His estate included various sums invested in bonds with destinations in favour of the testator and his wife or the survivor which were not revoked by the trust disposition. Held that legitim was payable in the first instance out of the residue, and, the residue being sufficient to meet the claim, that no part thereof fell to be paid out of the sums invested in the bonds.

XIII. DESTINATIONS.

1. INSTITUTION OR CONDITIONAL INSTITUTION.

(935)

"And" equivalent to "whom failing"—Will partly written and partly printed.

A printed form for a will was filled up by a testator to read thus (the words in italics being written)—"Bequeath to and in favour of M M'L, my spouse, residing in 22 C Street, Glasgow, and my heirs and assignees" the testator's whole estate. The deed further bore—"But these presents are granted and shall be accepted by the said M M'L, my spouse . . . under the burden of the payment of my whole just and lawful debts." The testator was survived by his widow. Held that the deed imported a bequest of the testator's whole estate to his widow, and not a joint bequest to her and his own heirs.

Direction to divide capital equally among liferenter's children and grandchildren per stirpes.

A testator directed his trustees to pay the annual income of a certain share of his estate to R during her life, and on her death to divide the capital "equally among the children and grandchildren of the said R per stirpes." R died survived by (1) a son A, who had no children, (2) a son B, who had children, and (3) certain grandchildren, the children of a deceased daughter C. In a special case brought after R's death B's children contended (1) that they were each entitled to take an equal share along with their father in a third of the capital; or (2) alternatively that they were entitled, equally among them, to one-half, and their father to the other half, of the third of the capital. Held that it was the testator's intention to call grandchildren only where their parent had predeceased the liferentrix, R, and that accordingly B was entitled to the whole third.

Destination of residue to brother and sister and their children and the children of predeceasing sister — Whether children took pari passu with parents.

A testator directed his trustees to pay over the residue of his estate to his brother and sisters and their children and the children of his deceased sister. Held that the children of the testator's surviving brother and sister were not entitled to share per capita along with their parents in the distribution of the residue, but were only entitled to share per stirpes in the event of the failure of their parents.

Murray, 1873, 45 J. 574.

(938)

Direction to divide equally between A and his children and B and his children.

A testator by the residuary clause of his will provided—"I bequeath the remainder of my estate . . . to be divided equally between my brother P and his children and my brother G and his children, my nephews J and A, sons of my brother P, not to participate in this last bequest." Held that the bequest was not one to the brothers with a conditional institution of their respective children, but was a bequest to the brothers and their children (other than the two who had been excluded) concurrently.

Residuary legatee—Nature of right to contingent legacy on lapse.

Where a testament contains a conditional bequest and a bequest of residue, the residuary legatee does not, on the lapse of the conditional legacy, take the subject as a conditional institute, but the conditional bequest is to be regarded as a mere burden upon the original gift of residue, which flies off upon the lapse.

2. CONDITIONAL INSTITUTION OR SUBSTITUTION.

(1) HERITAGE.

(940)

Destination to A B, whom failing to testatrix's heirs, assignees, and disponees.

The destination to house property purchased by a husband with his own funds was taken to himself and his wife, "and the survivor of them, and to their or the survivor's heirs and assignees whomsoever." The spouses subsequently executed a mutual settlement of their whole estates. The wife also "without prejudice to the foresaid generality," and with consent of her husband, disposed her half of the house property to her husband in liferent allennary, "and to and in favour of my said son . . . whom failing, to my own heirs and assignees and disponees whomsoever in fee." The son survived his mother, but predeceased his father intestate. Held that the special conveyance by the wife imported not merely a conditional institution, but also a substitution in favour of her own heir whatsoever to her half of the house property, and that the succession opened to him as heir of provision on the son's death.

Watson v Giffen, 1884, 11 R. 444; 21 S.L.R. 299.

Destination to children of marriage, whom failing to heirs and assignees of wife — Marriage contract.

By a marriage contract heritable subjects belonging to the wife were disposed in fee "to the children of said intended marriage equally among them, share and share alike, whom failing to the heirs and assignees" of the wife. Held that the last clause of the destination was a substitution, not merely a conditional institution.

Smith's Trustees v Smith's Trustees, 1905, 7 F. 815; 42 S.L.R. 657; 13 S.L.T. 190.

Destination to B, and failing B to testator's nearest heirs and to heirs and assignees of "my said disponees."

A, by mortis causa deed, disposed certain heritable property to his nephew B, "but always under the express condition of his continuing to profess the Roman Catholic religion, and failing the said B, by death or abandoning his said religion, then to my own nearest heirs professing the Roman Catholic religion, and to the heirs and assignees whomsoever of my said disponees." B, who survived A, throughout his life professed the Roman Catholic religion, and died intestate, leaving issue. Held that A's "own nearest heirs professing the Roman Catholic religion," were conditional institutes, and not substitutes, and that therefore B's heirs were at his death entitled to succeed, and were not affected by the condition.

Hay v Brown, 1883, 10 R. 460; 20 S.L.R. 311.

Destination over in event of institute's death without issue — Lands to "revert back" to testator's nephew—Vesting—Whether vesting a morte or at death of liferentrix.

A testator by holograph settlement left the liferent of his whole estates, heritable and moveable, to his widow. He then disposed of the fee of his estates, and, inter alia, provided—"I leave to my nephew J F W my estate of B, but I wish it expressly understood that in the event of my said nephew dying without leaving any lawful heir-male of his body, then and in that event my said lands of B are to revert back to my nephew J H." J F W survived the testator, but predeceased the testator's widow unmarried, and was survived by J H. J F W left a general trust disposition and settlement of his whole estate heritable and moveable. In a question between J F W's trustees and J H, held that the fee of the lands of B vested in J F W at the testator's death, with a simple substitution in favour of J H, in the event of J F W dying without leaving an heir-male of his body, and that the substitution had been evacuated by J F W's general disposition.

Hamilton v Ritchie, 1894, 21 R. (H.L.) 35; [1894] A.C. 310; 31 S.L.R. 934; 2 S.L.T. 91.

Destination to A B and C "or" the survivor or survivors of them.

The granters of a mortis causa disposition disposed a heritable subject to A B and C, "or the survivors or survivor of them." B predeceased the longest liver of the granters. Held that the destination over to survivors was a conditional institution, and that the subject belonged to C and D as the survivors at the death of the longest liver of the granters. Observed that if the word "or" had been "and" the destination would have been a joint fee to the three disponees and the longest liver of them.

Chancellor v Mosman, 1872, 10 M. 995; 44 J. 557; 9 S.L.R. 646.

Disposition in favour of testator's children and their issue—Survivorship clause.

A person conveyed a heritable subject to his children "equally among them, and the lawful issue of their bodies, and failing any of them by death without lawful issue of their bodies, to the survivors equally." Held that this was a conditional institution of the grandchildren, and not a substitution.

Stiven v Brown's Trustees, 1873, 11 M. 262; 45 J. 193; 10 S.L.R. 169.

(946)

Destination to heirs of granter's body, whom failing to A—Granter leaving no heirs—Whether A takes as disponee or heir.

The granter of a mortis causa settlement disposed his heritable estate "to the heirs of my own body equally among them, share and share alike, whom failing, to A, B, C, and D, equally among them, share and share alike, and their respective heirs in fee." The granter died without leaving any heirs of his body, and the settlement was found in his repositories after his death. Held (by a Court of seven judges) that A, B, C, and D took as conditional institutes, and not substitutes, and acquired right to the property as disponees without service or declarator.

Hutchison v Hutchison, 1872, 11 M. 229; 45 J. 156; 10 S.L.R. 154.

(947)

Lands destined to A and his heirs and assignees — Destination over in event of A dying intestate, without leaving heirs of his body and without otherwise disposing of the lands.

A disposed mortis causa his whole estate to his brother B "and his heirs and assigns whomsoever," declaring that should B die intestate and without heirs of his body the same should devolve upon certain heirs. B made up title as heir at law of A without reference to the disposition. He died without issue but leaving a trust settlement executed on deathbed. Held that, so far as regarded heritage acquired by B from A, B's heir had no title or interest to reduce this settlement ex capite lecti, as A's deed contained a valid substitution excluding him.

Park's Curator v Black, 1868, 6 M. (H.L.) 147; L.R., 1 H.L. Sc. 392; 40 J. 462; 5 S.L.R. 726.

Direction to trustees to take conveyance in liferent to testator's children with fee to their issue and failing issue to surviving children.

A testator directed his trustees to invest the share of the residue of his estate falling to his daughters, in heritable property or heritable security, and to take the rights in favour of the daughters in liferent allanarly, and to their issue and failing issue to the survivors of the testator's children. Held that the direction to invest the testator's daughters' shares of residue being a direction to invest in heritage, the presumption was for substitution and not merely conditional institution; that there was nothing in the settlement to overcome that presumption; and that therefore the only child of a daughter having died without evacuating the substitution, the share liferented by that daughter passed to the testator's surviving children as substitutes under the destination, and not to the heir of the daughter's child.

Brown's Trustees v Smith, 1900, 2 F. 817; 37 S.L.R. 673.

Direction to convey to A and the heirs of his body, whom failing to other persons.

In a trust settlement the trustees were directed to lay out the residue of the trust estate (amounting to £60,000) in the purchase of lands, and when the whole residue, or within £300 thereof, was so invested, to deliver a disposition of the lands to the brother of the testatrix (who predeceased her) in liferent and his son and the heirs whatsoever of his body in fee, whom failing to certain other persons. Held that the destination to the heirs of the nephew's body and the ulterior destinations were substitutions, not conditional institutions.

Spens v Monypenny's Trustees, 1875, 3 R. 50; 13 S.L.R. 25 and 45.

Direction to convey heritage to A, whom failing to his issue.

A testator by his trust disposition and settlement conveyed his whole estates, heritable and moveable, to trustees, and directed them, inter alia, at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after his death to convey certain lands named "to Gavin, my youngest son, whom failing to his lawful children equally among them." Gavin survived his father. The trustees, on the narrative of the trust disposition and settlement, conveyed the lands therein specified "to Gavin, whom failing to his children equally among them, whom failing to his heirs and assignees whomsoever." This disposition was recorded "on behalf of Gavin." Gavin died intestate survived by two sons. Held (1) that the provisions of the trust disposition and settlement imported a conditional institution and not a substitution; (2) that the destination inserted in the conveyance by the trustees was unauthorised, and had no effect; and consequently (3) that Gavin's elder son as his heir at law was entitled to the whole lands.

Direction to convey heritable subject on death of liferenters to A, whom failing to the heirs of his body, whom failing to the testator's heirs-male.

Direction to convey residue on daughter attaining majority to daughter in liferent allanarly and to her issue in fee—Failing daughter and her issue to convey fee to trustees for charity.

A testator directed his trustees, after payment of certain annuities and legacies, to convey the liferent of the residue of his estate to his daughter J S for her liferent use allanarly, when she should attain the age of twenty-one, and to the heirs of her body in fee. The deed then proceeded—"And failing my said daughter . . . and the issue of her body . . . I direct my trustees to convey the fee of the residue" to certain trustees for charitable purposes. The legacies and annuities were all satisfied, and J S attained the age of twenty-one in 1852. The trustees did not execute any conveyance. In a special case presented in 1889, held (1) that the trustees were bound to execute a conveyance to J S in liferent for her liferent use allanarly and her children in fee; and (2) that the trustees for the charity were conditional institutes who were entitled to take only in the event of J S dying in minority and without issue.

Simpson's Trustees v Simpson, 1889, 17 R. 248; 27 S.L.R. 175.

(2) MOVEABLE AND MIXED ESTATE.

(953)

Mixed estate.

Observed (per Lord Cowan)—"As regards heritable subjects the presumption of law is in favour of substitution, while as regards moveable, conditional institution. The case we have before us is one of a general succession, and we have to consider the intention of the testatrix, and as the conveyance is of both heritable and moveable estate, under a deed intended to take effect immediately on her death, I think we must hold it to be a case of conditional institution."

(954)

Gift to A in fee—Direction as to disposal of estate on his death.

A testator bequeathed his whole estate to his wife in fee, directing that on her death his said estates, heritable and moveable, which might remain at that date, should be divided and conveyed to certain of his own relatives. The wife made up title to and sold a small part of the heritage and died without having made up a title to the remainder of it. In a question between the assignee of the wife's heir at law and the testator's own relatives, held that the destination contained a substitution of the testator's own relatives, and that the testator's own relatives took the remainder of the heritage.

Olipphant v Turnbull, (O.H.) 1895, 2 S.L.T. 536.

(955)

Moveables to be conveyed along with heritage.

A truster directed his trustees to pay over the free yearly income of his estate, heritable and moveable, to his son. In the event of the latter dying without lawful issue, the trustees were directed to dispose and convey the truster's heritage, with his plate and pictures, to J, his nephew, and the lawful heirs of his body, whom failing, to G, a younger nephew, and the lawful heirs of his body. The truster's son survived him, and died without issue, and J survived the latter about six months, and died unmarried and intestate. Held that the plate and pictures fell to be conveyed along with the heritage to G, as substitute heir of provision.

———Destination to A and B—Destination over to survivor on death of either without heirs of body.

A testator assigned and disposed to A and B, "equally between them, and in the case of the death of either without heirs of his or her body to the survivor of them, my whole real and personal effects whatsoever." Held that this was a conditional institution and not a substitution; and that both A and B having survived the testator, the share of the predeceaser who died intestate without heirs of his body went to his heir at law.

———To A and B and the survivor, whom failing, to C and D.

A testator disposed his whole heritable and moveable estate to his two sisters "equally between them and to the survivor of them, whom failing, to" his nephews and nieces. He died, survived by his sisters, leaving both heritable and moveable estate. One of the sisters died intestate. Held that the destination imported a conditional institution and not a substitution of the survivor, and that the survival of the testator by the deceased sister evacuated the institution of the nephews and nieces to her share.

M'Lay v Chalmers, (O.H.) 1903, 11 S.L.T. 223.

(958)

———Legacy to A—Gift over in case A die without issue.

A testatrix, by her holograph will, bequeathed a sum of £8000 to a nephew, "his heirs, executors, and administrators absolutely, provided always, nevertheless, that in case my nephew shall die without issue, I appoint the said sum of £8000" to be divided equally between certain charities. By a later passage in the will she bequeathed to a legatee the interest of £500, and provided that "if my nephew survives me the principal sum of five hundred (is to be placed in trust for him), he receiving the interest only, and this also applies to the eight thousand pounds left him as above." When the will was made the nephew was confined in an asylum, and his affairs were being managed by a curator bonis. He died after the testatrix, intestate and without issue. Held (1) that the bequest vested in the nephew in fee, and (2) that there was no substitution of the charities, but merely a conditional institution of them in the event of the nephew predeceasing the testatrix without issue.

———Destination of husband's estate to wife, and on her death before or after him to husband's surviving children — Marriage contract.

By antenuptial marriage contract the husband conveyed his whole means and estate to the wife in case she should survive him, and failing her by decease either before or after him, to his lawful children surviving at the death of the longest liver of himself and the wife. On her part the wife conveyed her whole property, about £300, to the husband de præsenti and renounced her legal rights. The husband predeceased the wife, leaving only moveable estate. There were no children of the marriage, but the husband was survived by children by a previous marriage. The wife was confirmed executor-nominate, and entered on the possession and management of the husband's estate. Held, on her death, that the terms of the marriage contract imported a proper substitution in favour of the husband's children.

Dyer v Carruthers, 1874, 1 R. 943; 11 S.L.R. 539.

———Destination over failing exercise by wife of power of disposal.

A testator disposed his whole estate to his wife, and further provided "in the event of the said" wife "predeceasing me, or should I predecease her and she fail to exercise the power of disposal given her by this deed, then I direct my executor after-mentioned to realise the whole of my estate . . . above conveyed" and to pay certain specified legacies. The testator nominated an executor. He was survived by his wife. On the testator's death the executor took out confirmation and obtained possession of the testator's whole estate, which was entirely moveable. The widow died within six months after the testator without doing anything to dispose of his estate, which remained in the possession of the executor. Held that, on the death of the testator, the wife became absolute owner of the testator's estate, and that it passed on her death to her next of kin.

———Mutual settlement—Destination to surviving grantor, and on her death to H and M—Necessity for service to vest right in substitute.

By mutual disposition and settlement two sisters disposed their whole estates, heritable and moveable, and specially the proindiviso shares of certain subjects in which they stood infett, to each other and the longest liver, and on the death of the longest liver to their nieces, H and M, declaring that the survivor of the nieces should succeed to the share of her sister predeceasing without issue. M died before the last survivor of the granters, leaving a daughter J, who survived both the granters. Held that H and M were substitutes, and not conditional institutes, and that accordingly no right had vested in J without service.

———Gift of fee to children—Direction to settle daughter's share for them in liferent and their issue in fee—Destination over on failure of issue.

A testator provided that the residue of his estate should belong to his children equally, declaring that the shares of daughters should be alimentary and not affectable by their acts or deeds and not subject to the jus mariti of their husbands, and directing that the shares should be invested by the trustees "taking the writings thereof conceived in favour of my said daughters, to the extent of their interests respectively, in liferent for their liferent use allennarly, and to the child or children lawfully procreated or to be procreated of their bodies, in fee, share and share alike, and failing such child or children, then the same at their death to return in equal proportions to their unmarried sisters, if any, and failing thereof to the surviving married sisters in the like proportions, and in both cases in liferent, for their liferent use allennarly . . . and to the child or children lawfully procreated of their bodies, share and share alike, and failing thereof to their next of kin or assignees in fee." Held that each daughter took a fee a morte testatoris in her own share, defeasible only in the event of her having issue, and that all the branches of the destination after that in favour of the daughter and her issue were substitutions merely.

Logan's Trustees v Ellis, 1890, 17 R. 425; 27 S.L.R. 322.

———Bequest to A and his heirs and assignees—Predecease of A.

A testator, on the narrative that he had already provided for his daughter in her antenuptial contract, and that it was his wish to provide further for his wife in the event of her surviving him, disposed his whole means and estate in favour of his wife and "her heirs and assignees whomsoever." The wife predeceased the husband. Held that the conveyance of residue was intended to be contingent on the wife's survivance, and that her heirs were not named as conditional institutes. Opinion (per Lord President Inglis) that as a general rule, where there is a mortis causa disposition to a person, his heirs and assignees, failing the donee his heirs will take.

Findlay v Mackenzie, 1875, 2 R. 909; 12 S.L.R. 597.

(966)

A husband by disposition, on the narrative that it was a duty incumbent on him to settle his affairs in case of his death, and for the love, favour, and affection he bore to E, his wife, disposed to her, "her heirs, executors, and assignees whomsoever," certain heritable property specified, and also his whole other estate, heritable and moveable. The wife predeceased the husband without children. The husband married again and died without issue and without having altered the settlement. In a question between the first wife's heir at law and the husband's heir at law, held that the former was entitled to the heritable property as conditional institute.

Cleland v Allan, 1891, 18 R. 377; 28 S.L.R. 264.

(967)

A testator left his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to his wife and "her heirs, executors, and assignees whomsoever." The wife predeceased the testator. Held that the destination imported a conditional institution of the wife's heir, who was entitled to the estate in preference to the testator's heirs.

Duncan v Halkett, (O.H.) 1894, 2 S.L.T. 58.

(968)

———Testator heir to institute—Bequest to testator's mother and mother's "heirs and assignees" whomsoever.

An only child by mortis causa settlement left her whole estate to her mother, "M S, and her heirs and assignees whomsoever." The mother predeceased the child. Held that the settlement was ineffectual, the testator being herself her mother's heir.

Birnie v Simpson's Trustees, 1893, 20 R. 481; 30 S.L.R. 259.

(969)

A testator, by his trust settlement, directed his trustees to convey the residue of his estate to B H, "my youngest surviving daughter, and her heirs and assignees (the whole of the other members of my family having been already provided for by me)." Besides the daughter here named, there were alive of the truster's family at the date of the deed one son and a married daughter by his first marriage, and three married daughters by his second marriage. The grantee in the above-mentioned provision having predeceased the truster, held that her heirs were entitled to the residue as conditional institutes.

Halliburton, 1884, 11 R. 979; 21 S.L.R. 686.

Provision or legacy—Daughter predeceasing testatrix without issue.

A widow died in 1903, having in 1870 executed a disposition and settlement, whereby "for the settlement of the succession to my means and estate after my decease," she assigned and disposed "to my daughter, Jessie, and her heirs and assignees whomsoever absolutely all and sundry the whole means and estate presently belonging or which shall belong to me at my decease," and she nominated Jessie to be her sole executrix, declaring "that the provision hereby made in favour of the said Jessie shall be exclusive always of the jus mariti," &c., of any husband of Jessie. The grantor then reserved her own liferent and dispensed with delivery. Jessie, who was her mother's only child, predeceased her mother and left no issue. Her mother was thus one of Jessie's heirs in mobilibus ab intestata. Held that the disposition in favour of Jessie and her heirs and assignees was not a provision which had lapsed in consequence of Jessie having predeceased her mother, but was a proper testamentary bequest, and that Jessie's heirs took as conditional institutes.

Macleod v Wilson, 1903, 6 F. 213; 41 S.L.R. 130; 11 S.L.T. 488.

Marriage contract — Antenuptial marriage contract.

A husband, by his antenuptial marriage contract, made certain provisions for his wife "if she shall survive him," and she on the other part conveyed to him "and his heirs and assignees whomsoever" the whole estate belonging to her at the date of the marriage, or that she might acquire during its subsistence, or that should belong to her at her death, with the exception of the marriage contract provisions in her favour. The marriage was dissolved by the death of the husband, and the wife subsequently acquired considerable funds, and then died intestate. Held that the conveyance by the wife in favour of her husband, and his heirs and assignees, was subject to the implied condition that he should survive her.

Russell's Trustees, 1887, 14 R. 849; 24 S.L.R. 610.

Marriage contract — Heirs and assignees, whom failing, to nearest heir.

In a marriage contract the father of the wife disposed a heritable estate to himself in liferent, for his liferent use alienarily, and to his daughter "and the heirs of her body, or her assignees and disponees, whom all failing," to the nearest heirs whomsoever of the disposer in fee. The daughter, who was an only child, died without disposing and without issue, and was survived by her father. Held that, the father having survived his daughter, the destination to his heirs was ineffectual, and that there being no subsequent destination the succession devolved on him as his daughter's heir at law.

Mutual settlement.

A husband and wife executed a mutual settlement, by which the husband, on his part gave, granted, assigned, and disposed to and in favour of his wife "in case she shall survive me, and to her heirs, executors, and assignees whomsoever," the whole estate of which he should die possessed, and in like manner the wife gave, granted, assigned, and disposed to and in favour of her husband, "in case he shall survive me, and to his heirs, executors, and assignees whomsoever," the whole estate of which she should die possessed. The husband predeceased the wife by a few days. The spouses left only moveable property. Held, on a construction of the whole deed, that the gift by the wife to her husband and his heirs, executors, and assignees whomsoever, was conditional upon his survivance of her, and that, as he had predeceased, the whole property left by the spouses fell to the wife's heirs in mobilibus ab intestata.

Baillie's Executor v Baillie, 1899, 1 F. 974; 36 S.L.R. 739; 7 S.L.T. 54.

(974)

A husband and wife executed a mutual settlement by which, "for the mutual love and affection which we bear to each other," the husband assigned and disposed to his wife, "in case she shall survive me, and to her heirs, executors, and assignees whomsoever," the whole estate of which he should die possessed, and the wife assigned and disposed to her husband, "in case he shall survive me, and to his heirs, executors, and assignees whomsoever," the whole estate of which she should die possessed. The spouses reserved power "to us and each of us during our joint lives to alter or revoke these presents." In exercise of this reserved power the husband made a will, in which, after providing for certain legacies, he bequeathed his whole moveable estate to his wife. The wife made no further testamentary disposition. The husband died first, and after the wife's death a question arose as to the destination of her property, which consisted solely of the estate which she had taken under her husband's will. Held that the bequest by the wife in the mutual settlement to her husband, and to his heirs, executors, and assignees, was conditional upon his survivance of her, and that, as he had predeceased, the destination did not take effect, and her property fell to her heirs in mobilibus ab intestata.

Garden's Executor v More, 1913 S.C. 285; 50 S.L.R. 249; 1912, 2 S.L.T. 482.

A mutual will executed by spouses contained the following provisions by the wife:—

"I . . . do hereby . . . dispo[n]e to and in favour of the said R L, my husband, in the event of his surviving me, and to his heirs, executors or assignees whomsoever, all and sundry my whole heritable and moveable means and estate." Held that it was not the wife's intention that the husband's heirs, executors or assignees should be conditional institutes, and that, the husband having predeceased the wife, the bequest lapsed.

Ferguson v Lord Advocate, (O.H.) 1906, 13 S.L.T. 724.

Heirs and assignees of wife—Antenuptial trust deed—Husband's rights under foreign law.

A domiciled Scotswoman, in contemplation of marriage, conveyed her whole means and estate to trustees for payment of the income to herself and of the fee to her children, and failing children, then for behoof of her own "heirs and assignees." She married a domiciled Australian, and died in Australia a few years afterwards without issue and without leaving any other writing disposing of her estate. It appeared from the opinion of Australian counsel that by Australian law the whole moveable estate of a wife predeceasing her husband intestate passed to the husband, but it did not appear that the husband was on that account regarded as an "heir" of his wife by the law of Australia. Held (1) that the wife had not died intestate, the destination to her "heirs" being an effectual conditional institution; and (2) that the husband was not entitled to the estate, in respect that he was not an "heir" of his wife either by the law of Scotland or by the law of Australia.

Brown's Trustees v Brown, 1890, 17 R. 1174; 27 S.L.R. 995.

4. CLAUSES OF RETURN OR OF DEVOLUTION.

(977)

Clause of return or substitution.

A, by her settlement, appointed B to be her sole executor and universal legatary under burden of a bequest of £4000 to be paid at the first term after her death to C, but declaring that if C "shall die without lawful issue, then the half of the said sum of £4000 shall return to and belong to" B and his heirs, with power to C to dispose of the other half as she might think proper. A was survived by both B and C, and the legacy was paid to C. Held that the provision in favour of B and his heirs was not a clause of return, but a simple substitution.

Buchanan's Trustees v Dalziel's Trustees, 1868, 6 M. 536; 40 J. 273; 5 S.L.R. 325.

(978)

Devolution on heir succeeding to a peerage—Validity—Construction.

A clause in a mortis causa disposition of heritage provided that each of the heirs who should succeed to the lands should be obliged in all time to use the disponer's name and arms, and that "in case any of the said heirs shall succeed to a peerage, then, when the person so succeeding, or having right to succeed, to my said lands shall also succeed to a peerage, they shall be bound and obliged to denude themselves of all right" in the lands, and the same should devolve on the next heir. Held (1) that this clause was not void as against public policy; (2) that it was effectual, although not protected by the fetters of an entail; and (3) that it applied to, and excluded, an heir who, prior to the opening of the succession to the lands, had succeeded to a peerage.

Earl of Caithness v Sinclair, 1912 S.C. 79; 49 S.L.R. 29; 1911, 2 S.L.T. 368.

Condition excluding child succeeding to heritable estate of father—Heir-apparent predeceasing father—Second son succeeding—Divestiture.

By marriage contract estate belonging to the wife was settled on the children of the marriage in fee excluding the eldest child of the marriage in the event of his succeeding to certain estate from his father. The marriage was dissolved by the death of the wife, survived by four children. By deed of appointment she divided her estate equally among the children surviving the longest liver of the spouses, except the son succeeding to his father's estate, the issue of any child predeceasing taking their parent's share. The eldest son predeceased his father, leaving two daughters, and the second son succeeded to the father's estates. It was held that one-fourth of his mother's estate had vested in the second son on her death, but that it suffered defeasance on his succeeding to his father's estates.

Robertson, 1869, 7 M. 1114; 41 J. 621; 6 S.L.R. 709.

Destination to heirs-male of marriage other than heir-male succeeding to certain estate—Sale of estate before succession opens.

In a marriage contract the wife's father settled the estate of E on the heir-male of the marriage "other than the heir-male . . . succeeding" to the estates of W and B." Both W and B were sold before the succession opened. Held that the words the heir-male "other than the heir-male . . . succeeding" meant the heir-male of the marriage other than the heir-male contemplated by the marriage contract as entitled to succeed and that the elder son being the heir so contemplated was excluded from succeeding to E.

Destination to children under exception of heir succeeding to an estate—Failure of heir to take.

By marriage contract the wife's father provided certain funds which were ultimately to be divided equally among the children of the marriage, "with the exception of the heir succeeding to" a certain estate belonging to the husband. The son of the marriage survived his father by a few months, but although the father left him the estate the terms of the will were such that he died before taking a vested right in it. Held that he was not an "heir succeeding to" the estate within the meaning of the marriage contract.

Bell's Trustees v Bell, (O.H.) 1916, 2 S.L.T. 250.

Condition excluding the heir in heritage of each stirps—Effect where only one of a stirps.

A bequest of residue "to be equally divided among the children then alive of my brothers and sisters, equally per capita," contained the condition "but always secluding the eldest son of each family who may have succeeded to any heritable property of his father's." Held that this condition did not apply in the case of a brother or sister having only one child.

Yeats v Paton, 1880, 8 R. 171; 18 S.L.R. 116.

(983)

Heritage disposed to A in liferent and B in fee—Declaration that subjects to transmit to A if granter died before B attained twenty-five—Repugnancy.

5. CONJUNCT DESTINATIONS.

(1) TO SPOUSES.

(984)

Conjunct fee and liferent—Disposition by wife's father—Fee in wife.

A father, by an inter vivos deed, gratuitously disposed to himself in liferent for his liferent use allanarly, and to his daughter and her husband "in conjunct fee and liferent, and to the children" of the marriage equally share and share alike, "whom all failing, to the heirs and assignees whomsoever of the longest liver" of the spouses in fee, certain heritable property belonging to him. The husband was the longest liver of the spouses, and he was survived by children of the marriage. Held that the fee was in the wife stante matrimonio, and that no fee ever vested in the husband.

Brough v Adamson, 1887, 14 R. 858; 24 S.L.R. 616.

—To spouses and survivor in conjunct fee and liferent and issue in fee—Wife's property—Ultior destination to wife's heirs—Fee in wife.

By antenuptial marriage contract the wife conveyed her whole estate acquisita and acquirenda to the husband, herself, and the survivor in conjunct fee and liferent, and to the children of the marriage and their issue in fee, whom failing, to the wife's nearest heirs and assignees in fee. Power was conferred on the spouses jointly during their joint lives, and on the survivor, to apportion the fund among the children. Held that stante matrimonio the fee of the fund was in the wife, subject to a liferent to the husband in the event of his survivance, and that the children had a spes successionis which could not be defeated by gratuitous deed.

—To spouses and survivor in conjunct fee and liferent for wife's liferent allanarly and issue in fee—Husband's property—Ultior destination to husband's heirs—Fee in husband.

By antenuptial marriage contract the husband bound himself to invest a sum of £4000, and to take the rights to himself and the wife and the survivor in conjunct fee and liferent for the wife's liferent use only, and to the children of the marriage and their issue in fee, whom failing, to the husband's heirs in fee. Held that the fee of £4000 was in the husband stante matrimonio, subject to a contingent liferent to the wife if she survived, and that the children had a spes successionis which could not be defeated by gratuitous deed.

—To spouses in conjunct fee and liferent for their liferent alimentary use allanarly—Fee in children.

By disposition a husband conveyed certain subjects "to and in favour of myself and my wife, and the longest liver of us, in conjunct fee and liferent, for our liferent alimentary use allanarly," and to the children of the marriage nominatim in fee. Held that the disposition conferred a fee on the children of the marriage, and that therefore the husband, who survived his wife, had no power to revoke the deed.

Bryson v Munro's Trustees, 1893, 20 R. 986; 30 S.L.R. 903.

—To spouses in conjunct fee and liferent, for liferent use of wife and to child in fee—Fee in husband.

In 1719 the lands of Blair were disposed to "William Dundas and Elizabeth Elphinstoun, spouses, and to the longest liver of them two in conjunct fee and liferent, for the liferent use of the said Elizabeth Elphinstoun, and to Richard Dundas, their eldest son, and the heirs-male lawfully to be pro-creat of his body, which failzieing [to certain other persons] in fee." In 1720 infettment was taken on the disposition in favour of William Dundas and Elizabeth Elphinstoun, his spouse, and longest liver of them two, in conjunct fee and liferent for the said Elizabeth Elphinstoun, her liferent use, and the said Richard Dundas, their eldest son, in fee. Held that, notwithstanding the apparent intention to limit William's interest to a liferent and to give the fee to Richard, William was the fiar and Richard only a substitute, and that there was no warrant for infetting Richard in the fee, and that the title made up by the latter in 1720 was accordingly defective.

—To spouses in conjunct fee and liferent and longest liver and their heirs—Fee in survivor.

A husband bought heritable property, and took the title to himself and his wife "in conjunct fee and liferent, and to the longest liver of them and their heirs." Held that, on the husband's death, the property belonged solely to the wife, to the exclusion of the husband's heirs.

Knox v Knox's Trustees, (O.H.) 1905, 13 S.L.T. 406.

(990)

Conjunct fee—To spouses in conjunct fee, and to the survivor in fee.

A lease for ninety-nine years was assigned to spouses "in conjunct fee and to the survivor of them in fee." Held that the fee vested in the spouses jointly, with benefit of survivorship.

Walker v Galbraith, 1895, 23 R. 347; 33 S.L.R. 246; 3 S.L.T. 214.

(991)

—To spouses and the longest liver and their heirs and assignees.

A feu disposition was granted in favour of a husband and wife, "and the longest liver of them, and their heirs and assignees." Held that under this destination the fee belonged to the spouses and the survivor.

Wallace v Henderson, 1875, 2 R. 999.

(992)

Conjunct liferent — Conjunct liferent to spouses and survivors.

By a gratuitous disposition A disposed a house to B, his brother, and C, the wife of B, in conjunct liferent, and the survivor of them for their and the survivor's liferent, and to himself, A, and C and the survivor of them in fee. A died and C was sequestrated. C's trustee in bankruptcy claimed half of the rents of the house, whereupon B brought an action of declarator that the whole rents belonged to him. Held that B was entitled to no more than one-half of the rents.

Paull v Forbes, (O.H.) 1911, 1 S.L.T. 29.

(993)

—Conjunct liferent of fund to spouses — Husband dying before liferent opened to him—Wife entitled to liferent of whole fund.

(994)

—On widow's death to grandnieces and their husbands for their, her, or his liferent — Grandniece predeceasing widow.

A testator by his will gave his wife the liferent of his estate, with the fee to certain grandnieces and grandnephews. By a codicil he directed his trustees to pay the grandnieces' shares "to them and their respective husbands only in liferent for their, her, or his liferent allenerly." One of the grandnieces survived the testator but predeceased the widow. Held that the husband of the predeceasing grandniece (who survived the testator's widow) was entitled to the liferent of his wife's share of the estate.

Richardson v Macdougall, 1868, 6 M. (H.L.) 18; 40 J. 466; 5 S.L.R. 454.

—Accumulations.

By antenuptial marriage contract a wife conveyed the whole estate belonging to her or to which she might succeed during the subsistence of the marriage to trustees for the conjunct liferent of her husband and herself during the subsistence of the marriage. On the death of the wife there were accumulations of income on her estate. Held that one-half of these accumulations were payable to the wife's executors, subject to the husband's claim for jus relict.

Stock certificate in favour of husband and wife.

On the death of A there was found in his repositories a stock certificate in the following terms:—"This is to certify that" A and Mrs. A "are proprietors of two hundred 10 per cent. preference shares" of a Scottish railway company. Held that A and Mrs. A were each proprietors of one-half of the shares, and that on A's death, survived by Mrs. A, his share belonged to his representatives.

(1) To A and B in conjunct fee and life-rent and their heirs—(2) To A and B jointly and their heirs—(3) To A and B jointly and the survivor and their heirs.

Observed (per Lord Cowan, quoting Ersk. III., viii. 36) "Where an entail is made or any right conceived in favour of two strangers in conjunct fee and life-rent and their heirs, the two are equal fiars during their joint lives, as if they had contributed equally to the purchase; but after the death of the first the survivor has the life-rent of the whole, and after the survivor's death the fee divides equally between the heirs of both. If the right be taken to two jointly and their heirs, without any mention of life-rent, the conjunct fiars enjoy the subject equally while both are alive, . . . but on the death of the first neither the fee nor even the life-rent of his half accrues to the survivor, but descends to his own heir. . . ."

"In a right taken to two jointly and the longest liver and their heirs, the words 'their heirs' are understood to denote the heirs of the longest liver, and consequently although the several shares belonging to the conjunct fiars are affectable by their several creditors while both are alive, yet upon the death of any one of them the survivor has the fee of the whole, exclusive of the heirs of the predeceased—not only the fee of his own original share, but that of the share belonging to the predeceased in so far as it is not exhausted by his debts."

To A and B jointly and to the survivor and his heirs—Power of predeceaser to revoke.

A testator died leaving a trust disposition and settlement by which he disposed of his whole means and estate, express reference being made to a superiority and certain bonds and dispositions in security. The superiority had been purchased, and the sums contained in the bonds furnished, out of funds belonging to the testator's wife, and the destinations, inserted on her instructions, were, in the case of the superiority, to her husband and her son by a former marriage "jointly, and to the survivor of them, and his heirs," and, in the case of one of the bonds, to the husband and the son "jointly, and the survivor of them, and their or his executors or assignees whomsoever," and, in the case of the other bonds, to the husband and the son "or the survivor of them, and the executors of such survivor, and to their or his assignees whomsoever." Admittedly under the destinations one-half of the superiority and one-half of the sums contained in the bonds belonged to the son, who survived the testator. With regard to the other halves, held that the testator had no power to evacuate the destinations by his settlement; and that, accordingly, these halves passed to the son as the survivor in the destinations.

Conjunct fee and life-rent—Destination to three sisters—Joint or several gift.

A widow who had purchased certain heritable subjects took the title thereto in favour of herself in life-rent, and after her death to her daughters Clara, Jane, and Mary, "in conjunct fee and life-rent, and to the heirs of their bodies, and to their assignees whomsoever, heritably and irredeemably," whom failing, to and in favour of her sons, Alexander and Charles, and their heirs and assignees whomsoever, but reserving always full power to herself at any time of her life to dispose of the subjects onerously or gratuitously, as fully as if she were absolute fiar of the same. Sasine was taken in favour of the various parties named for their respective rights of life-rent and fee. The mother died survived by her daughters Jane and Mary, and predeceased by her daughter Clara, who died unmarried. Held that under the destination Jane and Mary took each a one-third pro indiviso share only of the subjects, and that the one-third share which would have been taken by Clara had she survived her mother passed to Alexander and Charles as conditional institutes under the destination.

Legacy to be settled on legatee and issue

—Power of disposal to legatee in case of no issue—Terms of investment.

A testatrix, in her trust settlement, directed the trustees "to pay" a legacy to a lady, "to be settled by my said trustees on herself and her issue, with power to her of disposal in case of no issue, and failing issue and disposal by her, to return to her own heirs, excluding those of her husband."

Held, at a date when the legatee was forty-two years of age and had been for several years married and had no children (1) that the legatee was not entitled to have the legacy paid to herself absolutely; and (2) that the trustees were bound to invest the money and to take the securities in the name of the legatee in fee, exclusive of the ius mariti of her husband, and after her death to any children she might have, also in fee, subject to the condition that the children's right of succession should not be defeated by any gratuitous act of the legatee, and failing children, to the heirs of the legatee, excluding those of her husband.

Direction to convey residue to daughter and her children—Power of division to daughter—Jus mariti excluded—Provision declared alimentary, &c., to daughter.

A testator directed his trustees to retain the residue of his estate, heritable and moveable, till his only child, a daughter, should be married and a child born of the marriage, and upon a child being born to convey "to her and to the child or children of the marriage, or of any subsequent marriage, . . . equally among them, if she shall not otherwise appoint, but subject always to a power of division by her," and failing children of his daughter, then to the testator's nearest heirs and assignees; and he declared and directed that neither the annual proceeds nor the fee should be subject to the ius mariti or right of administration of the daughter's husband, or be subject to his or her debts or deeds, or the diligence of his or her creditors, "but that the same shall be an alimentary and inalienable provision for my said daughter during her life; and I direct my trustees to make full provision to the above effect in the conveyance or conveyances to be executed by them." At the truster's death his daughter was married and had issue. Held (by a majority of seven judges) that the trustees were bound to convey to the daughter in fee, subject to the condition that the right of succession of her children should not be defeated by any gratuitous act.

Direction to invest nieces' shares—On marriage to be settled on themselves and their children—Substitution on death without children.

A testatrix left the residue of her estate to the children of her deceased brother J H, two-fifths to her five nephews, equally among them, and the remaining three-fifths to her four nieces, also equally among them. The nephews' shares were to be "at their own disposal" as they reached the age of twenty-one. But as to the nieces' shares, the testatrix provided—"My nieces' shares are to be invested on good security, and in the event of any of them being married to be settled on themselves and their children, . . . and in the event of any of my nieces dying after me without leaving any children the amount settled on her shall revert equally after her death to the remaining branches of the family of my deceased brother J H" equally among them, the children of such of them as may have died succeeding to their parents' share. Held that the absolute fee in their shares of residue vested in the nieces of the testatrix a morte testatoris, without restriction or qualification, negating the plea on behalf of a grandnephew that a protected succession was conferred on their children, and, failing children, on "the remaining branches of the family" of J H, and their issue.

Gift of fee—Destination over on death without issue—Evacuation of destination by institute.

A testator, in 1841, disposed his whole estates, including heritage, to his two sisters, Ann and Margaret. In 1842 he, by codicil, on the narrative that his sister Ann was at present provided for, in so far altered his disposition as to dispoise his whole property to his sister Margaret should Ann be still provided for at his death, but under condition that if Margaret should "marry or predecease my sister Ann, then, in the first case, she, Ann Lyon, shall receive the half, and in the second, the whole property, &c.; provided always that if both die without marrying, the property shall go in equal shares to my two brothers, George and David, or their heirs and successors." Both sisters survived the testator but died unmarried, Ann being the predeceaser, and Margaret leaving a settlement disposing, inter alia, of the whole heritable property of which she might die possessed. Held that an absolute and indefeasible fee in the heritable properties left by the testator was conferred on Margaret, with a simple destination in favour of the testator's brothers, George and David, their heirs and successors, which had been evacuated by Margaret's settlement.

(1) DESTINATIONS MADE BY TESTATOR.

(1009)

Destination of heritage—Subsequent universal settlement — Implied revocation of destination.

In 1898 and 1902 A purchased with moneys belonging to himself certain heritable properties, taking the titles (which were registered), "to and in favour of the said A and B, wife of and residing with the said A, and to the survivor of them, and to their heirs and assignees whomsoever." A died in July, 1904, leaving a trust disposition and settlement, dated April, 1904, by which he conveyed to trustees his whole estate, heritable and moveable, including all means and estate over which he had power of disposal by will or otherwise. The purposes were to pay the liferent of the whole residue to his widow, burdened with an obligation to maintain and educate the children, and the fee to the children on the liferenter's death. Power was given to the trustees (1) to encroach upon capital if the income was insufficient for the maintenance of the widow and children, and (2) to sell and burden heritage. At his death the testator had personal estate of the value of £3337. The heritable properties above-mentioned were valued at £4900. The testator had no other heritable property. He was survived by a widow and by eight children, two in pupillarity and four in minority. Held that the settlement, read in the light of the circumstances, showed the testator's intention to evacuate the special destinations of the heritable properties, and that the settlement had this effect.

By disposition executed in implement of a sale, certain lands were conveyed to the purchaser and his wife in conjunct fee and liferent and to their assignees, whom failing, to the children of the marriage equally. A house called Haymount was erected on part of these lands. The purchaser survived his wife, and died leaving a trust disposition and settlement (executed after the date of the disposition and sale), by which he conveyed his whole estate to trustees for certain purposes. He also provided—"I wish my family and their aunt, Miss J H, to reside together at Haymount," and directed his trustees to apply the income of his estate for the maintenance of his daughters and their aunt while residing together. The trust disposition and settlement contained no express revocation of prior testamentary writings. Held that, as the testator's desire that his family should occupy the house would be frustrated if the lands were divided among his children at his death in terms of the special destination contained in the prior disposition, the special destination must be considered as impliedly revoked, and the lands dealt with as part of the general trust estate.

Destination in title to heritage—Settlement disposing property otherwise.

A mother purchased a hotel property with her own money, taking the disposition in favour of herself and her son and his heirs and assignees. The deed was never recorded, and remained in a cupboard in the bar parlour of the hotel, to which she and her son had access. Thereafter the mother died, leaving a trust settlement dealing with the property, the ultimate beneficiary under which was her grand-daughter. Held that the substitution of the son and his heirs contained in the disposition had been evacuated by the terms of the trust settlement, and that the trustees were the proprietors of the property.

Long lease — Destination evacuated by subsequent mutual settlement.

A long lease of heritage was assigned to D D and M D, his wife, "in conjunct fee, and to the survivor of them in fee, and at the death of the survivor to the heirs of the said D D and M D, equally between them." The spouses subsequently executed a mutual settlement, by which they conveyed to the survivor of them in liferent for his or her liferent use only, and at the death of the survivor to two sons of the wife by a former marriage, their whole heritable and moveable estate. At the date of the mutual settlement the spouses had no other property than the lease carried by the assignation. Held that the destination in the assignation to the heirs of the spouses was evacuated by the mutual settlement.

Destination in heritable bond evacuated by subsequent settlement.

Three sisters, J, E, and M, invested sums contributed equally by each on bonds and dispositions in security binding the debtors to repay the sums lent "to the said J, E, and M, and the survivors or last survivor of them, and to their or her executors or assignees whomsoever." J died in 1892, leaving a disposition and settlement, by which she revoked all former "dispositions and settlements" made by her, and conveyed her whole estate, heritable and moveable, to E. E died in 1896, leaving a trust disposition and settlement, by which she, without any express revocation of previous deeds, conveyed to trustees her whole estate, heritable and moveable, of every description, and directed them to pay legacies amounting to £1300 to her nephews and nieces, and legacies amounting to £500 to strangers. In a codicil she directed that, in the event of her funds being insufficient to pay all the legacies, the £1300 legacies should be paid in full. If no part of the sums invested on the bonds and dispositions in security was carried by E's settlement, her estate was less than half the amount of the preferable legacies provided by her settlement. If two-thirds of these sums were included, the preferable legacies could be paid in full, and a balance of £261 would be left for the other legacies. Held (1) that J's settlement was intended to convey, and did convey, her share of the invested funds to E, and (2) that E's settlement, having regard to the circumstances in which it was executed, was to be held as conveying her own and J's share of the funds.

Two sisters, who lived in family together and held their estates jointly, each being owner of a pro indiviso half thereof, executed a mutual trust disposition and settlement whereby they conveyed to trustees for the liferent of the survivor, and on her death for charitable purposes, their whole estates, heritable and moveable, owing and belonging to them at their respective deaths. On the death of the predeceasing sister the joint estate amounted to £8000, of which the sum of £5000 was contained in a bond and disposition in security (dated before, but recorded after, the date of the mutual settlement) in favour of the sisters, or the survivor of them, or the executors or assignees whomsoever of the survivor. Held that the destination in the bond and disposition in security was not evacuated by the mutual settlement, and conferred a right of fee on the surviving sister.

Destination in bond by harbour trustees.

A husband, having lent £500 to harbour trustees, took the assignation from them in the name of himself and his wife, "equally between them, and to the survivor of them, and to the heirs, executors, administrators, and assignees of the survivor." He afterwards executed a testament conveying his whole estate to an executor for division among his relatives, and giving his widow one-third of the whole. Held that the general disposition in the testament did not interfere with the special destination in the assignation, and that the widow was entitled to the £500, in addition to her share of the executry funds.

(1021)

Destination in stock certificate.

A testator who died in February, 1884, left a trust disposition and settlement whereby he conveyed his whole estate to trustees, to be held for his wife in liferent, after her death for his children in liferent and for their issue in fee. The testator revoked all former settlements executed by him. In addition to £200,000 of moveable estate and valuable heritage, he left stock certificates, bonds, and certificates of debt of public trusts and public companies, some of which were prior, and others subsequent, in date to the trust disposition and settlement. Each of these documents was in favour of the testator and one of his children and the survivor. The children were all equally favoured as regards the number and value of the bonds, &c., thus appropriated to them. Held that the destinations in favour of the children in the stock certificates were operative as destinations, and were not affected by the general settlement.

A testator who had purchased shares took the certificates therefor in name of himself and his wife and the survivor. Destination of heritage and in insurance policies—General clause of revocation.

Circumstances in which the presumption that general words of disposition in a mortis causa deed will not operate as a revocation of a special destination made by the testator himself was held to be redargued. Question (per Lord Kinnear) whether a general clause of revocation in a general settlement may not in itself afford ground for displacing the presumption.

(1025)

Special destinations in deeds prior and subsequent to general disposition.

By a trust disposition and settlement a testator revoked all settlements of a testamentary nature made by him "at any time heretofore," and conveyed the residue of his estate to trustees. The trustees were directed to pay the annual income thereof to the testator's widow, and in the event of the income being less than £156, to make up the balance so that the income should be of that amount, and, if necessary, to encroach for that purpose on capital. The testator died possessed of heritable securities and bonds of companies taken in favour of the testator and his wife or the survivor of them. Some of these were dated before and some after the date of the trust disposition and settlement, and one, the debenture of a company, had been taken before that date, but bore a minute of renewal of a date subsequent thereto. The securities and bonds were acquired with money belonging solely to the testator, and they formed substantially the whole of his moveable estate. Apart from these investments the testator's estate was not sufficient to produce an income of £156.

Held (1) that the destinations in the investments made before the date of the trust disposition and settlement were revoked, as otherwise the purposes of the trust disposition and settlement could not receive effect; (2) that the destinations in the investments made after the date of the trust disposition and settlement, being the last expression of the testator's will, were not revoked; and (3) that the debenture was to be regarded as an investment made before the date of the trust disposition and settlement, and therefore that the destination therein was revoked.

(1026)

By his trust disposition and settlement a testator conveyed to trustees the whole means and estate which should belong to him at the time of his death, "including all means and estate held by me at my death under special destinations," and he revoked "all former testamentary writings made by me." Some time before the date of the trust disposition and settlement the testator had instructed his banker to invest a sum of money, belonging to himself, in National War Bonds in favour of his three children, to the extent of one-third each, to place the interest on the bonds to the credit of a current account kept in the joint names of himself and his wife, and to hold the bonds themselves for safe custody. The children were all in minority, and, as the requirements of the Bank of England would not permit of the bonds being registered in the names of the children alone, each block of bonds was, on the testator's instructions, taken in the names of his wife and one of his children, the application forms and a mandate requesting that the interest should be paid into the joint current account, being signed by his wife. The bonds were dated before the date of the trust disposition and settlement. Subsequently to the date of the trust disposition and settlement the testator invested further sums in War Loan Registered Stock in the names of each of his children, and he also invested two sums in the same stock, taking the titles in the names of himself and his wife, but without words of survivorship. Held (1) that the children had not acquired an irrevocable jus quæsitum in the National War Bonds, and that, as ex concessu, in these circumstances the destinations in the bonds were revoked by the clause of revocation in the trust disposition and settlement, the bonds formed part of the trust estate; and (2) that, in the case of the War Loan Registered Stock, the presumption in favour of the destinations in the titles receiving testamentary effect, arising from the fact that they were later in date than the trust disposition and settlement, had not been redargued, and, accordingly, that the stock standing in the names of the testator's children belonged to the children, and that the stock standing in the names of the testator and his wife belonged to the extent of one-half to the trust estate, and to the extent of the other half to the testator's widow.

(1027)

A husband and wife, by mutual settlement, disposed the whole property which he or she might be entitled to at death in favour of the other spouse in lifereit and their children in fee. They subsequently executed a codicil, whereby the husband disposed certain heritable subjects which he had since acquired in the same terms as those of the mutual will; the codicil gave to the survivor power to make advances to the children, upon which interest was to be calculated "to the final division of the free capital or stock of our said means and estates under this settlement." Certain moveable investments were made after the date of the settlement in the name of the husband and wife and the survivor. Certain of these were of a later date than the date of the codicil; one of the latter was in the names of the husband and wife jointly. Held that all the investments fell to be dealt with under the mutual settlement, and that the wife's interest in them was limited to a lifereit.

Insurance policy on life of wife—Payable to wife's heirs, executors, and assignees—Premiums paid by husband—Donation inter virum et uxorem.

A policy of insurance was effected by a husband on the life of his wife, payable to "her heirs, executors, or assignees," six months after her death. During his life the husband used the policy as a fund of credit to obtain advances from the insurance company, but these advances had been repaid prior to his death. By antenuptial marriage contract the wife had conveyed all acquenda during the subsistence of the marriage to the husband. By general mortis causa settlement the husband conveyed his whole estate to trustees. The husband predeceased. Held that the policy, including right to bonus additions, was not carried by the husband's settlement, but belonged to the widow.

(1031)

Destination subsequent to general disposition—Mutual disposition by spouses.

By mutual disposition spouses settled their respective estates on the survivor, reserving power to each to alter. Many years afterwards the husband acquired certain heritable subjects, and took the title to himself and his wife in conjunct fee and lifereit, for her lifereit use alienarily, and to his heirs and assignees whomsoever. He afterwards acquired other heritable subjects, the title to which he took to himself and his heirs and assignees whomsoever. In a question between the surviving wife and the husband's heirs, opinions (1) (per Lord Justice-Clerk Moncreiff and Lord Young) that the terms of the special destination of the heritable subjects first acquired by the husband altered and evacuated the mutual disposition so far as these subjects were concerned; and (2) (per Lord Justice-Clerk Moncreiff) that the special destination of the heritable subjects last acquired by the husband had the same effect.

Farquharson v Farquharson, &c., 1883, 10 R. 1253; 20 S.L.R. 836.

(1032)

A testator left a trust disposition and settlement by which he conveyed to trustees his whole estate, heritable and moveable, which should belong to him at the time of his death. Subsequent to the date of his settlement he purchased certain heritable subjects, and took the disposition in favour of himself and his assignees and disponees, whom failing to his sister and her heirs and assignees whomsoever. Held that the subjects belonged to the sister as heir of provision, and were not carried to the trustees by the general disposition in their favour.

Webster's Trustees v Webster, 1876, 4 R. 101; 14 S.L.R. 51.

(1033)

Heirs and assignees — General disposition.

A general disposition will carry subjects subsequently acquired by the granter, although the title be taken in favour of himself and his heirs and assignees whomsoever.

Philip v Philip, 1885, 13 R. 329; 23 S.L.R. 210.

(1034)

Special destination — Share certificate.

A husband and wife acquired shares in a limited company, the shares being registered and the share certificate bearing that the shares were transferred "to R L (the husband) . . . and J H or L, his wife, and the survivor of them." Ten years prior to the acquisition of the shares the spouses had made a mutual will containing a different destination. Held that the destination in the share certificate prevailed over the destination in the will in respect of the presumptions (a) that a special destination is not evacuated by a general disposition in the absence of indications of contrary intention, and (b) that a later deed derogates from a prior deed.

Ferguson v Lord Advocate, (O.H.) 1906, 13 S.L.T. 724.

(2) DESTINATIONS MADE BY A THIRD PARTY.

(1035)

Destination made under contractual arrangement — Husband and wife — Destination to spouses jointly and survivor in fee.

The destination in a disposition of heritable property purchased by spouses, each paying one-half of the price, was taken in favour of them jointly and the survivor of them, and the heirs of the survivor and their assignees whomsoever. Held that on the death of one of the spouses, the survivor became under the destination sole fiar in the subjects, and that the terms of the destination could not be affected by the testamentary settlement of the predeceasing spouse.

(1036)

Destination of heritage — Subsequent general disposition.

A testator held a heritable estate under a disposition granted by a third party with a special destination in favour of heirs substitute. Held that general words of disposition in the testator's mortis causa deed evacuated the special destination.

Campbell v Campbell, 1880, 7 R. (H.L.) 100; 5 App.Cas. 787; 17 S.L.R. 807.

(1037)

The estate of T was destined, under a disposition and settlement, to A and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing to B (brother of A) and the heirs-male of his body. A left a general settlement of his whole estate in favour of his two brothers, "but expressly excepting from this conveyance the lands of T to which I obtained right by" the trust disposition and settlement, "and which I wish to descend and transmit to" B "in terms of said trust disposition and settlement." Held that as the estate of T was excepted from the conveyance, B succeeded to it under the destination contained in the trust disposition and settlement.

Love's Trustees v Love, 1879, 7 R. 410; 17 S.L.R. 260.

(1038)

Destination in entail—Subsequent general settlement — Testator institute of entail and not bound by fetters — Admissibility of extrinsic evidence.

An institute under an entail (which had been granted by the institute's father) to whom the fetters did not apply, made up titles and possessed until his death under the tailzie. He left a general disposition and settlement conveying his estates, heritable and moveable, to a natural daughter. Held (by a majority of the whole Court) that the general conveyance carried the entailed estate.

Opinions on the competency of a proof of facts and circumstances tending to show that the granter did not intend to include the entailed estate in the conveyance.

Thoms v Thoms, 1868, 6 M. 704; 40 J. 364; 5 S.L.R. 418.

(1039)

A lady in possession of an entailed estate, to which she had succeeded as institute, executed a disposition and settlement whereby she conveyed to her nephew her whole estates heritable and moveable, and in particular certain lands of which she was the fee simple proprietrix. After her death it was ascertained that the fettering clauses of the entail were directed merely against "the heirs of entail or substitutes," and that she was absolute fiar of the entailed estate. Held that as fiar she had power to dispose of the estate; but that the general conveyance in her settlement did not carry the entailed lands.

Observations (per Lord Chancellor Selborne) on the admissibility of extrinsic evidence by the law of Scotland in the construction of testamentary deeds.

Observed (per Lord Colonsay) that in dealing with such cases the Court has taken into consideration circumstances calculated to throw light on the intention or purpose of the testator, whether found within the deed or collected from external sources.

Question (per Lord Colonsay), whether a letter written by a testator after the date of his settlement may be referred to as extrinsic evidence in its construction.

(1040)

Testator heir of entail in possession under invalid entail.

An heir of entail in possession not only of the entailed estate but also of an estate held in fee-simple, left a general disposition and settlement conveying to trustees his fee-simple estate nominatim, as also his whole property, heritable and moveable. Held, assuming the entail to be invalid, that on a construction of the whole terms of the general disposition, and on a consideration of the actings of the testator, the general disposition was not intended to convey, and did not convey, the lands embraced in the entail.

Catton v Mackenzie, 1870, 8 M. 1049; 42 J. 618; 7 S.L.R. 687.

[Note.—On appeal the House of Lords decided the case on the ground that the entail was valid—1872, 10 M. (H.L.) 12; L.R., 2 H.L. Sc. 202; 44 J. 191; 9 S.L.R. 425.]

(1041)

Disentail followed by general disposition.

An heiress of entail in possession disentailed the estate, and two months afterwards executed a general trust disposition of all her property, heritable and moveable, containing very special directions for the administration of heritable estate. The purposes of the trust were payment of an annuity of £1000 to her second husband, of £4500 to the children of her second marriage, and for division of the residue among all her children, including her eldest son by her first marriage, the heir-apparent under the entail. At the date of this deed the granter had no heritable property other than the entailed estate, and she was very deeply in debt. Held that it was a question of intention whether the disentailed estate was included in the general conveyance, in ascertaining which the circumstances of the granter ought to be looked at, and that under the circumstances the intention to convey the estate must be presumed.

Gray v Gray's Trustees, 1878, 5 R. 820; 15 S.L.R. 571.

(1042)

Substitution in moveables—Marriage contract—Destination of husband's estate to wife with substitution in favour of his children—Husband survived by wife and by children of earlier marriages—General settlement by wife.

By an antenuptial contract of marriage the husband conveyed his whole means and estate to the wife, in case she should survive him, and failing her by decease either before or after him, to his lawful children surviving at the death of the longest liver of himself and his wife. The wife conveyed to the husband de præsenti her whole property, about £300, and renounced her legal rights. The husband predeceased the wife, leaving about £600, entirely moveable. There were no children of the marriage, but the husband was survived by children of two previous marriages. The widow was confirmed executrix nominate, and entered upon the possession and management of her husband's estate. Held, upon the death of the widow, (1) that the terms of the marriage contract imported a proper substitution; but (2) that the widow was entitled to alter and evacuate it gratuitously; and (3) that the substitution was evacuated by her general settlement.

Dyer v Carruthers, 1874, 1 R. 943; 11 S.L.R. 539.

(1043)

Money legacy—Legacy paid to legatee—General settlement by legatee.

A, by her settlement, appointed B to be her sole executor and universal legatary, under burden of a bequest of £4000 to be paid at the first term after her death to C, but declaring that if C "shall die without lawful issue, then the half of the said sum of £4000 shall return to and belong to" B, his heirs, successors, or assignees whomsoever, with power to C to dispose of the other half of the £4000 as she might think proper. A was survived by both B and C, and the legacy was paid to C, who survived B and died without issue, leaving a general settlement conveying her whole property to trustees. Held that the provision in A's settlement in favour of B, his heirs, &c., was not a clause of return, but was simply a substitution which had been evacuated by C receiving payment of the whole of the money during her life, and disposing of it by her mortis causa settlement. Opinion (per Lord Curriehill) that even if part of the money had not been paid to C the substitution would have been evacuated by her settlement.

Buchanan's Trustees v Dalziel's Trustees, 1868, 6 M. 536; 40 J. 273; 5 S.L.R. 325.

(3) ADMISSIBILITY OF EXTRINSIC EVIDENCE.

[See X. 3, supra.]

XIV. CONDITIO SI INSTITUTUS SINE LIBERIS DECESSERIT.1. GENERALLY.

(1044)

Application to inter vivos deeds.

Question, whether the conditio si is applicable to an inter vivos deed.

Crichton's Trustee v Howat's Tutor, 1890, 18 R. 260; 23 S.L.R. 207.

(1045)

—Marriage contract.

Held that the conditio si sine liberis is applicable to provisions to children in marriage contracts.

Hughes v Edwardes, 1892, 19 R. (H.L.) 33; [1892] A.C. 583; 29 S.L.R. 911.

(1046)

A husband by antenuptial marriage contract made a provision in favour of the children of the marriage. The only child of the marriage predeceased the date of vesting, leaving issue who survived that date. Held that the issue were entitled to the provision.

Arthur and Seymour v Lamb, 1870, 8 M. 928; 42 J. 542; 7 S.L.R. 592.

(1047)

—Long lease containing destination.

Certain subjects were leased for 950 years to A P, "and his heirs as after mentioned," and failing him "then the whole subjects to and in liferent only to the present wife of the said A P . . . and after the death of the said spouses . . . then to the children of their marriage equally between them, share and share alike, in fee." A P was survived by his wife. Three children of their marriage were alive at the date of the lease, of whom two survived their father. Held that the right to the lease, subject to the widow's liferent, had vested on the death of the father in the two children then alive to the extent of one-half each, and that a daughter of the third child who had predeceased that date had no right, as the conditio si sine liberis did not apply, the lease having been granted by a stranger to the family, and not as a parental provision.

(1048)

Application to legacies — Provisions of legacies.

Opinions (per Lord Justice-Clerk Patton, Lord Cowan, and Lord Neaves) that the conditio si sine liberis applies only to provisions and not to simple legacies.

Opinion (per Lord Benholme) that in the case of every legacy by one in loco parentis to the legatee, there is a presumption that the conditio applies, but the presumption may be overcome.

Douglas's Executors, 1869, 7 M. 504; 41 J. 268; 6 S.L.R. 324.

(1049)

Specific legacy.

By her general trust disposition and settlement a testatrix, who had no children, but had three sets of nephews and nieces, directed her trustees, inter alia, to invest £2500 for behoof of her niece Christina Black in liferent and her children in fee, and failing such children to pay it as follows:—To her own nephew George Black £1000, to her niece Jane Black £750, and to her nephew Charles Boswell Black £750: "Declaring that if the said Christina Black shall predecease me the said sum of £2500 shall form part of the residue of my estate." The Blacks mentioned were 'the whole family of a sister of the testatrix. To each of the testatrix's nephews and nieces was bequeathed a share of the residue. Christina Black survived the testatrix and died without issue. Jane Black predeceased the testatrix, leaving a son, who survived the testatrix and Christina, the liferentrix. Held that the conditional bequest of £750 to Jane Black could not be regarded as a family provision, and therefore that the conditio si institutus sine liberis decederit did not apply.

Allan v Thomson's Trustees, 1908 S.C. 483; 45 S.L.R. 358; 15 S.L.T. 780.

Pecuniary legacies—Bequest of residue.

A testatrix, by a universal trust disposition and settlement, in the fourth place, after bequeathing certain specific articles, left legacies of definite sums of money to each of all her nephews and nieces nominatim, with the exception of one niece, and also to other relatives, and to strangers, "all as mementos of me." The residue of the estate was directed to be divided equally among a brother-in-law of the testatrix and all her nephews and nieces nominatim. Held that the conditio si institutus sine liberis decederit did not apply to the legacies to nephews and nieces under the fourth purpose, but that it did apply to the residuary bequest to the nephews and nieces.

Allan v Thomson's Trustees, 1893, 20 R. 733; 30 S.L.R. 654; 1 S.L.T. 40.

(1051)

Plate, pictures, &c.

The conditio si sine liberis decederit does not apply in the case of a bequest of silver plate, furniture, linen, books, &c.

M'Alpine, 1883, 10 R. 837; 20 S.L.R. 551.

(1052)

A mother bequeathed her plate and pictures to four children, nominatim. Held that the conditio si sine liberis was not implied.

Brown's Trustees, 1882, 10 R. 441; 20 S.L.R. 557.

(1053)

Isolated subject—Heritage.

Crichton's Trustee v Howat's Tutor, 1890, 18 R. 260; 23 S.L.R. 207, No. 1097, infra.

(1054)

Conditional institutes.

Question, whether the conditio si sine liberis can be implied in favour of the issue of a conditional institute.

Carter's Trustees v Carter, 1892, 19 R. 408; 29 S.L.R. 347.

(1055)

Testamentary trustees were directed on the death of the last of three liferentrices "to divide the whole estates and effects hereby conveyed, and to pay the free proceeds thereof among and to the whole of my sons and daughters that may then be in life, and failing any of them by death, to any child or children they may respectively have left, also in equal portions." All the testator's children predeceased the last liferentrix, three of them leaving issue, some of whom also predeceased the last liferentrix. The gift to the testator's grandchildren vested in them on survival of their parents. Held that where grandchildren had predeceased their parents their children took under the conditio the original shares which would have fallen to their parents.

Class called as conditional institutes—Survivorship clause.

A testator directed his trustees to pay a share of the residue of his estate to a married sister, "whom failing, to her lawful children surviving at my death, equally among them." The sister predeceased the testator and one of her children also predeceased him leaving issue. Held that neither the fact that the sister's children were called only as conditional institutes, nor the fact that the bequest was limited to survivors, was sufficient to prevent the conditio si institutus sine liberis decederit from applying; and accordingly that the issue of the predeceasing child of the testator's sister were entitled to their parent's share.

(1057)

Gift to surviving issue of conditional institute.

Under a direction failing daughters of the testator and their issue to make over a share to A, whom failing to his surviving issue, held that the conditio did not place grandchildren of A in the position of their predeceasing parents.

M'Donald's Trustees v Gordon, (O.H.) 1909, 2 S.L.T. 321.

Accreting shares — Right of children to participate under conditio.

[See XV. 5, infra.]

(1058)

Parent dead at date of will.

Where one member of a class which has been instituted to a bequest has died before the date of the settlement, the conditio will not apply in favour of the children of that member.

A testator died leaving a settlement in which he bequeathed a legacy "to the lawful children of my now deceased sister Mary." The residue of his estate he directed to be divided among his brothers and sisters by name, the children of his deceased sister Mary, and two nephews by name, sons of another deceased sister. The settlement was dated four months before the testator's death, and one of his sister Mary's children had died fifteen years previously leaving children. Held that these children were not entitled to any share of the legacy or of the residue bequeathed to Mary's children.

Morrison's Trustees v Macdonald, 1890, 18 R. 181; 28 S.L.R. 137.

(1059)

A testator directed one-half of the residue of his estate to be paid to "the families of my two sisters." Both sisters left children who survived the testator, but one of the children of the elder sister had predeceased the date at which the testament was made, leaving issue. Held that the issue did not take any part of the residue.

(1060)

Opinion (per Lord McLaren) that where a liferent interest is given to children with a provision that the liferent interest of each child who is instituted is to pass to his or her descendants, the children of a child who has predeceased the date of the will will not be entitled to a share.

(1061)

Parent excluded by acceptance of special provision.

A testator by his trust disposition and settlement left the residue of his estate to his sister and her husband in liferent and to those of their children who should be in life at the death of the survivor of their parents in fee. He also directed that certain farm leases should be made over to his sister and her husband successively in liferent and to such of her sons as his sister should appoint by any writing under her hand in fee. The testator further provided that the child who should succeed to the leases should be debarred from participating in any other portion of his estate. After the testator's death a family arrangement was made under which one of the sons of the testator's sister entered into possession of the farms, renouncing all right to any share in the residue. This son died in his mother's lifetime, thus predeceasing the date at which the residue of the estate vested in her children. Held that the son, having "succeeded to" the leases within the meaning of the settlement, was debarred from participating in the residue; and that, as he was thus excluded from being an institute with regard to the residue, his children could not claim any portion thereof under the conditio si institutus sine liberis decesserit.

M'Dougal's Trustee v Heinemann, 1918 S.C. (H.L.) 6; 55 S.L.R. 80; 1917, 2 S.L.T. 221.

Vesting of children's right under conditio — Vesting in parent conditional on survival.

Marriage contract trustees were directed to hold the funds provided by the wife for her liferent use allenerly, and, should the husband survive her, then for his liferent use allenerly, and to hold the fee for behoof of the children of the marriage, under the declaration that the fee should not vest in them until the death of the wife. The wife survived her husband, and also survived her son, the only child of the marriage. The son had married and left issue. The son's issue claimed that the conditio si sine liberis decesserit applied, and that the fee of the funds, subject to their grandmother's liferent, had vested in them.

Held that the son's issue, claiming in virtue of the conditio, had no higher right than their father, and, as he could have taken no vested right during the lifetime of his mother, vesting had not taken place in them.

Dixon's Trustees v Duneher, 1918 S.C. 90; 55 S.L.R. 131; 1917, 2 S.L.T. 243.

2. RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN TESTATOR AND INSTITUTE.

(1063)

Descendants of testator.

Held that the conditio applied where the institutes were the great grandchildren of the testator. Opinion (per Lord Shand) that the conditio applies in favour of descendants of the testator in the direct line, however remote.

Grant v Brooke, 1882, 10 R. 92; 20 S.L.R. 69.

(1064)

Opinion (per Lord Cowan) that the conditio si sine liberis, when applicable, embraces all the descendants of the parties called to the succession towards whom the testator stands in loco parentis.

Irvine v Irvine, 1873, 11 M. 892; 45 J. 546; 10 S.L.R. 625.

(1065)

Illegitimate child.

Held that the conditio si institutus sine liberis decesserit did not apply to a legacy left by a mother to her illegitimate child.

Farquharson v Kelly, 1900, 2 F. 863; 37 S.L.R. 574; 7 S.L.T. 442.

(1066)

Children of brothers uterine.

Circumstances in which conditio applied.

Nicol v Nicol's Executor, 1876, 3 R. 374.

(1067)

Brothers and sisters of testator.

Held (by a majority of the whole Court) that the conditio si institutus sine liberis decesserit does not apply to provisions by a testator in favour of his brothers and sisters.

Hall v Hall, 1891, 18 R. 690; 28 S.L.R. 476.

(1068)

The estate of a widow fell to be distributed in terms of a mutual will executed by her and her husband. The will directed two-thirds "to be set aside for the relations of C T," the wife, "after named," and the remaining third for those of H B, the husband, "also after named;" and of the relations on the side of C T, Mrs. S, her sister, "and her children shall receive two-fifths of the sum set apart for them, and her brothers and their children the other three-fifths; of the relations on the side of the said H B, his sister, Jean, shall have two-fifths, and his brothers, David and George, and their children, the other three-fifths. In neither case are children to participate while the parent is alive." George was married at the date of the settlement; Jean was married shortly afterwards, and before H B's death; David not until long subsequently. By the terms of the deed the bequests did not vest until the death of the wife, who was the survivor of the spouses. Jean predeceased her, leaving a child. Held (1) that the conditio si sine liberis decesserit did not apply in favour of Jean's child; and (2) that the lapsed share neither reverted to the general fund for division nor to the portion appropriated to the husband's relatives, but fell to the heirs in mobilibus of the widow as intestate succession.

Berwick's Executor, 1885, 12 R. 565; 22 S.L.R. 357.

(1069)

A testator bequeathed his whole estate to his father, who predeceased him, whom failing to the testator's whole brothers and sisters nominatim. Held that the conditio si sine liberis did not apply in favour of the issue of a brother who predeceased the testator.

Blair's Executors, &c. v Taylor, 1876, 3 R. 362; 13 S.L.R. 217.

3. WHETHER CONditio CONSISTENT WITH TERMS OF DEED.

(1) GENERALLY.

(1070)

Express conditional institution of issue to other legacies.

Where the terms of a testamentary deed showed that the testator had contemplated the contingency of legatees dying and leaving issue by making certain legacies payable to the issue of legatees in the event of their predecease, held that the conditio si sine liberis was not to be implied in the case of a legacy where he had made no such provision.

Carter's Trustees v Carter, 1892, 19 R. 408; 29 S.L.R. 347.

(1071)

A testator left the fee of the residue of his estate to his grandchildren, to be paid to them on the expiry of certain liferents and on the grandchildren respectively attaining majority. There was an express conditional institution of the children of any grandchildren who should predecease the testator. By another clause of the deed it was expressly declared that vesting should take place at the terms of payment. Held that the express conditional institution of children excluded the implied conditio si sine liberis decesserit.

Neville v Shepherd, 1895, 23 R. 351; 33 S.L.R. 248; 3 S.L.T. 226.

Codicil referring to death of institute and revoking other legacies.

A mother in her settlement bequeathed one-third of her silver-plate to her daughter, M, and small keepsakes to M's daughters, and by a subsequent clause bequeathed to each of her children an equal share of residue. By a codicil, the testator, on the narrative of M's death, revoked the bequest of silver-plate, and directed it to be divided among the testator's family. Held that the conditio si sine liberis was to be implied in the settlement with regard to the bequest of residue, and was not displaced by the codicil.

Forrester's Trustees v Forrester, 1894, 21 R. 971; 31 S.L.R. 807; 2 S.L.T. 148.

(1073)

A testator left two legacies to a niece. The niece predeceased the testator, who thereupon revoked by codicil one of the legacies. In a question of the distribution of the testator's estate, held that the unrevoked legacy to the niece went to her children in virtue of the conditio si sine liberis decesserit.

Stewart's Trustees v Stewart, (O.H.) 1917, 2 S.L.T. 267.

(1074)

Testator aware of predecease of legatee when executing codicil.

A testator by his settlement left legacies of £100 each to his nephews and niece, A, B, C, and D. By a codicil he left "to the family of my nephew A," who had died between the date of the settlement and the codicil, £1200; to B, who survived the execution of the codicil, but predeceased the testator, £500; to C, who likewise survived the execution of the codicil, but predeceased the testator, £500 in liferent allenary and to her children in fee; and "to the family of the late" D, who died between the date of the settlement and codicil, £500 equally among them. Held that the conditio si sine liberis decesserit applied to the four legacies in the settlement.

Bryce's Trustee, 1878, 5 R. 722; 15 S.L.R. 412.

(1075)

Express disposal of share of institute.

A testator directed her trustees to pay a sum of money to A, to be held "in trust for behoof of the children procreated or to be procreated of the marriage between him and his present wife . . . to whom he shall account on the dissolution of the marriage equally between them, but with this qualification, that in the event of B or C (two of the said children) predeceasing said period, the survivor of them shall have a double share, as coming of room of such predeceaser." B predeceased the term of payment, leaving children. Held that the conditio si institutus sine liberis decesserit did not apply.

Robertson v Robertson, (O.H.) 1894, 1 S.L.T. 549.

(1076)

Legacy to daughter—Separate legacy to daughter's child.

Held that a legacy bequeathed by a testator to his daughter "for her own uses," and a legacy of £12,000 bequeathed "as a legacy to her over and above any sum or sums for which I may have become bound in the settlement to be executed with reference to her intended marriage," lapsed by her predeceasing the testator, and did not pass to her marriage contract trustees or to her only son, to whom a separate legacy of £10,000 was left by a codicil executed after his mother's death.

Douglas' Executors, 1869, 7 M. 504; 41 J. 268; 6 S.L.R. 324.

Gift over to issue "left" by children—Right of issue predeceasing children.

Testamentary trustees were directed on the death of the last of three liferentrics, "to divide the whole estates and effects hereby conveyed, and to pay the free proceeds thereof among and to the whole of my sons and daughters that may then be in life, share and share alike, and failing any of them by death, to any child or children they may have respectively left, also in equal portions." All the testator's children predeceased the last liferentrix, three of them leaving issue, some of whom also predeceased the last liferentrix. The gift to the testator's grandchildren vested in them on their survivance of their parents. Held that where grandchildren had predeceased their parents, their children took, by virtue of the conditio si sine liberis, the original shares which would have fallen to their parents.

Gift to surviving residuary beneficiaries—Children of son included among residuary beneficiaries.

A testator directed his trustees to divide the residue of his estate into four shares; to pay one share to each of his sons William and Patrick, and to hold one of the remaining shares for behoof of the children of his son Henry, and to pay the same, share and share alike, to his children when they respectively attained majority or were married, the survivors being entitled, equally among them, to the shares of predeceasers. He directed the last share to be held for his daughter Agnes in alimentary liferent and her children in fee, and in the event of Agnes dying without issue the share that would have fallen to them was to "be divided amongst the surviving residuary beneficiaries above named equally." Agnes died without issue. One of the children of Henry predeceased Agnes, leaving a daughter J. Held that the conditio applied, and that J was entitled to participate in Agnes' share.

Taylor, 1884, 11 R. 423; 21 S.L.R. 298.

Gift to grandchildren—Gift over in event of grandchild not leaving issue.

A person conveyed an estate to his son under burden of payment of a provision of £500, to be equally divided among the children of the granter's daughter, and payable six months after her death, with interest from the date of her death, to such of them as might then have attained majority, and to the others on their attaining majority; and declaring that if the daughter should die "without leaving any living child, then the said provision shall fall and belong to" the granter's son, "and his heirs and assignees." The daughter had two children, who predeceased her, but one of them left issue. Held that the provision did not vest in the daughter's children during her life, but that her grandchildren at her death were entitled to it in virtue of the conditio si sine liberis decesserit.

Halliday, &c., 1869, 8 M. 112; 42 J. 65; 7 S.L.R. 60.

(1080)

Gift to surviving children of grandchildren.

A testatrix directed that a certain sum should be vested in trustees for behoof of her two grandchildren, A and B, "or the survivor in liferent, and to such of their children as may be in life at the death of the survivor, equally among them, and failing children, to my own nearest heirs in fee." A predeceased B without leaving issue. B had issue, of whom two daughters predeceased her, both leaving issue. Held that the conditio si sine liberis applied in favour of the issue of B's predeceasing children (the great-great-grandchildren of the testatrix), and that therefore they were entitled to participate in the succession to the extent to which their respective mothers would have participated, had they survived their mother.

Grant v Brooke, 1882, 10 R. 92; 20 S.L.R. 69.

(2) COLLATERAL RELATIONS.

(1081)

Whether testator "in loco parentis."

Per Lord President Inglis—"It is necessary to consider what is meant by placing themselves in loco parentis. It does not mean that the uncle has during his life occupied such a position, or treated his nephews and nieces with that kindness which a parent would show to his children; what is meant is, that in his settlement he has placed himself in a position like that of a parent toward the legatees—that is to say, that he has made a settlement in their favour similar to what a parent might have been presumed to make."

Bogie's Trustees v Christie, 1882, 9 R. 453; 19 S.L.R. 363.

(1082)

—Whole class of nephews and nieces not included.

A testatrix, in her trust disposition and settlement, directed her trustees to divide the whole of her estate "equally between the children of my late brother A and the children of my late sister B." No mention was made of the children of C, a deceased brother of the testatrix. Held that the testatrix had placed herself in loco parentis to the children of A and B, notwithstanding the omission of the children of C, that the conditio si sine liberis applied, and the children of a daughter of B, who predeceased the testatrix, were entitled to the share which would have fallen to their mother had she survived.

(1083)

An aunt who had nine nephews and nieces and certain grand nephews and nieces, the children of a deceased niece, made a will in their favour. Held that in so doing she had placed herself in loco parentis to the beneficiaries to the effect that the conditio si sine liberis decederit applied to the provisions under the said will, and that notwithstanding one nephew was altogether excluded while of the others some got legacies only, some shares of residue only, and some both.

Weir v Young, (O.H.) 1897, 5 S.L.T. 233.

(1084)

Gift to children of sister.

A testator directed his trustees to hold one-half of the residue of his estate for one of his sisters in liferent, and on her death to pay the interest to her children equally until the majority of the youngest, when the capital was to be divided among them, or the survivors of them then alive. Held that in virtue of the implied conditio si sine liberis decederit, the issue of those children who survived the testator, but predeceased the liferentrix, were entitled per stirpes to the shares which would have fallen to their parents had they survived the term of payment.

Aitken's Trustees v Wright, 1871, 10 M. 275; 44 J. 164; 9 S.L.R. 180.

(1085)

Gift to children of brothers uterine.

Circumstances in which the conditio si sine liberis was applied to a bequest by a person to the children of his brothers uterine in respect of the terms of the testament.

Nicol v Nicol's Executor, 1876, 3 R. 374.

(1086)

Gift to children of sisters who might be alive at period of division.

A testator bequeathed to his only brother, who died without issue, the liferent of the residue of his estate, and directed that such residue should "after his death be divided equally among the lawful children of my living and deceased sisters who may be alive at the time, share and share alike, namely, the children of the late Mrs. P, the children of Mrs. G," &c. The whole children of his sisters survived the testator, but some of them predeceased the liferenter leaving issue. Held that the conditio si sine liberis decederit applied, and that the issue of the testator's nephews and nieces predeceasing the date of vesting were entitled to their parents' share of the residue of the estate.

Gauld's Trustees v Duncan, 1877, 4 R. 691; 14 S.L.R. 446.

Gift to each of children of sister who should "be alive" at period of division.

A testator bequeathed £1000 "to each of the children" of a deceased sister who should "be alive" at the death of his wife, or of himself if the longest lived. He was survived by his wife and by all the legatees, but some of them predeceased the widow leaving issue. Held that the bequest being conditional upon the legatees surviving the widow, there was no room for the application of the conditio si sine liberis in favour of the issue of those who predeceased her.

McCall v Dennistoun, 1871, 10 M. 281; 44 J. 160; 9 S.L.R. 176.

(1088)

Gift to children of A "surviving at my death"—Class called as conditional institutes—Survivorship clause.

A testator directed his trustees to pay a share of the residue of his estate to a married sister, "whom failing, to her lawful children surviving at my death, equally among them." The sister predeceased the testator, and one of her children also predeceased him leaving issue. Held that neither the fact that the sister's children were called only as conditional institutes, nor the fact that the bequest was limited to survivors, was sufficient to prevent the conditio si institutus sine liberis decesserit from applying; and accordingly that the issue of the predeceasing child of the testator's sister were entitled to their parent's share.

(1089)

Gift to nephew or niece nominatim.

Held that the conditio si sine liberis applied to a legacy to a nephew, there being nothing in the settlement to show that the testator was moved to select his nephews and nieces as objects of his bounty by any other consideration than their relationship to him.

(1090)

Gift to nephew.

Two testators in their joint settlement directed their trustees to hold during the subsistence of a liferent a sixth share of the residue of their estate "for behoof of the daughters of our deceased sister . . . equally among them, or the issue of such as may predecease the survivor of us in fee, but failing daughters or their issue, then the sixth part or share shall belong to their surviving brothers, equally among them in fee." One of the nieces having died unmarried, and the other being married, the testators by a codicil directed the share of the one sister to be paid to her brother A, and the share of the other to her brother B. One of the brothers predeceased the surviving testator leaving a child. Held that the child was entitled to her father's share under the conditio si sine liberis.

MacGown's Trustees v Robertson, 1869, 8 M. 356; 42 J. 161; 7 S.L.R. 197.

(1091)

Gift to niece.

Circumstances where held that the conditio si institutus sine liberis decesserit did not apply in the case of a bequest by an uncle to a niece.

Johnstone's Executors v Johnstone, (O.H.) 1902, 10 S.L.T. 42.

(1092)

Gift to two nephews — Testatrix having eight nephews.

A testatrix left her whole estate to trustees for one sister, whom failing, another sister successively in liferent, the fee being destined equally between two nephews, one of whom predeceased the testatrix leaving children. Including these two nephews the testatrix had eight nephews and nieces. Held that the will was in the nature of a family settlement, although the testatrix had exercised to some extent a delectus personarum and that the conditio si sine liberis applied.

Hare's Executor v Larken, (O.H.) 1905, 13 S.L.T. 519.

(1093)

Gift to nephews, nieces, and grandnieces.

Terms of a will making bequests in favour of nephews, nieces, and grandnieces of the testator on which held that the conditio si institutus sine liberis decesserit fell to be implied in favour of the children of one of the beneficiaries, a niece, who had predeceased the testator.

Keith's Trustees v Keith, (O.H.) 1908, 16 S.L.T. 390.

(1094)

Gift of heritage.

Circumstances under which held that the conditio si institutus sine liberis decesserit applied in the case of a bequest by an uncle to a nephew.

Hamilton v Hamilton's Trustee, (O.H.) 1902, 10 S.L.T. 463.

(1095)

Gift to children nominatim of nephew.

A testatrix bequeathed the liferent of her estate to her grandson A, with power to the trustees to make payments to him out of capital, and on his death the fee of the estate, or of so much as should remain, to A's issue, whom failing to one of her nephews W, whom failing to his two children X and Y, "and to the survivor of them, and failing both to my own nearest heirs and assignees whomsoever." A died without issue. W and his children predeceased A, but W's children were survived by issue. Held that the conditio si sine liberis did not apply.

Gillespie v Mercer, 1876, 3 R. 561; 13 S.L.R. 350.

To niece and her children nominatim or survivors—Direct conveyance of heritage.

The granters of a mortis causa disposition disposed certain subjects "to C" (their niece), "D and E" (C's daughters), "or the survivor or survivors of them." D predeceased the granters leaving a daughter. C and E survived the granters. Held that the fee vested in C and E at the death of the last of the granters, as the survivors at that date of the three disponees, and that D's child had no claim under the conditio si sine liberis.

Chancellor v Mosman, 1872, 10 M. 995; 44 J. 557; 9 S.L.R. 646.

(1097)

Gift to nieces nominatim and survivors or survivor.

By inter vivos deed two sisters conveyed certain heritable subjects to themselves and another sister in liferent, and to their nieces nominatim, and the survivors or survivor of them, in fee, and infertment followed for these respective rights. One of the nieces having thereafter died without having altered the destination, her son claimed a third of the fee, pleading the condition. Held that he was not entitled to it. Crichton's Trustee v Howat's Tutor, 1890, 18 R. 260; 28 S.L.R. 207.

XV. ACCRETION.

1. GENERAL RULE.

(1098)

When a legacy is given to a plurality of persons, named or sufficiently described for identification, "equally among them," or "in equal shares," or "share and share alike," or in any other language of the same import, there is (in the absence of expressions by the testator importing a contrary intention) no room for accretion in the event of the predecease of one or more of the legatees, and this, whether the gift is in liferent or in fee to the whole equally, or whether the subject of the gift be residue, or a sum of fixed amount, or corporeal moveables.

(1099)

Observed (per Lord Kinnear) (with reference to the rule in Paxton's Trustees v Cowie)—"I rather think that in stating the condition that the persons favoured must be named or sufficiently described for identification, the Lord President meant individually named or identified. For he cannot have intended merely the condition common to all legacies and indispensable for their validity that the legatee must be capable of identification; and, on the other hand, the purpose of his statement was to distinguish between legacies of shares to individuals, and a legacy of a common fund to a class. But, however that may be, the rule is in my opinion, applicable only to cases where the testator's intention is to give a separate legacy, payable out of a certain fund to each of a plurality of persons."

Roberts' Trustees v Roberts, 1903, 5 F. 541; 40 S.L.R. 387; 10 S.L.T. 642.

Class gift—Effect of vesting.

Observed (per Lord McLaren)—"It is settled that a bequest to persons as a class—e.g., to the children of A—is a joint bequest whether the children be named or not, and that nothing lapses by the predecease of one of the class, the legacy being divided among the survivors. An exception is admitted in the case where the testator has used such expressions as 'equally and proportionally' among them. But when the legacy vests, its joint character necessarily disappears, because it is then the right of each legatee to receive in money his proportional share of the subject of the gift."

v 18

2. ACCRETION IN GIFTS OF FEE.

(1) GIFTS TO PERSONS NAMED.

(1101)

Direction to pay and divide in certain proportions.

A testatrix directed her trustees to pay to each of three daughters, whom she named, the annual produce of one-third of the residue of her estate, and upon the death of each to pay, divide, and convey the principal of the one-third part of the residue so liferented "in the proportions following," viz.:—To four sons and another daughter (each of whom she named) "each two shares," and to a grand-daughter (also named) "one share," with a provision that, in the event of any of them dying before the period of payment leaving issue, such issue should take their parent's share. There then followed declarations that the interests of the residuary legatees should not vest until the terms of payment, and that the interests "conferred on or accruing" to females should belong to them exclusive of the jus mariti. There was no clause of survivorship. One of the liferenters having died predeceased by certain of the residuary legatees who left no issue, held (by a majority of seven judges) that the testatrix had made a series of separate bequests to individuals, and not a joint bequest, and that consequently the shares of the predeceasers did not accresce to the survivors, but fell into intestacy.

Direction to divide into shares.

A testator directed his trustees to hold the residue of his estate and to apply the same for behoof of his sister, Mrs. M'A, and her children, in manner following:—"That is to say, the said residue and remainder of my said estate shall be divided into eight equal parts or shares, and the said Mrs. M'A shall be entitled to one of said shares, and her children," two sons and two daughters nominatim, "shall each be entitled to one of said shares, and" two other daughters nominatim "shall be entitled equally between them to three of said shares." Held that the share set free by the death of one of the daughters who survived the testator but predeceased the date of vesting did not accresce to Mrs. M'A and the surviving children, but became intestate succession of the testator.

McLaren v McAlpine, 1907 S.C. 1192; 44 S.L.R. 900; 15 S.L.T. 238.

(1103)

Direction to divide equally.

A testator directed his trustees to divide his whole estate into two parts, and to divide one of these parts as follows:—"£200 to my late wife's sister Margaret; in the event of her predeceasing me, said sum of £200 to be paid to my sister Jane; the remaining portion to be equally divided between my late wife's sisters Jane and Mary, my late wife's brother Robert, and my late wife's niece Jeannie." The testator was predeceased by Robert, but survived by Mary, Jane, and Jeannie. Held that Robert's share did not accresce to the shares of the survivors, but went to the heirs in mobilibus of the testator.

(1104)

———Specific legacy.

Where "plate and pictures" were left to be "equally divided," among the testator's daughter and her brothers Robert, Samuel, and William, held that the share of a legatee predeceasing the testator did not accresce to the survivors, but fell into residue.

Brown's Trustees, 1882, 10 R. 441; 20 S.L.R. 557.

Disposition to children—Equally among them, share and share alike.

A testatrix disposed her whole estate to her children, A, B, C, and D, "equally among them, share and share alike." The disposition contained no clause of survivorship. Certain of the children predeceased the testatrix without issue. Held that the gift to the children was several and not joint, and that no accretion took place.

Farquharson v Kelly, 1900, 2 F. 863; 37 S.L.R. 574; 7 S.L.T. 442.

(1106)

Gift of residue to children equally—Daughters restricted to liferent—Disposal of daughter's share.

A testator directed his trustees to hold the residue of his estate "in trust for behoof of such of my children as shall survive me . . . equally, share and share alike, subject to the conditions following, viz.:— . . . In the case of my daughters, I direct my trustees to retain and hold their shares, original and accrescing, for their liferent alimentary use allenarly . . . and for the issue of their bodies, equally among such issue in fee . . ." Power was given to the trustees to make advances to any daughter out of the capital liferented by her. A daughter who survived the testator died unmarried and intestate. Held (1) that the share of residue of the testator's estate liferented by the daughter did not accresce to the remaining residuary legatees, but fell to the testator's heirs ab intestato.

MacGregor's Trustees v MacGregor, 1909 S.C. 362; 46 S.L.R. 296; 1909, 1 S.L.T. 73.

Gift of one share of residue to A and of another to B.

Two testators who by joint settlement had bequeathed a share of the residue of their estate, on the expiry of a liferent, for behoof of their nieces equally among them, directed by codicil that their niece S's share should be paid to her brother G, and that their niece R's share should be paid to her brother A. G predeceased the survivor of the two testators, leaving a child. Held that his share did not accresce to A.

MacGown's Trustees v Robertson, 1869, 8 M. 356; 42 J. 161; 7 S.L.R. 197.

(1108)

Direction to deliver to A and B—Specific legacy.

A testator directed his trustees, upon his son William attaining the age of thirty, to deliver over "to my sons William and Robert" the stock and cropping on two farms. The two sons survived their father, but William died before attaining the age of thirty. Held (1) that the gift to William was conditional on his attaining the age of thirty, but that the gift to Robert was not conditional on William attaining that age; (2) that the gift was not a joint gift; and, consequently (3) that one-half of the stock and cropping fell to be delivered to Robert, and that the remaining half fell into residue.

Graham's Trustees v Graham, 1899, 2 F. 232; 37 S.L.R. 163; 7 S.L.T. 283.

(1109)

Destination of heritage to A, B, and C in conjunct fee and liferent, and to the heirs of their bodies.

A widow who had purchased heritable subjects took the title to herself in liferent, and, after her death, to her daughters Clara, Jane, and Mary "in conjunct fee and liferent, and to the heirs of their bodies, and to their assignees whomsoever," whom failing, to her sons Alexander and Charles. The widow reserved full power to dispose of the subjects as if she were absolute fiar. Sasine was taken in favour of the various parties named for their respective rights of liferent and fee. Jane and Mary survived their mother, but Clara predeceased her unmarried. Held that the share which Clara would have taken had she survived her mother did not accresce to Jane and Mary, but passed to Alexander and Charles under the destination.

Gift to A and B in liferent and their issue equally among them in fee—Accretion as between families of A and B—Direct disposition of heritage.

The proprietor of certain lands died in 1837, leaving a mortis causa disposition of these lands to and in favour of his sons William and Alexander "equally between them, and failing either of them without lawful issue, to the survivor of them, the lawful issue of the predeceaser always coming in place of their parent, in liferent, and for their liferent use allenarly, and to their lawful children equally among them, share and share alike, in fee." The granter was survived by his sons William and Alexander, who were respectively his second and third sons. Alexander died in 1891 without having had issue. He was predeceased by his brother William, and also by all William's children, but was survived by several grandchildren of William. Held that Alexander had under the disposition a liferent allenarly in one-half of the subjects thereby conveyed, together with a fiduciary fee thereof for his own children, and that on his death without issue the fee of that share was in effect undisposed of, and belonged to the heir at law of the granter of the disposition.

Tristram v M'Haffies, 1894, 22 R. 121; 32 S.L.R. 114; 2 S.L.T. 334.

(1111)

Stock certificates in favour of spouses—Scottish companies—English companies.

Bonds and stock certificates in favour of two spouses without a clause of survivorship belong to them jointly, so that each is proprietor of one-half, and on the death of either his or her share passes to his or her representatives. But similar documents of English companies, belong, on the death of one of the spouses, to the survivor solely, in respect of the right of survivorship presumed by English law.

(1112)

Bequest to A for behoof of herself and B.

A testator bequeathed the residue of her estate to A for behoof of herself and B. The bequest vested a morte testatoris. Held that this was not a joint bequest, but a bequest in severalty, and that on the death of A or B the predeceaser's share would not accresce to the survivor.

Macpherson v Macpherson's Curator Bonis, 1894, 21 R. 386; 31 S.L.R. 271; 1 S.L.T. 449.

Apportionment to children equally among them—Marriage contract provision to children of former marriage—One child predeceasing date of vesting.

By antenuptial marriage contract the husband directed the trustees to pay the income of a certain fund to his widow, and to pay the capital to the children of his former marriage. The vesting of the children's right was suspended until the death of the widow, and a power of apportionment was reserved to the spouses. By deed of apportionment the spouses apportioned the fund, except £10, to the children of the former marriage except I, and they apportioned the sum of £10 to I. There were at that date three children of the former marriage in existence, I, J, and R. R predeceased the date of vesting. Held that under the deed of apportionment the share which R would have taken on survivorship did not accresce to J, but that it fell to be equally divided between I and J under the marriage contract.

Stirling's Trustees v Stirling, 1898, 1 F. 215; 36 S.L.R. 194; 6 S.L.T. 223.

(2) CLASS GIFTS.

(1114)

Sons born or to be born—Reference to a son's "third share."

A testator by his second codicil directed the trustees under his settlement, "upon the youngest of my sons now born or that may be born to me reaching the age of twenty-one years, to convey and make over to them, equally among them," certain heritable estate belonging to the testator. By his third codicil the testator declared with reference to the above bequest that his eldest son, after reaching twenty-five, should be entitled to "his third share of the rents" of the heritable property in question. The testator was survived by three sons. The youngest died before reaching twenty-one, but after his immediate elder brother had attained majority and his eldest brother the age of twenty-five. Held (1) that the direction in the second codicil was to be construed as a joint bequest to a class to be ascertained at the period of payment, and that this construction was not displaced by the description in the third codicil of the eldest son's interest in the subject of the bequest as a "third share"; (2) that on the death of the youngest brother before reaching majority, his surviving brothers took his share by accretion; and (3) that their shares original and accresced vested in them on the death of their younger brother.

Roberts' Trustees v Roberts, 1903, 5 F. 541; 40 S.L.R. 387; 10 S.L.T. 642.

(1115)

Brothers and sisters of A—Destination over to issue—No survivorship clause.

White's Trustees v Chrystal's Trustees, 1893, 20 R. 460; 30 S.L.R. 463, No. 1138, infra.

(1116)

Members of class also mentioned by name.

A testatrix in her settlement made the following bequest:—"To the grandchildren of my brother, William Menzies, who are" (then followed the names and addresses of the grandchildren, who were all resident abroad) "the sum of £2000, equally among them, share and share alike." The testatrix also left a legacy of £330 to the only daughter of a nephew, and one of £670 to the two sons nominatim of a niece, daughter of her brother, Kenneth Menzies, equally between them, and to the survivor. She further directed that a sum of £3000 Consols, over which she had a power of appointment, should be applied in paying the legacies of £2000 and £1000 "bequeathed to the grandchildren of William Menzies and the grandchildren of Kenneth Menzies." Held that the legacy to the grandchildren of William Menzies was a joint bequest, and therefore that the share of a grandchild who predeceased the testatrix accresced to the survivors.

A testator bequeathed his whole estate to his father, whom failing, to A, B, C, D, E, F, and G, his whole brothers and sisters, equally among them, share and share alike. The testator was predeceased by his father and by two of his brothers. Held that the shares of the predeceasing brothers accresced to the survivors.

(1118)

Gift to three children named and "any other children I may leave."

A testator directed his trustees, upon the death of the liferenter, to hold the free residue of his estate for three named children, and "any other child or children I may leave, equally among them, share and share alike." Vesting was postponed till the death of the liferenter. A posthumous child and two of the named children survived the liferenter, while the other named child predeceased her. Held that the residue fell to be divided equally among the three surviving children, and that the share destined to the deceased child did not fall into intestacy.

(1119)

Gift to sons named and all daughters.

A testator by his trust settlement bequeathed the residue of his estate on the death of a liferentrix to his three sons (named) and "all my daughters, equally among them and the survivors and survivor of them, share and share alike; the issue, however, of such of them as may predecease always succeeding equally among them to their respective parent's share." The trustees were directed to hold the shares of the daughters for them in liferent for their respective liferent alimentary uses and their issue in fee. A daughter survived the date of death of the liferentrix, which was held to be the date of vesting, but died unmarried. Held that the daughter's share did not fall into intestacy, but was carried by the residuary clause.

(1121)

Gift equally among children of A—Daughters' shares to be set apart on their attaining twenty-five and held for them in liferent and their issue in fee—Daughter surviving testator but dying a minor and unmarried.

A testator directed his trustees to hold the whole residue of his moveable estate "for behoof of and equally among the children" of his only child, W C M. The shares of sons were made payable to them on attaining the age of twenty-five, while daughters' shares, on their respectively attaining that age or being married, were to be set apart and held for the daughters in liferent and their children in fee. There was a clause of survivorship in the event of any son of W C M dying without issue before the period of payment, but there was no such clause with reference to daughters' shares. At the date of the testator's death W C M had two sons and four daughters, and two daughters were born after that date. The second daughter survived the testator, but died intestate and unmarried before attaining the age of twenty-five. Held that the fee of the daughter's share had not vested in her, and that it was not intestate succession of the testator, but that it fell to be divided among the other children of W C M as part of the residue of the testator's estate.

Gift to trustees.

A testator conveyed his whole means and estate to A, B, C and D "and to the acceptors or acceptor, survivor or survivors of them to be my trustees." He then directed "my said trustees" to pay the income to his sister, and on her death "I direct my said trustees, the said" A, B, C and D (naming them) "to divide the free residue or remainder of my said means and estate equally amongst themselves." In the event of "any of my said trustees" dying before the residue became payable there was a destination over to "their several heirs, executors, and successors." A predeceased the testator, and accordingly neither he nor his heirs were entitled to a share of the fund. The three survivors accepted the trust. Held that the whole residue fell to be divided among the three accepting trustees, and that no part of it fell into intestacy.

5. CHILDREN COMING IN PLACE OF PARENTS.

(1124)

Express provision—Conditio si sine liberis.

Where, by express provision, or by the operation of the conditio si sine liberis decesserit, children of a predeceasing legatee take their parent's share, that share is merely the original share provided to the parent, and does not cover part of a legacy, which by virtue of another clause in the deed would have accrued, on the failure of the person first instituted to it, to the parent, if he or she had survived.

Henderson v Henderson, 1890, 17 R. 293; 27 S.L.R. 247.

(1125)

Distinction between implied conditio and express conditional institution of issue.

Observed (per Lord M'Laren)—“It is settled as matter of legal implication, as distinguished from construction, that a child under the conditio never takes more than what is described as the parent's original share, that is the share which the parent would take supposing every one in the destination to survive the period of payment. . . . When, on the contrary, the substitution is contained in a will or deed the language used in the deed determines the extent of the right of the substituted legatee.”

Neville v Shepherd, 1895, 23 R. 351; 33 S.L.R. 248; 3 S.L.T. 226.

(1126)

Lapsed shares.

Opinions that where a beneficiary under a settlement has predeceased the testator or the term of vesting his issue are not entitled in virtue of the conditio si sine liberis decesserit to participate in a lapsed share which would have accresced to the parent had he survived.

Graham's Trustee v Graham, 1868, 6 M. 820; 40 J. 452; 5 S.L.R. 402.

Survivorship clause—Conditional institution of issue.

A testator directed his trustees to pay one-sixth of the residue of his estate to A, B, C, D and E, the children of his sister X, and to F, the child of his sister Y. The testator further provided that the issue of nephews and nieces who predeceased him should have right to the share which would have fallen to their parent had he survived, and that in the event of any of the children of X predeceasing him without leaving issue the share provided to the decessor should be divided equally among his brothers and sisters. A predeceased the testator, leaving issue who survived; B also predeceased, leaving no issue who survived the testator. Held that the issue of A were entitled only to the share originally destined to their parent, and were not entitled to any part of the share originally destined to B.

Henderson v Henderson, 1890, 17 R. 293; 27 S.L.R. 247.

(1128)

A testator by his trust disposition and settlement directed his trustees after the death of his wife to hold the residue of his heritable property in trust for the liferent use of his three children, A, B and C, “equally between them, share and share alike,” declaring that “on the death of any of my said children without leaving lawful issue, the whole foresaid several provisions, in so far as not paid over, such children so dying without leaving lawful issue, shall be wholly paid to my surviving child or children equally between them, share and share alike.” Held that the liferent formerly enjoyed by a deceased child did not accresce to a surviving child.

Reid's Trustees v Reid, (O.H.) 1903, 11 S.L.T. 139.

(1129)

Conditional institution of issue—Issue to take in the same manner and as fully as if parent had survived.

A testator directed her trustees to hold the residue of her estate in trust for behoof of her grandniece, Janet, and she directed the trustees to apply the annual proceeds for the benefit of Janet during her lifetime, with fee to her lawful children. She declared that in the event of Janet dying without lawful children, the whole residue provided to her should belong to Janet's sister and four brothers, nominatim, “equally” amongst them; and in the event of any of them dying without leaving lawful issue the share of the predeceaser should “go to and be equally divided among the survivors,” but should the predeceaser leave issue, “then such issue shall be entitled to succeed to their parent's share equally among them, in the same manner and as fully as if such parent had survived.” Janet, her sister, and brothers all survived the testator. Janet died unmarried, being predeceased by one brother who left no issue, and by two brothers who left issue. Until the death of the liferentrix no share of residue vested in her brothers or sister. Held that the share of the brother who left no issue fell to the brother and sister who survived the liferentrix, and that the issue of predeceasing brothers were not entitled to any part thereof.

Conditional institution of issue—Legatees predeceasing date of payment without issue.

A testator bequeathed certain subjects to his four daughters nominatim, the subjects or the price thereof to be divided equally among them upon the youngest attaining majority. He also provided that in the event of any of the daughters predeceasing the period of payment without issue her share should fall to her surviving sisters equally among them, but if the predeceaser left issue, such issue were to be “entitled to the share of their mother as if she had been in life.” Two daughters survived the testator, but predeceased the period of payment, the first decessor leaving issue, but the second being childless. Held that the issue of the predeceasing daughter were not entitled to participate in the share of the daughter who had died without issue.

Survivorship clause as to both original and accreting shares on failure of issue.

By her trust settlement a testator provided as follows:—"Declaring that in case any of my said nephews and nieces shall predecease the term of payment (the death of a life-rentrix) without leaving issue, then both his or her original share or shares, and the share or shares accreting to him or her by virtue of the present clause, shall accrete to the survivor or survivors of my said nephews and nieces equally amongst them, if more than one, share and share alike." Held that the interest of the issue of nephews and nieces who predeceased the life-rentrix was confined to the share of their parent.

Crichton's Trustees v Bell, (O.H.) 1900, 8 S.L.T. 177.

(1132)

—A testator directed his trustees to convey his estate to his children on the youngest attaining majority or the death of the testator's wife, whichever event should happen last. After providing that the issue of children who predeceased the period of division should take the share which would have fallen to their parent, the testator further provided—"In the event of any of my children predeceasing such period of division, without leaving lawful issue, then the share which would have fallen to such predeceasing child shall accrete . . . to . . . the survivors or survivor of them equally; and, failing all my children by predeceasing such period of division without leaving lawful issue," then over to the nearest of kin. Held that the shares of such of the testator's children as predeceased the period of division without leaving issue accreted to the surviving children of the testator, to the exclusion of the surviving issue of predeceasing children.

Matthew's Trustees v Matthew, (O.H.) 1905, 13 S.L.T. 470.

(1133)

Destination over to brothers and sisters of institutes failing issue.

A testator directed his trustees, twelve months after the death of the survivor of himself and his wife, to convert his estate into cash, to divide the proceeds into twenty-four equal parts, and to pay three parts or shares to the children of his son A, which three shares were not to be paid to the grandchildren, but to be invested by the trustees and the income paid to A, his wife, and the survivor. On the death of the survivor the trustees were directed to divide the three shares equally among A's children. The testator further provided—"In the event of the decease of any of my said grandchildren before the period of payment of their shares, without leaving issue . . . I direct my trustees to pay and divide the share of such deceiver or deceasers equally among his, her, or their brothers and sisters, but should such grandchild or grandchildren leave lawful issue, . . . then such issue shall be entitled to their parent's share." The testator died in 1863, his wife in 1871, his son A in 1871, and A's wife in 1904, and vesting did not take place in A's children until 1904. Of A's children, John died unmarried in 1883, and Jane died in 1895, leaving issue. Held that Jane's issue were entitled to the share originally destined to Jane, but not to the proportion of John's share which would have accreted to her had she survived her mother.

Gift to children and survivors—Children of predeceaser to take parent's share.

A testator left a legacy to his cousin A in life-rent, and to the children procreated of her body, and the survivor or survivors of them equally in fee. The period of vesting of the legacy was declared to be the death of A; and the testator further provided that the issue of any legatee who might predecease the date of vesting leaving lawful issue should be entitled to the share their parent would have been entitled to if alive. Held that the share of a child of A who survived the testator, but predeceased A without issue, did not accrete to the issue of three children of A who predeceased A.

Baxter's Trustees v Bell, (O.H.) 1900, 8 S.L.T. 176.

Conditio si sine liberis—Legatee predeceasing testator without issue.

A testator directed that on the expiry of a life-rent the residue of his estate should be paid over to his thirteen nephews and nieces, whom he named, and he further provided that, in the event of any of his nephews and nieces predeceasing the life-renter, the predeceasers' shares of residue should "go and accrete to the survivors," and that the shares should not vest until the death of the life-renter. A, a nephew, predeceased the testator without issue, and B, a niece, survived the testator but predeceased the life-renter, leaving a daughter. Held that B's daughter was entitled to B's original share in virtue of the conditio, but that she was not entitled to participate in A's share.

Bowman v Richter, 1900, 2 F. 624; 37 S.L.R. 424; 7 S.L.T. 382.

(1136)

No survivorship clause—Legatee predeceasing testator without issue.

A testatrix conveyed her whole estate to A, B, C, and D. She was predeceased by C, who left no issue, and by D, who left a child. Held that D's child was entitled under the conditio to the share originally destined to her parent, but was not entitled to any part of the share originally destined to C.

Farquharson v Kelly, 1900, 2 F. 863; 37 S.L.R. 574; 7 S.L.T. 442.

(1137)

Gift to children of sister—Children predeceasing testator without issue—Child surviving testator but predeceasing date of payment, without issue.

A testator directed his trustees to hold one-half of the residue of his estate for one of his sisters in life, and on her death to pay the interest to her children equally until the majority of the youngest, when the capital was to be divided among them or the survivors of them then alive. The testator's sister had ten children, two of whom predeceased the testator, without issue. One child, A, survived the testator, but predeceased the life, without issue, dying in July, 1870. Three children survived the testator, but predeceased the life, leaving issue, dying respectively in 1862, 1866, and April, 1870, and thus predeceasing A. Held that the issue of predeceasing children were not entitled to any portion of A's share, but that they were entitled to one-eighth of the fund in virtue of the conditio si institutus sine liberis decesserit.

Aitken's Trustees v Wright, 1871, 10 M. 275; 44 J. 164; 9 S.L.R. 180.

(1138)

No survivorship clause — Destination over to issue.

A testator directed his trustees to set aside and hold £7000 for behoof of his daughter Janet in life, and on her death to pay the interest to her children equally until the majority of the youngest, when the capital was to be divided among them or the survivors of them then alive. The testator's daughter had ten children, two of whom predeceased the testator, without issue. One child, A, survived the testator, but predeceased the life, without issue, dying in July, 1870. Three children survived the testator, but predeceased the life, leaving issue, dying respectively in 1862, 1866, and April, 1870, and thus predeceasing A. Held that the issue of predeceasing children were not entitled to any portion of A's share, but that they were entitled to one-eighth of the fund in virtue of the conditio si institutus sine liberis decesserit.

A testator bequeathed the residue of his whole estate to his brothers and sisters equally, the issue of predeceasing brothers and sisters to take the share of their parents' share. None of the shares were to vest until the death of his widow. Some of the testator's brothers and sisters predeceased him leaving issue, and some, who survived the testator, died before the date of vesting leaving issue. There were others who died without leaving issue. There was no clause in the will giving the share of a predeceasing brother or sister to the survivors. Held that the issue of a predeceasing legatee were entitled not only to the share which their parent would have taken had he survived, but also to any accretion thereto through the predecease of brothers and sisters without issue.

Gift to children—No provision for their predeceasing life.

By trust disposition and settlement a testator directed that his whole free estate should, after payment of debts, be held for his widow in life, and at her death should be divided into seven shares, of which three of the five children of the marriage should have one each and the other two children two each, declaring that the trustees might alter this apportionment if they chose, and that none of the shares should vest until they became payable. The widow was predeceased by four of the five children, of whom two left issue. Held that the issue of the children who predeceased the widow were entitled to their respective shares under the conditio si sine liberis decesserit, but that the shares of those who predeceased her without issue did not fall to the child who survived her, but lapsed and fell into intestacy.

Crawford's Trustees v Crawford, 1886, 23 S.L.R. 787.

Revocation of bequest to member of class — Gift of revoked "share" to member's family—Right of family to take jure accrescendi.

A testator by trust disposition directed that the residue of his estate should be divided among his brothers and sisters who might survive him, jointly with the legal issue of any of them who might predecease him. He further restricted the share of A, one of his sisters, to an alimentary life, giving her children the fee, and in the event of her dying without lawful issue he destined her share to her brothers and sisters who might be surviving at the date of her decease, jointly with the lawful issue of such of them as might have deceased. By codicil the trustor revoked "all share" that a brother R would have been entitled to under the will, and left "that share" to R's family. On A's death, without issue, held that R's family were entitled to participate in the accreting share, just as their father would have been had he not been disinherited.

(1144)

Payment out of income of heritage and moveable estate proportionally.

A testator directed his trustees to expend from the income of the trust estate, and, if necessary, from capital, a sum of not less than £36 per annum in the maintenance of his widow. The fee of the trust estate fell into intestacy in consequence of the beneficiary, who survived the testator, predeceasing the date of vesting. The trust estate consisted partly of heritage and partly of moveable estate. Held that the provision in favour of the widow fell to be paid rateably out of the heritable and the moveable estate.

Permanent or liferent annuity—Lands disposed under real burden of yearly sum payable to disponers' younger children born and to be born — Power to donee to redeem yearly payment — Accretion — Annuity to class.

By mutual mortis causa disposition and settlement a husband and wife disposed certain lands to their eldest son and the heirs-male of his body, with destinations over to their other sons and daughters, under burden of a yearly sum to be paid to such of the disponers' younger children, born and to be born, as should not succeed to the lands, equally between or among them; declaring that it should be in the power of the "heir in possession" of the lands to disburden the same of the said yearly payment by payment of a fixed capital sum to the "parties in right of said yearly payment at the time." At the date when the succession opened there were three younger children entitled to share in the yearly payment. The eldest son, who succeeded to the lands, did not redeem the yearly payment, but paid one-third of the yearly sum to each of the younger children. Thereafter, while the yearly payment was still unredeemed, one of the younger children died. Held that the yearly sum constituted a permanent burden on the lands unless and until redeemed by the heir in possession, and, accordingly, that the share thereof enjoyed by the deceased child did not accrete to the survivors of the younger children, but was carried by the deceased child's will. Opinion (per Lord Sker-rington) that there is no presumption in the law of Scotland that a testamentary gift of an annuity or rent charge, indefinite as to duration, is for the life only of the annuitant or creditor.

Amount—Rent of lands to "form part of" annuity—Additional or in security merely.

A testator by his trust disposition and settlement directed his trustees to pay an annuity of £500 to his widow, with power to her to bequeath the amount of the annuity to any one or more of the children she might choose, and failing her exercising this power, the sum retained to meet the annuity was to be divided among the children equally. The estate beyond what was retained to meet the annuity was to be realised and divided among the children equally. By holograph codicil the testator directed that the free rental of certain heritage should "form part of the annuity bequeathed to my wife during her life . . . after the death of my wife the free rental to be divided equally among my children." Held that the rental of the heritage was not intended to be given in addition to the £500 annuity already bequeathed, but merely that the heritage was to be part of the estate retained to meet the annuity.

—Annuity of one-half of rental of entailed estate—Deduction of burdens.

A marriage contract provided for payment to the husband, in the event of his survival, of an annuity equal in amount to "one-half of the rental of" an entailed estate belonging to his wife, "after deduction of all public and parochial burdens." The contract further declared that "the remaining half of the said rental" should be applied in maintaining and educating the children of the marriage. Held that the husband was not entitled to an annuity equal to one-half of the gross rental under deduction of public and parochial burdens only, but that his provision consisted of one-half of the free yearly rents of the estate, after deduction of all burdens and expenses.

The granter died in January, 1893. Held that the annuity fell to be paid to the extent of one-half thereof at Whitsunday, 1893.

Right of annuitant's representatives to proportion for half-year current at her death.

A testator left an annuity of £200 to his sister "during all the days and years of her life," payable in equal portions at Whitsunday and Martinmas, "commencing the first year's payment" at the first term after his death. He died on 9th November, 1866. She survived till 27th October, 1871, having received five years' payment of the annuity during the four years and eleven months of her survivance. Her representatives maintained that the testator's direction to make a year's payment at the first term after his death was intended to cover the half-year current at the date of his death, and that the annuitant had thus only received four and a half-years' payment of the annuity, and was entitled to a proportion for the half-year current at the date of her death. Held that the testator's intention was that the sister should receive payment for the period during which she should survive him at the rate of £200 per annum, and that she had received full payment.

Bona fide percepta et consumpta—Testamentary annuity to widow of such amount as would, with Government annuity, make up certain sum—Increase of Government annuity after death of testator.

In an antenuptial contract of marriage a husband bound himself to make such contributions as were necessary to secure to his widow the usual annuity from the Bombay Civil Fund, and in the event of his widow not being entitled from any cause to such annuity, he bound himself and his heirs to pay to her an annuity of £300. The husband predeceased his wife, and left a trust disposition and settlement by which he, inter alia, directed his trustees to pay to his widow an annuity of £300 "in addition to what she is entitled to under" the contract of marriage, "my intention being that the said" widow "shall have a free annuity of £600 under the said marriage contract and these presents, any annuity she may receive from the Bombay Civil Fund being imputed to account thereof"; under the declaration that in the event of his widow "from any cause losing or not receiving from the Bombay Civil Fund the usual annuity of Indian civil servants, she shall only be entitled to a free annuity of £500 from my own proper funds, to which sum her annuity under said marriage contract and these presents shall in that event be restricted." The amount of the annuity payable from the Bombay Civil Fund to the widow at her husband's death in 1876 was £300, and she accordingly received £300 a year more from her husband's testamentary trustees. In 1882 the Bombay Civil Fund annuity was by Act of Parliament increased by a pension of £60 a year. The husband's representatives continued to pay to the widow an additional £300 a year until 1894, when the question arose whether the additional sum ought to be £240 a year only in respect that she was receiving the additional pension of £60 a year. A special case was presented by the widow and her husband's representatives, in which it was admitted that they had paid and she had received the full £300 a year from her husband's estates in bona fide ignorance of any doubt as to her right to do so. Held (1) that from the time the widow became entitled to the additional annuity of £60 she was only entitled to receive an annuity of £240 from her husband's estate; but (2) that she was not bound to repay the over-payments.

2. WHETHER PAYABLE OUT OF CAPITAL.

(1158)

General rule—Interests of annuitant and of liferenter—Encroachment on capital.

In the absence of expressions indicating a contrary intention, a bequest of an "annuity" is, primo loco, an annual charge upon income preferable to the interests of a liferenter of the residue, and, if the income should prove insufficient to meet the annuity, a charge upon capital as a special legacy preferable to residuary or reversionary interests in the capital. Circumstances in which held that, in the absence of any clear indication of a testator's intention that "a free yearly annuity" bequeathed by him should be met solely out of income, his trustees were bound to pay the annuity out of the capital of the trust estate to the extent to which the income was insufficient.

Colquhoun's Trustees v Colquhoun, 1922 S.C. 32; 59 S.L.R. 40; 1921, 2 S.L.T. 249.

Income of trust estate insufficient to meet annuity.

A testator appointed his trustees to pay to his widow an annuity of £1000 a year in lieu of her legal rights and of her claims under an antenuptial marriage contract, and disposed of the rest of his estate in legacies, some of which he directed to be paid within three months after his death, and others after the death of his widow. The income of the trust estate was not sufficient to pay the annuity. Held that the annuity was preferable to the legacies of which payment had been postponed, and that the widow was entitled to have it paid in full, whether the revenue of the trust estate yielded that amount or not.

(1160)

A testator by a codicil directed his trustees to pay an annuity of £200 per annum to his brother and sister and the survivor. By a later codicil the testator bequeathed one-half of the residue of his estate to his granddaughter in liferent and her issue in fee. The income of the estate was insufficient to pay the annuity. Held that the annuitants were entitled to have the annuity paid out of capital.

Knox's Trustees v Knox, 1869, 7 M. 873; 41 J. 470; 6 S.L.R. 557.

(1161)

It is a general rule that an annuity provided by trust disposition falls to be made up out of capital if the income of the estate be insufficient to meet it. Terms of a settlement held not to indicate an intention that the payment should be limited to income so as to elide the general rule.

Stewart v Stewart's Trustee, (O.H.) 1898, 36 S.L.R. 625; 6 S.L.T. 174.

(1162)

Terms of an antenuptial contract of marriage in which an annuity to the wife held to form a first charge on the husband's estate, payable out of capital, the income being insufficient to meet it.

(1163)

By antenuptial marriage contract husband settled on his wife an annuity of £200 a year in the event of her surviving him. By his will he left his property in trust for the purposes (1) of paying his widow an annuity of £400 a year; (2) of paying annuities to the testator's brothers and sisters (which were to suffer a proportionate abatement in case of there being a shortcoming of funds to pay them in full); and (3) on the widow's death of dividing the trust funds among the brothers and sisters. Held that if the income of the trust funds were insufficient to pay the widow's annuity of £400 a year in full the deficit must be made up out of capital.

Thomson v Thomson's Trustees, 1868, 5 S.L.R. 742.

(1164)

—Payment out of arrears of rents.

Held that a certain annuity was exigible out of arrears and not merely out of current rents of a property.

Ferrier v Cowan, (O.H.) 1897, 5 S.L.T. 297.

(1165)

—Direction to convey specific subjects on death of annuitant.

A testator directed his trustees to pay to his widow an annuity, and after her death to divide the residue of his estate equally among his children. To secure the annuity the trustees were empowered to retain such a portion of the heritage as would yield a rental sufficient for the purpose, or to sell and invest such a sum from the proceeds as might be necessary to yield the annuity. By a codicil the testator directed his trustees, upon the death of the survivor of himself and his wife, to convey to each of his children certain specified heritable subjects, thereby disposing of his whole heritable estate. The executry funds and the income of the trust estate were not sufficient to pay the annuity, and the trustees made advances from time to time to make good the deficiency. After the widow's death, one of the beneficiaries brought an action against the trustees for decree ordaining them to deliver to him a disposition of the heritable subjects bequeathed to him by the testator. Held that the annuity was a preferable charge upon the corpus of the trust estate, and that the trustees were not bound to convey to the pursuer the heritable subjects bequeathed to him, except upon condition of receiving payment from him of his share of the advances made by them.

(1166)

Preference among annuities.

A testator left to his wife an annuity of £400, and to his mother, "if my estate will permit," an annuity of £100. He left no other testamentary provision. Held that both annuities were payable out of capital, but that the annuity to the wife was preferable to that of the mother.

Adamson's Trustees v Adamson's Executors, 1891, 18 R. 1133; 28 S.L.R. 869.

(1167)

Conveyance of policy in security—Annuitant's right to policy limited to life-rent.

In an antenuptial contract of marriage a husband provided his wife in an annuity of £100 a year, with £30 for mournings, and in security and implement pro tanto of that obligation conveyed to the trustees a policy on his life for £500, with power to them to uplift it and to re-invest it in trust for behoof of his wife in life-rent alienably and his children in fee. On the death of the husband, survived by his wife and children, it turned out that he had no funds other than the proceeds of this policy. The widow claimed from the trustees payment of £30 for mournings, and of her annuity of £100 so long as any funds remained in their hands. Held that her right over the proceeds of the policy was limited to a life-rent, and that the trustees could not pay any part of the capital to her.

3. INCIDENCE OF INCOME TAX.

(1169)

"Free of income tax"—Whether income tax includes super tax.

By antenuptial contract of marriage a husband bound himself, and his heirs, executors, and representatives, to pay his wife during her widowhood a free life-rent annuity of £1000 "free of income tax." Held that income tax included super tax.

Specified annuities payable out of "the free income and proceeds."

A testatrix directed her trustees to pay to her brother and sister, "from the free income and proceeds" of her estate, a sum of £250 each per annum, and to divide any surplus income among certain other beneficiaries, "or to retain and accumulate such surplus income or any part thereof with capital as my trustees shall determine."

Held on a consideration of the terms of the settlement, that it contained nothing which displaced the ordinary rule that annuitants must bear the income tax exigible in respect of their annuities, and, accordingly, that income tax fell to be deducted from the annuities to the brother and sister. Opinion (per Lord Salvesen) that "free income" means nothing more than "revenue."

Hudson's Trustees v M'Intosh, 1920 S.C. 725; 57 S.L.R. 571; 1920, 2 S.L.T. 211.

Bequest of "free yearly income up to" sum specified.

A testator left his whole estate to trustees in trust "to pay to my wife . . . the free yearly income thereof . . . up to if possible the sum of six hundred pounds per annum as an alimentary provision . . . to cover all rent rates and taxes. . . . Any remaining annual income from the estate above six hundred pounds to be paid (failing my leaving any lawful issue) to or for the benefit of my nephews and nieces." The free annual income exceeded £600. Held that the £600 fell to be paid to the widow subject to, and not free of, income tax.

(1172)

A testator directed his testamentary trustees to pay out of the income of his means and estate an alimentary life-rent provision of £2500, and that if the income was not sufficient to meet the provision the life-rent was to be correspondingly reduced so as not to exceed the free income of his estate after paying all other charges payable out of income. Circumstances in which held that income tax fell to be deducted from the sum payable to the life-rentrix.

Menzies v Menzies' Trustees, (O.H.) 1919, 2 S.L.T. 43.

(1173)

"Exempted from all burdens and deductions whatsoever"—Whether free of income tax.

Held that a widow, to whom her husband had bequeathed an annuity "exempted from all burdens and deductions whatsoever," was only entitled to payment of her annuity, less income tax, that tax not being a "burden" or "deduction" intended by the testator to be borne by the trust estate. Opinions that a testamentary bequest of an annuity in full of legal rights, free of income tax, was not an agreement or contract struck at by the 103rd section of the Income Tax Act, 1842.

Testamentary annuity payable "in addition to" annuity provided in marriage contract—Marriage contract annuity payable free of income tax.

By antenuptial contract of marriage, executed in 1902, a husband bound himself, and his heirs, executors, and representatives, to pay to his wife during her widowhood a free liferent annuity of £1000 "free of income tax." By his trust disposition and settlement, executed in 1911, he directed his trustees to implement this provision, and he further directed them to pay to his wife during her widowhood, "and that in addition to the annuity conceived in her favour under said marriage contract" an annuity of £500, which by codicil he subsequently increased to £1000. Held that the mere declaration in the trust disposition and settlement that the annuity thereby provided was "in addition to" the marriage contract annuity did not import into the trust disposition the condition attaching to the previous annuity that it should be paid free of income tax.

Bequest of "free" revenue of residue—Subsequent restriction to specific sum.

A testator directed his trustees to hold the whole of the free residue of his estate for behoof of his wife in liferent "and to pay to her the free revenue and proceeds thereof." By a codicil the trust directed that "in the event of the income of the free residue of my estate which . . . is to be paid to my wife . . . exceeding in any year the sum of £2000, my trustees shall restrict the payment to my wife out of said income to the sum of £2000 per annum." The annual income of the trust estate, after deduction of all outlays, including income tax, always largely exceeded the sum of £2000. Held that the widow was entitled to an annual payment of £2000 free from any deduction on account of income tax.

(1176)

Specified annuity payable out of "net annual proceeds."

A testator directed his trustees to pay out of the "net annual proceeds" of one-half of the residue of his estate the sum of £750 yearly to his niece for her liferent alimentary use. Held, on a consideration of the settlement as a whole, that the niece was entitled to an annual payment of the sum of £750, without any deduction on account of income tax.

Smith's Trustees v Gaydon, 1919 S.C. 95; 56 S.L.R. 92; 1918, 2 S.L.T. 289.

XVII. CONDITIONS.

1. VALIDITY.

(1177)

Public policy—Condition that legatee should not reside with parents.

Held that a condition attached by a testator to a legacy in favour of his grand-niece that she should not reside with her parents, who were of good character, was contra bonos mores and null, and that the legacy was unconditional.

(1178)

Condition that beneficiary should not allow his mother to reside on his estate.

A testator by his settlement allowed his widow to occupy his mansion-house and policies, with a discretion to her to relinquish the occupancy in favour of his son on his attaining the age of twenty-five. The son was the child of the testator's first wife, who had divorced him. The testator further provided that, after the death of his widow or after her relinquishment of her occupation of the mansion-house, his trustees should hold the mansion-house and policies for the liferent use of his son so long as the testator's first wife remained alive; and declared that it was his express wish that his son should never allow the testator's first wife or any member of her family "to reside at" the mansion-house or on any part of the testator's estates, and that, if his son contravened this condition, he should forfeit his liferent right. By the last purpose of the settlement the trustees were directed, after the death of the testator's first wife and after the son had attained twenty-five, to convey the testator's whole estates to the son, provided that he had not at any time contravened the foregoing condition. The testator was survived by his first wife and by his second wife and by his son. After his son had attained the age of twenty-five the testator's second wife relinquished her occupancy of the mansion-house in his favour. In an action of declarator at the instance of the son, held that the condition as to not allowing his mother to reside on the estate was not null and void, either as being a condition contra bonos mores, or from uncertainty. Opinions that, if the son were merely to allow his mother to visit him at the mansion-house for short periods as an ordinary guest, he would not thereby commit a contravention of the condition.

Wemyss v Wemyss's Trustees, 1921 S.C. 30; 58 S.L.R. 116; 1920, 2 S.L.T. 333.

Condition in restraint of marriage.

A testator directed that a part of the profits of his business, which was to be carried on by his trustees after his death, should be paid to his daughters, "but in the event of any of my said daughters being married her share of said profits shall lapse and fall into the residue of my estate," in which all his children were to participate. Held that the bequest was intended as a provision for the testator's unmarried daughters so long as they remained unmarried, that the limitation was not invalid as a condition in restraint of marriage, and that a daughter who was married at the date of the settlement had no interest in the bequest.

Observation as to the English rules as to conditions in restraint of marriage attached to bequests.

(1181)

Clause of devolution—Lands to devolve on heir in possession succeeding to a peerage.

A clause in a mortis causa disposition of heritage provided that each of the heirs, who should succeed to the lands, should be obliged in all time to use the disponent's name and arms, and that "in case any of the said heirs shall succeed to a peerage, then, when the person so succeeding or having right to succeed, to my said lands shall also succeed to a peerage, they shall be bound and obliged to denude themselves" of all right in the lands, and the same should devolve on the next heir. Held that this clause was not void as being contrary to public policy.

(1183)

Conditions impossible of fulfilment.

A testator directed his trustees to expend two sums of £20,000 each upon the erection of two Roman Catholic churches, or "such smaller sum or sums as may be necessary . . . my intention being merely to have such church . . . completed although it may be at a less cost than £20,000 each"; any unexpended balance to revert to the residue of his estate. Except for a provision of £10,000 for the endowment of one of the two churches, the trust disposition and settlement contained no provision for endowment. Upon the completion of the buildings the trustees were directed to convey them, on certain specified conditions, to trustees to be appointed respectively by the bishops of the Roman Catholic Dioceses in which the churches were to be situated. In a multiplepointing raised after the death of the testator the bishops stated they were unable to accept the bequests under the conditions specified, on the ground that owing to want of endowment the conditions could not be implemented. They proposed that the testamentary trustees should either accumulate the funds till they amounted to a sum sufficient to build and endow the churches or that the fund should be applied in accordance with a scheme to be approved by the Court. Held that either proposal was contrary to the testator's intention, and that the bequests having lapsed owing to the refusal of the bishops to accept them on the conditions specified by the testator the sums in question fell into residue.

Marquess of Bute's Trustees v Marquess of Bute, 1904, 7 F. 49; 42 S.L.R. 66; 12 S.L.T. 418.

Impossibility supervening after date of will.

A testatrix in her trust disposition and settlement provided—"In case of my not having advanced money during my lifetime to purchase a captain's commission in his regiment for" J D, "I direct my trustees to make payment to him of a . . . sum of £2000 for that purpose." The testatrix did not advance a sum of money for the purchase of a commission, and purchase in the army was abolished before her death. Held that although a commission could not be purchased the sum of £2000 was payable.

Dunbar v Scott's Trustees, 1872, 10 M. 982; 44 J. 556; 9 S.L.R. 632.

(1185)

Impossibility supervening after testator's death—Repayment of legacy.

A testator directed his trustees to make over to the trustees of a particular school certain funds of which the interest was to be applied in supplementing the schoolmaster's salary, "declaring that the fore-said provision shall be paid to and accepted by the said trustees . . . only on condition of their undertaking to retain the management of said school in their own hands, and that in the event of their declining to accept payment of said provision on this condition, the amount thereof" should fall into residue. The bequest was paid over; and the trustees of the school applied the yearly interest in the manner prescribed by the testator for sixteen years, when the school was closed. Held that the bequest to the trustees was conditional on their retaining the management of the school, and that condition having become-impossible of fulfilment the amount of the bequest fell to the residuary legatees.

(1187)

Condition within power of legatee—Purification.

A testator conveyed his whole estate to a "beloved friend," subject to the condition that, unless by a writing under his hand he should expressly declare that whatever he took under the will was to form part of his own means and estate, and belong to his own heirs and disponees, the children of one of the testator's brothers who should survive the donee should receive the full amount of the estate conveyed out of the donee's estate. The donee executed a declaration in the terms prescribed. Thirty years after his death one of the children of the testator's brother raised an action of reduction of this declaration, and for payment of her share. Held that the bequest by the testator was valid, being a bequest under a condition within the donee's power, and that the condition had been purified.

Reid v M'Phedran, 1881, 9 R. 80; 19 S.L.R. 51.

Direction to purchase lands.

A testatrix directed her trustees to lay out the residue of her estate (which amounted to £60,000) in the purchase of lands, and when the whole residue or within £300 thereof was so invested to deliver a disposition to her brother in liferent, and to his son and the heirs whatsoever of his body in fee, whom failing certain other persons—the trustees being declared to be "the sole and exclusive judges of the lands which and the period when these should be purchased, free from the control of any of the heirs who should be interested." The testatrix was predeceased by her brother. The trustees invested the residue except £20,000 in the purchase of lands. Held that the nephew of the testatrix took a vested right in the fee of the residue a morte testatoris, and was entitled to payment of the sum of £20,000.

Spens v Monypenny's Trustees, 1875, 3 R. 50; 13 S.L.R. 25, 45.

(1189)

Uncertainty — Resolutive condition — Suspensive condition.

A testator directed his trustees to allow his son the liferent use of a heritable estate. He attached to the provision a condition that his son should not allow certain persons "to reside" on the estate, and declared that, if he contravened the condition, he should forfeit the liferent. The testator further directed his trustees, when certain trust purposes had been fulfilled, to convey the fee of the estate to his son, provided that he had not at any time contravened the condition. Held that, although it was impossible to specify ab ante the precise acts which would infer forfeiture, the condition was not void from uncertainty either as a suspensive or as a resolutive condition, and that there was no distinction, in the law of Scotland, between the degree of specification necessary in the two classes of conditions.

Purpose of bequest.

A testatrix bequeathed to "A, son of B and C, one hundred pounds, to help him to come out for a doctor if he choose that profession." Held that A was entitled to the legacy free of the condition.

(1191)

A testatrix bequeathed "to A B £300, and if she would take her portion and invest it to buy the surface of Easter Haugh Head, I leave her the residue of mine after paying all my just debts." Held that A B was entitled to the legacy of £300 free of the condition.

Ross v Thomson, (O.H.) 1896, 4 S.L.T. 155.

2. CONSTRUCTION.

(1192)

Intention of testator—Carrying out executory condition.

A testator adjetted to a legacy bequeathed by him to a young lady the following condition:—"This bequest I, however, make contingent upon her declaring in writing that she shall not renew her engagement of marriage with Mr. J. M." His trustees refused to pay the legacy except upon the further statement being added that no engagement of marriage subsisted between the legatee and J M at the date of the declaration. The legatee refused to make this additional statement, and raised an action against the trustees for payment. Held that the trustees were entitled to have the declaration expressed in such terms as would best carry out the testator's intention, and that the legatee was not entitled to insist that the declaration should be in the precise terms used by the testator.

Forbes v Forbes' Trustees, 1882, 9 R. 675; 19 S.L.R. 453.

Surrogatum — Whether condition affecting original provision applied to surrogatum — Alimentary provision.

By an inter vivos trust deed granted by A and B spouses the liferenters, and C, their son, the fiar of the lands of X, the lands of X were conveyed to trustees for behoof of A and B in liferent allanarly and after their deaths for behoof of C in alimentary liferent. A, the husband, predeceased B, the wife, and C. By his trust disposition and settlement he bequeathed the liferent of the residue of the estate to B and recommended that she should not exact from C her liferent of the lands of X. B elected to take her liferent of the lands of X, and C was found entitled to a compensating provision out of the annual proceeds of the residue. Held that the compensating provision was not alimentary.

Condition affecting original share—Whether applicable to accreting shares—Direction to accumulate beneficiary's share of income.

(1195)

Name and arms clause—Use of testator's name—Testator's name prefixed to original name.

A deed of entail provided that the heirs succeeding under the entail should be obliged to "use, bear, and constantly retain, in all time coming after their succession, the surname" of H. Held that this condition was sufficiently complied with if the surname of H were assumed along with one or more others, and that it need not necessarily be the last in order.

Hunter v Weston, 1882, 9 R. 492; 19 S.L.R. 416.

(1196)

A testator, by his trust disposition and settlement, destined his estate of Teaninch in liferent and fee to a series of heirs, under the condition that the heirs taking benefit under the destination should "assume and constantly thereafter use as their surname, arms, and designation the surname, arms, and designation of Munro of Teaninch as their proper surname, arms, and designation in addition to their own surname, arms, and designation"; with a clause of forfeiture in the event of a contravention of the condition. Held that, in the absence of express direction that the assumed surname should be the last, a beneficiary was entitled to prefix the surname Munro to his own surname of Spencer, and to design himself "Munro-Spencer of Teaninch."

(1197)

Bequest on condition that spouses were "living together as man and wife."

A testator, who in his settlement had made a provision for his daughters in liferent and their issue in fee, by a codicil, executed in March, 1900, declared with regard to his daughter B "that if at the time of my death she should not be reconciled to her husband," F, the provision to her children was to be reduced. A subsequent codicil executed in July, 1900, contained this clause—"I don't consider F and B reconciled as referred to in codicil to my settlement unless they are living together as man and wife." At the date of the first codicil, B, who was then addicted to drugs, was residing with her father in Glasgow and not in her husband's house in London. The husband was urging her to enter a home for treatment and had written that her return to him was impossible until the drug habit was broken. Between the dates of the two codicils it was arranged, owing mainly to the husband's insistence, that she should enter a home; and as the husband could not meet this expense the testator agreed to do so. At the date both of the second codicil and of the testator's death in 1901 his daughter was an inmate of the home. Held that there was no ground in law for refusing effect to the condition; that the spouses were not, in the sense of the codicil, "living together as man and wife" at the date of the testator's death; and, accordingly, that the daughter's children were entitled only to the reduced provision.

Clause of forfeiture in the event of gift being impugned—Impugning—Statement of contentions in special case that conditions of gift invalid.

A deed of appointment containing both valid and invalid provisions concluded with a forfeiture clause, which declared that any of the appointees who impugned the appointment "in any manner of way" should forfeit all interest, "to the same effect" as if they had been expressly excluded from any share in the appointed fund. Held that parties to a special case, brought to determine the validity of the deed, who were appointees under the deed, and who had stated contentions questioning the validity of provisions and conditions affecting their shares, would not thereby, under the forfeiture clause, have forfeited their right to benefit under the deed had the deed been valid.

Prohibition against altering a specified succession to or selling a heritable estate—Condition that if prohibition violated a specified sum of money should be paid to persons named or their heirs.

The proprietrix of a heritable estate died leaving a mortis causa disposition of the estate to A and the heirs of his body, whom failing, to B and the heirs of her body, whom failing, &c., "under this declaration, burden, and condition, that in the event of any part of the said lands and estate . . . that may remain unsold at the time of my death being thereafter sold or disposed of or exembled by any proprietor or possessor of the same, or adjudged, or attempted to be adjudged, or carried away in any manner of way for his or her debt, that then and in any of these events there shall be paid out of the price of the lands . . . if and when sold, or created a real lien and burden upon the same if they shall remain unsold, to and in favour of such of the children of F as may then be in existence, or to their heirs, equally to and among them, the sum of £10,000." A, the institute, after succeeding under the destination, died, without heirs of his body, leaving a disposition of the estate to B for her liferent alimentary use only, and the heirs of her body in fee, whom failing, to C, a stranger to the original destination, and the heirs of his body, also strangers. When B, who was a married woman, and had no heirs of her body, was sixty-three years of age, one of the children of F brought an action against C for declarator that in consequence of A's disposition the provision in the original settlement in favour of the children of F had come into operation. Held (1) that the action was not premature; (2) that the provision in favour of the children of F was effectual as a condition of the gift to A; (3) on a construction of the whole deed of the testatrix, that A had "disposed of" the estate and so had come under an obligation to create a real burden over it for £10,000 in favour of the children of F; and (4) that C and his heirs, as A's gratuitous disponees, were, on succeeding to the estate, under the same obligation.

(1201)

Condition of sale of heritage—Amount of price.

A testator provided, inter alia, regarding certain heritable subjects "If they are sold my trustees are to expend £3500 in an annuity for my said sister so as to bring up the full sum expended in the annuity to £6000." The house was sold for £2500. Held that the application of the £3500 to the annuity was not conditional on the price reaching that amount.

his sons should be allowed to remain in his hands for eight years, on condition that the executor and residuary legatee should remain a director of the company in which the sum was invested. (1204)

Undertaking to satisfy condition.

A testator bequeathed the liferent of the residue of his estate to his widow, and directed the payment of certain legacies on her death. He further provided that his widow might consent to the payment of any or all of the legacies during her life, and that, should she surrender her liferent, his trustees might make payment of the legacies, in whole or in part, on such surrender. One of the legacies was to the University of Glasgow, for the endowment of a chair, and was made subject to the declaration that, "should either I or my wife endow any chair in the Glasgow or other University before the death of the survivor, then this bequest shall fall." The testator's widow surrendered the liferent and other provisions of the settlement, elected to take her legal rights, and executed a formal deed in which she confirmed this election and surrender, and consented, so far as she competently could, to the immediate payment of the whole legacies, and further bound herself "not to endow any chair in the Glasgow or other University now or at any time hereafter." Held that the condition attached to the legacy had not been satisfied, and that payment thereof could not be made until after the death of the widow.

(1206)

Opportunity of implementing condition—Intimation by trustees to beneficiaries.

A testator, in bequeathing a portion of his estate to nephews and nieces who were in America, added a declaration that the provisions in their favour should only take effect in the event of their returning to Scotland within a period of three years from the date of his death. No intimation was made to the nephews and nieces by the trustees, and they did not return within the three years. Held that, as the beneficiaries had not had an opportunity of electing, and had therefore made no election, they had not forfeited their provisions by failing to return within the prescribed period.

A B continued to reside with C D, but predeceased her. Opinion that the condition had been purified by A B's residing with C D so long as A B lived.

Prohibition of sale or mortgaging by liferenter—Clauses of irritancy and forfeiture.

In respect of a prohibition in a settlement, under which a bankrupt had a contingent right of liferent in heritable estate against the sale, mortgage, or other disposal of any interest under it, coupled with a declaration of irritancy and forfeiture against any person signing a deed for that purpose, the Court refused to require the bankrupt to execute a deed for the conveyance of his interest to the trustee as a condition of granting his discharge.

(1210)

Forfeiture—Validity—Construction.

In a direct disposition of landed estate there was a destination of the subjects to one person in liferent and his issue in fee, whom failing, to certain other persons in liferent and fee respectively. The disposition also declared that all who took a beneficial right under it were "prohibited from selling, mortgaging, or otherwise disposing of such interest, excepting always sales or mortgages by parties who are absolute fiars"; such sales or mortgages were declared void, and parties signing them were to lose all their rights under the settlement, and give place to the next in succession. Held that the clauses of prohibition and forfeiture were valid and effectual to prevent a sale by the liferenter of his liferent right.

Chaplin's Trustees v Hoile, 1890, 18 R. 27;
28 S.L.R. 51.

(1211)

Forfeiture of liferent on sale or mortgage by liferenter—Trust deed for creditors with power of sale—Sequestration.

By disposition and settlement an estate was conveyed to certain persons in liferent and certain other persons in fee under a declaration prohibiting the liferenters from "selling, mortgaging, or otherwise disposing of" their interest, and further declaring that "such sales and mortgages" should be void, that "all deeds or instruments purporting to be a sale or mortgage of such interest or part thereof" should be null and void, and that "all parties signing such deeds or instruments" should forfeit their rights in favour of the person next in succession. The liferenter in possession under this disposition granted a trust disposition for behoof of his creditors, conveying the liferent to the trustees with a power of sale; subsequently his estates were sequestrated. Held (1) that the trust disposition was neither a sale nor a mortgage, and, consequently, was not struck at by the clause of forfeiture; and (2) that as that clause did not strike at the diligence of creditors, the liferent was vested in the trustee by the sequestration; and that the trustee was entitled to sell the liferent interest without incurring the forfeiture.

A testator directed his trustees that, "so soon as they may find it convenient, they shall deliver and pay the following legacies to the parties after named:—To my nephew A in liferent and his children in fee, failing children, to his own nearest heirs equally, the sum of £3000." In a codicil he provided that A should have no power to sell his liferent, and that if he attempted to do so his liferent should be null and void. Held that the testator had not made provision for a continuing trust, and that the trustees were bound to pay the sum of £3000 to A upon a receipt or discharge bearing that the payment had been made and received subject to the conditions and provisions of the settlement.

XVIII. REPUGNANCY.1. DIRECTIONS AND POWERS TO TRUSTEES TO RETAIN.

(1215)

Beneficiary's right to immediate conveyance of vested share.

A testator directed his trustees to hold and manage, "as absolute proprietors," certain heritable property for behoof of his second son until the latter attained the age of twenty-five, when they were to denude in his favour, declaring that the property should not vest in him till he attained the age of twenty-five, or married, with the consent of the trustees, after attaining the age of twenty-one. The testator also directed his trustees to hold the whole residue of his moveable estate in certain shares for his children. The vesting clause was in similar terms to the vesting clause regarding the heritage, but there was no similar direction as to management. The trustees were, however, given an unlimited discretion as to the application of the annual interest of the shares of residue, and it was declared that on the sons attaining the age of twenty-five, and the daughters attaining that age or being married, they were to be entitled absolutely to any accumulations of interest on their respective shares, and the trustees were directed to pay over the same to them accordingly. The son, after attaining the age of twenty-one, but before attaining the age of twenty-five, married, with the approval of the trustees. Held (by a majority of seven judges) that the son's right to the heritage and to his share of the moveable estate having vested in him upon his marriage, with the consent of the trustees, he became then entitled to call upon the trustees to denude in his favour.

(1216)

A testator directed his trustees on the expiry of a liferent, in the events which happened, to divide his estate among the children of his brothers and sisters. By a codicil he directed his trustees to retain in their own hands the shares destined to the children of his sisters, and to pay to them neither the capital nor the revenues (which meantime were to be accumulated) so long as their fathers were alive. The liferent expired at a date more than twenty-one years after the testator's death, and at that date the fathers of the children were still in life. Held (by a majority of the whole Court) that the sisters' children had an unqualified right of fee in their shares and were entitled to demand immediate payment thereof.

Yuill's Trustees v Thomson, 1902, 4 F. 815; 39 S.L.R. 668; 10 S.L.T. 169.

Direction to trustees to hold for administration.

A testatrix directed her trustees to divide the residue of her estate equally between her two daughters, who were married, "and to their respective heirs and assignees, declaring that the provision hereby made . . . is an alimentary provision for their own separate use and behoof, and shall not be subject to the jus mariti or right of administration or management of their husbands, . . . but my trustees shall be bound to see to the investment of the said residue for my said daughters in such way and manner as shall to them appear best to secure and give effect to the foresaid declarations and conditions." Held that the fee of the residue was vested in the daughters, and that they were entitled to have the residue paid over to them upon their own receipts, the receipts to bear the exclusion of the jus mariti and right of administration.

(1218)

A testatrix, in her trust disposition and settlement, left the residue of her estate to certain persons named, equally, the said shares of residue to vest at the death of the testatrix, "declaring that the share falling to any of the said residuary legatees who are females and may be married at the time of my death shall be held by my said trustees, or invested for their behoof, exclusive of the jus mariti of their then or any other husband they may afterwards marry, and the annual produce of said share of residue paid to said legatee during her life, and at her death the principal sum shall be paid to her heirs or executors." Held that the fee of the shares of females who were married at the death of the testatrix vested in them at her death, and that they were entitled to immediate payment thereof.

(1219)

A testator appointed trustees, and left his property to be divided equally among his three children, two daughters and a son, providing that "any share that my daughter M may receive to go direct to her and her children. Failing the above-mentioned, her share to return to her nearest of kin, except her husband shall have the liferent. My daughter H's share I settle in like manner, excepting in the event of her decease without issue her share shall return to her nearest of kin. Also, my trustees shall retain charge of her share. It is not to go into her hands. The same with reference to my son C, his share to remain in the hands of my trustees for his behoof. In the event of his demise, his share to return to his nearest of kin." Held that the fee of each of the shares vested at the testator's death in his three children respectively; that the trustees were bound to pay over M's share to her at once; but that they were bound to retain the shares of H and C for their behoof.

Christie's Trustees v Murray's Trustees, 1889, 16 R. 913; 26 S.L.R. 611.

A testator directed his trustees to "divide, apply, pay, or convey, or hold, as after-mentioned," the residue of his estate, "to and equally among or for behoof of" all his children nominatim. He directed the trustees to hold the shares of residue falling to each of his daughters respectively in trust for behoof of the daughters or their children, and to pay the annual proceeds thereof to them, but subject always to full powers of disposal on the part of the daughters of their shares by any deed to be executed by them in the way of family settlements. Power was given to the trustees to make advances out of the capital to the daughters, and there was a destination over of the daughters' shares applicable to the event of their predeceasing the date of division, i.e., the death of the testator. There was no further disposal of the daughters' shares. A right to the fee of their respective shares of the residue having been held to vest in the daughters a morte testatoris, held further that the daughters were entitled to immediate payment of their shares.

(1220a)

A testator in his trust disposition and settlement bequeathed the residue of his estate for behoof of all his children equally. He directed his trustees to pay over to each of his sons the share of residue falling to him; and he directed that his trustees should hold the shares of his daughters during their respective lives, and, on the death of each, should pay her share to such person or persons as she might appoint by any revocable deed executed by her after she had reached the age of twenty-one, and, failing such appointment, then to her own nearest heirs. Then followed a declaration that "the whole of the said provisions, whether of capital or income, so far as conceived as in favour of or devolving upon females, shall be for their own sole and separate use, shall not be assignable by them or attachable for their debts or obligations, and shall be exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration of any husband or husbands they may marry, and shall not be subject to the debts of such husbands or the diligence of their creditors." Held that the daughters had not a right of fee, but merely a liferevent with a power to test on the capital of their shares.

Forrest's Trustees v Reid, 1904, 7 F. 142; 42 S.L.R. 133; 12 S.L.T. 484.

(1221)

A testator directed his trustees to divide his estate, on the expiry of certain liferevents, among certain nephews and nieces nominatim, equally, and further directed that the trustees should retain the capital of the shares belonging to the nephews and nieces so long as their father should be alive and pay to them the revenue thereof only. The liferevents having expired, held that the capital of the shares having vested in the nephews and nieces a morte testatoris, they were entitled to call on the trustees to denude in their favour notwithstanding that their father was still alive.

(1223)

Gift over of sum remaining at death of beneficiary.

A testator bequeathed his whole estate to A, "but to be under the control of B and C," who were appointed executors; he further provided that the executors should only be entitled to pay to A such sums as might be required for his maintenance, and that at A's death the estate, or such portion as might not have been expended on A's maintenance, should be divided among other beneficiaries. Held that the fee vested in A.

Cunningham v Cunningham, (O.H.) 1896, 4 S.L.T. 132.

(1224)

Power to settle.

A truster directed his trustees, on the youngest of his children attaining the age of twenty-five years, "to divide to them equal shares of the remainder of my said trust property, but to retain one-half of the said remainder for and on behalf of my said daughter, and until her marriage or death to pay her the free annual income of the said half, and to pay over the other half, share and share alike, to my said sons; and on the marriage or death of my said daughter, then to pay over to my said sons the remaining unpaid portion of their respective equal shares of the remainder of my said trust property, divided to them on the youngest of my said children attaining twenty-five years of age, but hitherto retained on behalf of my said daughter, their sister, but with power to my said trustees, if they see fit, to settle my daughter's portion on her, and excluding all right of her husband therein . . . but declaring that the shares of my said children shall vest in them on their respectively attaining the age of twenty-five years." Held that after the youngest child had attained the age of twenty-five years the whole children were entitled, on tendering a joint discharge, to require the trustees to make over to them the one-half share of residue which the testator directed them to retain for behoof of his daughter.

Brown v Brown's Trustees, 1890, 17 R. 517; 27 S.L.R. 414.

Direction to retain shares of company.

In a trust disposition and settlement the testator gave the following direction:—"Lastly, subject to . . . the declarations after mentioned, I appoint my trustees, when convenient, to divide, pay, assign, and dispose the residue of my estate . . . into five shares, corresponding to the number of my children, one of which shares they shall pay, assign, and dispose to" each of four children, A, B, C, and D. "Declaring" that, in so far as the residue consisted of shares in the company, W & S, Limited, "my trustees shall not be entitled to sell or assign to my said residuary legatees the said shares or any part thereof until the expiry of fifty years from 1st January, 1895, but the said shares shall be held by my trustees during the said period, when they shall be assigned by them to my said residuary legatees." At the date of his death, in 1896, the truster held shares in the company to the value of £100,000. Held that the primary direction in regard to residue conferred an unqualified right of fee on A, B, C, and D, and that the direction to the trustees to retain the shares for fifty years was void from repugnancy.

(1226)

Power to trustees to retain if expedient.

A testator directed her trustees to make over the residue of her estate to her son on his attaining the age of twenty-five, "declaring that my trustees shall be entitled, so long as they think it expedient to do so, to retain the said residue and remainder in their own hands, . . . and that even after" the son "shall have attained said age, and only pay him the annual produce or income thereof, it being understood that should they so retain it after he attains twenty-five years, and should he die without said residue and remainder and others having been paid to him, then the same shall be paid to his nearest heirs and representatives whomsoever, my intention being that the same should vest in him at said age of twenty-five." The son having gone bankrupt after attaining the age of twenty-five, but before the residue had been made over to him, held that the residue having vested in the son the testamentary trustees were not entitled to retain it, but were bound to pay it over to the son's trustee.

Mackinnon's Trustees v Official Receiver in Bankruptcy in England, 1892, 19 R. 1051; 29 S.L.R. 867.

(1227)

Direction to pay on youngest of children attaining majority.

A testator by his trust disposition and settlement directed his trustees to pay the whole income of his estate to his widow, and "upon the subsequent marriage or upon the death of my said wife . . . I direct my trustees . . . to hold the remainder of my whole means and estate in trust for behoof of my children till the youngest of them shall reach majority, when my said trustees shall . . . convert the whole of my estate, . . . and shall divide and pay over the same equally among them; declaring that if any of my said children shall predecease the time of division leaving issue, such issue shall succeed to their parent's share equally among them." The widow took her legal rights and so forfeited her provisions under the settlement. Held (1) that the provisions in favour of the children vested a morte testatoris; and (2) that the widow's interest being at an end, the direction to postpone payment till the youngest child attained majority was ineffectual, as being repugnant to the children's vested right of fee, and that consequently those of the children who had attained majority were entitled to immediate payment of their shares.

Direction to pay on death of party named.

In contemplation of marriage a lady conveyed her estate to trustees for behoof of herself in lifereit and of the issue of the marriage and the lawful issue of predeceasers "payable at the majority or marriage of such issue whichever of these events shall first happen . . . after the decease or second marriage of the" husband if he should be the survivor of the spouses. The wife was survived by the husband and by two children who were of full age and who took a vested interest in the fee of the trust funds as at the wife's death. Held that the children were entitled to immediate payment of the trust estate notwithstanding the direction to postpone payment until the death of the husband.

Annuity to widow—Direction to divide estate among children on death of widow—Portion of estate not required for annuity.

A testator directed his trustees to pay an annuity to his wife and to divide the balance of the income equally among his children, and on the death of his wife to divide his estate equally among his children. The testator left moveable estate considerably in excess of what was sufficient to secure the annuity. He was survived by his wife and two sons. Held that the trustees were bound forthwith to distribute the capital among the children, except in so far as it was necessary to retain the same to secure the widow's annuity.

Direction to pay to daughters — Power of disposal — Codicil restricting power of disposal.

A testator directed his trustees to pay or make over to each of three of his daughters one-fifth share of the residue and remainder of his means and estate, "the said shares to be at the absolute disposal" of the daughters. By subsequent codicil he "revoked and altered" his settlement "to this extent, that, in place of the absolute power therein given to" his three daughters, "I restrict that absolute power in each case to one-half of their respective shares of my . . . estate, and in respect of the other half none of them shall have power to deal with it during their respective lifetime, beyond the interest or revenue derived from it; but they shall have power by any deed or writing duly executed by them to will the same over after their death to such person or persons or such objects as they may think proper, my object in making this restriction being that they shall not by any act on their part deprive themselves of a fair livelihood during their lifetime." Held that, as there was a clear direction to the trustees in the trust settlement to pay over the daughters' shares, and as that direction was not recalled, and as no machinery was provided for carrying out the provisions of the codicil, the trustees were not entitled to hold any part of the shares.

Legacy payable at a future date—Possible encroachments in carrying out trust purposes.

A testator bequeathed to his son John a legacy of £4500, the same not to be paid to him until he arrived at the age of thirty, but the trustees to pay him interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum from the time he reached twenty-five until he reached thirty. John having claimed that he was entitled to immediate payment of the £4500, or at least of a part thereof, on his attaining the age of twenty-five, in respect that the whole beneficial interest had vested in him, held that he was not entitled to any payment, as there were trust purposes which might involve encroachment on the capital of the £4500.

Graham's Trustees v Graham, 1899, 2 F. 232; 37 S.L.R. 163; 7 S.L.T. 283.

Direction to hold and apply as trustees might think best.

A testator directed his trustees, after payment of an alimentary liferent of the residue of his estate to his brother, Joseph Ritchie, to "hold and apply" one-half of the residue "for the uses and behoof of Alexander Ritchie, son of Joseph Ritchie, and of any other child or children that may yet be procreated of his marriage, equally among them if more than one, and if only one child should be left, then for the sole use and behoof of such child, and that in such sums, at such times, and in such manner as my trustees shall think best, and of which they shall be the sole judges." Joseph Ritchie survived his brother, the testator, and as one of his brother's two next of kin was entitled to one-half of such part of his brother's estate as might be undisposed of. Joseph Ritchie died, leaving a will by which he bequeathed the fee of his whole estates to his only son Alexander. Alexander having called on his grandfather's trustees to denude of one-half of the trust estates in his favour, held that the fee of one-half of the residue of his grandfather's estate having vested in Alexander Ritchie either under his grandfather's will or ab intestato, the trustees were bound to denude in his favour.

Discretion to apply income for liferenter or liferenter's issue—Liferenter also fiar.

The liferenters of a trust estate had also a vested right in the fee, but the trustees were directed to continue to hold the estate so long as any of the liferenters were alive, and were given a discretion as to the amount of income, if any, to be paid to each of them. The trustees were also given a discretionary power to apply the income for the maintenance of the issue of liferenters who might die. Held that the liferenters were not entitled to immediate payment of the trust funds.

(1234)

Gift of fee followed by limiting provision.

A testator by his will appointed an executor, and disposed of the residue of his estate by leaving it to two persons "for behoof of" Mrs. R and Mrs. B, and enjoined on these two persons "not to put a shilling at risk during the life of the two ladies." There was no further disposal of the residue. Held that the residue was vested in fee in the two ladies equally, and that they were entitled to immediate payment thereof.

(1235)

Gift of fee in will—Direction to retain in codicil—Income to be alimentary.

A testator, by his trust disposition and settlement, directed his trustees to pay a sum of £2000 to his son, or, in the event of their seeing fit to do so, to retain the sum in their hands for his behoof and pay him the interest. By a codicil the testator appointed his trustees, instead of paying over the sum of £2000 to his son, to retain that sum in their hands for his behoof, and to pay him the interest annually as an alimentary provision, and on the son's death to pay the sum of £2000 to his heirs and representatives equally. Held that the directions in the codicil were not repugnant to the gift of fee in the settlement.

(1236)

Direction to divide at a certain date—Share of residue vested but not payable till ascertained.

Held that a legatee who had a vested right to a definite pro indiviso share of residue was not entitled to payment thereof before the date fixed by the testator for realising the estate, as the amount of residue could not be ascertained before that date.

Opinion (per Lord Davey) that Miller's Trustees v Miller (No. 1215, supra), and Yuill's Trustees v Thomson (No. 1216, supra), were well decided.

(1237)

Legacies payable and residue divisible at widow's death—Vesting a morte testatoris—Surplus income to be accumulated with residue—Acceleration of payment prejudicial to residuary legatees.

A testator directed his trustees to pay his widow an annuity of £500 out of the residue of his estate, and to accumulate the surplus income as part of residue. On her death they were directed to pay out of residue certain legacies amounting to £4000, and thereafter to divide the remainder into four equal shares and pay them to certain residuary legatees. The legacies and shares of residue had vested a morte testatoris. The widow having renounced her annuity and obtained her legal rights, one of the residuary legatees claimed immediate payment of his share. The other residuary legatees were opposed to his demand. Held that the Court could not, in the absence of consent by the beneficiaries, accelerate the date of payment, as this would prejudice the residuary legatees by depriving them of their right to the interest of the legacies, which was to be accumulated with residue until the widow's death.

2. DIRECTION TO PURCHASE ANNUITY.

(1238)

Direction to purchase annuity—Investment.

When a testator has directed a particular investment for behoof of a beneficiary who would have unlimited control over the investment if it were made, the Court will not enforce implement of the direction: so held where a testator directed his trustees to purchase a Government annuity and also an annuity from an insurance company for two beneficiaries.

(1239)

A father by trust disposition and settlement directed his trustees to purchase an annuity for his daughter, the same to be exclusive of the ius mariti of any husband she might marry, his debts or deeds, or the diligence of his creditors. After the father's death his trustees, under an arrangement with the daughter, paid a sum equivalent to the price of the annuity to certain trustees, in order that they might hold the money for behoof of the daughter on conditions similar to those imposed on the father's trustees. Held that the daughter, being the only person interested, would have been entitled to have had the price of the annuity paid to her by her father's trustees, and that she was entitled to revoke her own trust deed and to receive the whole sum paid to her trustees.

(1240)

Direction to purchase alimentary annuity—No continuing trust.

A father directed his testamentary trustees to divide the residue of his estate between his two sons, in manner following:—The trustees to advance to each son, for the purpose of setting him up in business, a sum not exceeding one-half of his share of residue, "and the other half or balance" "shall be invested, when my said trustees shall consider it proper and prudent to do so, in the purchase of two separate annuities for each of my said sons, or the survivor of them," declaring that the annuities should be alimentary and not assignable by the sons. Held that the trustees were not bound to purchase the annuities, but that they were entitled to pay over to one of the sons who desired to enter business his half of the capital.

Tod v Tod's Trustees, 1871, 9 M. 728; 43 J. 379; 8 S.L.R. 445.

(1241)

A testator directed his trustees to purchase at his death, with half of the residue of his estate, an alimentary annuity for his sister, exclusive of the rights of her husband and creditors. The sister died two days after the testator, leaving a will in favour of her husband. Held that, as there was no continuing trust, the annuity was not effectually rendered alimentary; and that the half of the residue required to purchase the annuity had vested in the testator's sister, and had passed on her death to her husband.

Brown's Trustees v Thom, 1916 S.C. 32; 53 S.L.R. 59; 1915, 2 S.L.T. 278.

(1242)

A testatrix directed her trustees to set aside a certain sum, "and to purchase from the Government or any Scottish insurance company of good standing a joint annuity payable to my daughters . . . equally during their joint lives and the lives of the survivors or survivor of them, which annuities shall be for their alimentary use alienably, not subject to their debts or deeds nor liable to the diligence of their creditors, and without power of anticipation." The testatrix made no provision for a continuing trust to protect the alimentary character of this annuity, but conferred upon the trustees "all requisite powers for carrying out the purposes of this settlement." Held that the daughters were entitled to immediate payment of the capital sum directed to be expended on the purchase of the annuity.

(1243)

Trustees under a trust disposition and settlement were directed to apply one-third of the residue of the estate in the purchase of an annuity for a legatee subject to the condition that "the same is for the present support and subsistence only of the annuitant" and that it should not be either assignable or subject to the diligence of creditors. There was no provision for a continuing trust. Held that the legatee was entitled to payment in money of the share of residue, on the ground that if an annuity were purchased it would be at the absolute disposal of the annuitant.

Kennedy's Trustees v Warren, 1901, 3 F. 1087; 38 S.L.R. 827; 9 S.L.T. 149.

(1244)

A testator by trust settlement left certain property to his wife, and declared—"By acceptance hereof she binds herself to execute a settlement of her own affairs, so as that my own relatives shall have at least the two-thirds of what may be at her disposal, to be invested in life annuities on the lives of my nephews and nieces" which were to be of an alimentary character. Held, upon the wife's death, that as her husband had given her no directions to create a continuing trust for the preservation of the alimentary character of the annuities directed to be purchased for the nephews and nieces, they had an unrestricted right to two-thirds of her estate as at her death, and were entitled to immediate and unconditional payment thereof.

Murray v Macfarlane's Trustees, 1895, 22 R. 927; 32 S.L.R. 715; 3 S.L.T. 63.

Government annuity.

A testatrix directed her trustees "to provide and apply the sums after mentioned in the purchase of Government or savings bank annuities for the persons after named . . . and the said annuities shall be strictly alimentary and shall be payable to the said annuitants on their own receipt . . . and shall not be assignable or affectable by creditors." The testatrix did not provide for a continuing trust. The persons for whose behoof annuities were directed to be purchased having called on the trustees to make payment to them of the capital sums directed to be so invested, on the ground that, under the Government Annuities Act, 1853, sec. 25, it was impossible to purchase annuities, in terms of the truster's directions, which should be effectual against creditors, held that the trustees were bound to invest the sums in question in Government annuities payable to the annuitants according to the directions of the truster in so far as these directions could be carried out.

Hutchinson's Trustees v Young, 1903, 6 F. 26; 41 S.L.R. 14; 11 S.L.T. 359.

Direction to purchase Government annuity.

A testator directed his executor or his trustees to invest certain sums in the purchase of annuities in the name and for the benefit of certain persons. He further provided—"And I declare that all annuities . . . shall be purchased by him or them from the British Government or from the Scottish Widows' Insurance Co., of Edinburgh, in Scotland, and any other first-class company or annuity office as my said executor or . . . trustees shall in this behalf think fit." There was no declaration that the annuities were to be alimentary, but Government annuities, purchased under the Government Annuities Act, 1853, are not assignable except on the insolvency or bankruptcy of the annuitant. The beneficiaries having called on the trustees to pay over the principal sums instead of investing them in the purchase of annuities, held that the beneficiaries were entitled to payment of the principal sums.

Power to purchase annuity.

A testator directed his trustees to divide his estate into three parts, and "to lay out and invest" two-thirds of it in heritable securities or Government stock and "pay the proceeds" to his two sisters, share and share alike. He also authorised his trustees to purchase with the said two-thirds an annuity "payable to my two sisters . . . exclusive of 'the jus mariti and right of administration of any husbands which they may marry, as I intend the same to be a provision for their own more comfortable support, and it shall not be assignable by them; and in the event of the death of any of them, then the said annuity shall be payable in the same manner to the survivor.'" There was no further disposal of the fee of the said two-thirds. The trustees paid the revenue of the two-thirds to the sisters, as long as they both survived, and on the death of one of them, to the survivor. The survivor, who was also donee of the predecessor, having claimed payment of the capital of the two-thirds, held that she was entitled to it, the fee of the bequests having vested in her and her sister.

Lawson's Trustees v Lawson, 1890, 17 R. 1167; 27 S.L.R. 899.

3. POWER TO TRUSTEES TO REDUCE FEE TO LIFERENT.

[See also IX. 11 (2), supra.]

(1248)

Income of unpaid funds to beneficiary—Fee destined to issue.

A testator by his settlement directed his trustees to divide the residue of his estate among his children. There was a survivorship clause, which is the case of sons prevented vesting from taking place before they attained majority. The testator further provided that the capital of one-half of the shares of residue falling to the sons should not be payable before they respectively attained twenty-five. Power was conferred on the trustees to withhold payment of the capital of the said half even after a son had attained twenty-five, and to pay the income to the son as an alimentary provision. If any son survived the testator, and attained majority, but died without receiving payment of the whole of his share, the unpaid capital was to be paid to the son's lawful issue. Held that the provisions of the later purpose were not repugnant to the gift of fee in the former, but effectually qualified that gift and that portions of capital retained by the trustees from a son's share in exercise of the powers conferred on them, and remaining in their hands at the death of the son leaving issue did not vest in the son, but belonged to his issue.

Power to trustees to restrict interest of beneficiary.

A legacy was given, in the event which happened, to two sons of the testator's daughter. The trustees of the settlement, acting in professed exercise of a power conferred by the settlement, executed a minute whereby they restricted the sons' interest to an alimentary liferent, with a testamentary power of disposal of the fee. The minute was invalid, not being in terms of the power. Opinion (per Lord McLaren) that, even if it had been in terms of the power, it would have been ineffectual, in respect that it was legally impossible to protect the life interest of a person to whom the fee was also given against his own voluntary acts.

4. FEE DECLARED TO BE ALIMENTARY.

(1251)

Fee conferred in settlement declared to be alimentary by codicil.

By trust disposition and settlement a testatrix directed her trustees in the second place to give certain furniture and other effects to her two daughters; in the third place, to convey her heritable property to the daughters equally; and in the fourth place, inter alia, to pay one-third share of the residue of her estates to each of the daughters. By a codicil the testator revoked the second and third purposes of the settlement, and in place thereof directed her trustees to sell the whole of her furniture and effects mentioned in the second purpose, and also her heritable property mentioned in the third purpose, and to hold the proceeds thereof, and also the shares of the residue appointed to be paid to the daughters under the fourth purpose, in their own hands, for the benefit and alimentary use of the daughters, and to apply the same for their behoof in such way and manner as the trustees might consider expedient, and to pay the daughters the capital and interest, or only the interest, in such manner as to the trustees should seem proper, as to all which she gave the trustees most ample powers and discretion, without control or interference on the part of the daughters or their husbands, the provisions being purely alimentary, and not subject to the ius mariti or right of administration of the husbands. The testatrix declared that it should not be in the power of the daughters or their husbands to sell or burden with debt the provisions or any part thereof, either absolutely or in security, nor to anticipate the payment thereof, nor should the same be arrestable for, or affectable by, their debts or deeds of any description whatsoever, or subject to the diligence of their creditors. In all other respects the testatrix confirmed her settlement. Held (1) that the codicil was not to be construed as altering the period of vesting under the settlement, but merely as making a money addition to the daughters' shares of residue, vesting a morte testatoris; and (2) that the daughters were entitled to immediate payment of their provisions, the directions to the trustees to retain, in the codicil, being void from repugnancy.

Fee declared to be alimentary by later clause of settlement.

By his settlement a testator directed his trustees to realise his whole estate, "and thereafter (subject always to the discretionary power vested in my trustees hereinafter mentioned) to divide" the proceeds thereof equally among his children and the issue of predeceasing children. There followed a declaration that, "notwithstanding the power of division above mentioned," the trustees should have the most absolute discretionary power to retain any of these shares instead of paying them over, and to pay over the annual income only derived from the share or shares so retained, or to pay the capital thereof by such instalments, and at such times, as they might determine; and a further special declaration "that the whole provisions hereunder in favour of my son J W are purely and strictly alimentary, and the same shall not be attachable by the debts or deeds of the said J W, nor attachable by the diligence of his creditors," and that any share retained by the trustees under their discretionary power should be subject to this declaration. There was no ulterior destination of the shares of residue. In a special case, in which the trustees stated that they saw no occasion to exercise their discretionary power, and were prepared to hand over J W's share to him, if they had power to do so, held (1) that under the direction to divide the estate among the truster's children a right of fee was conferred on J W, which was not withdrawn by the subsequent declarations; (2) that, this being so, the declaration that the provision to J W should be alimentary was ineffectual; and, accordingly, that the trustees were entitled to pay over to him his share of residue.

No continuing trust provided.

A testator left the fee of certain heritable subjects (or the price thereof if sold) to his daughters. He declared the provisions left by him to his daughters to be alimentary, and excluded the ius mariti of their husbands, but did not provide a continuing trust. Held that the daughters were entitled to payment of their provisions on granting receipts in terms of the trust deed.

5. EXCLUSION OF MARRIAGE CONTRACT CONVEYANCE OF ACQUIRENDA.

(1255)

By an antenuptial marriage contract the wife, with consent of her father, conveyed her acquirenda during the marriage to trustees. The father by his settlement left to the wife the fee of a share of the residue of his estate, and directed that it should not fall under the conveyance in the marriage contract, and he authorised the trustees to take such steps as they might think necessary or proper to give effect to this direction. The wife survived her father, but died without receiving payment of her share of residue. Held that, as the father's settlement conferred on the wife the absolute property of the share of residue, the declaration that it should not fall under the conveyance in the marriage contract was ineffectual.

Douglas's Trustees v Kay's Trustees, 1879, 7 R. 295; 17 S.L.R. 180.

A lady, by her antenuptial contract of marriage, assigned and conveyed to trustees her whole estate, and all she might succeed to or acquire during the subsistence of the marriage. An aunt, after narrating her knowledge of the terms of the antenuptial contract, directed her testamentary trustees to pay to her niece a share of her estate "for her own absolute use and benefit," declaring that, notwithstanding the provisions of said contract, the trustees under the same were not to be entitled to claim said share, but that it was to be her niece's absolute property, free from the control of the trustees, and further declaring that, in the event of its being necessary to give effect to her wishes and intentions, her testamentary trustees were to pay over the share to her niece in trust for herself in liferent and her children in fee, with power to her to distribute and apportion the same amongst her children, and to use and apply the capital in any way that might appear to her to be right for the benefit of herself and her children. Held (by a majority of the whole Court) that the settlement conferred on the niece an absolute right to the property and possession of her share; that the declaration that the marriage contract trustees should not be entitled to claim that share was in consequence ineffectual; and therefore that the share fell to be made over to the marriage contract trustees.

Heritage disposed to A in liferent and B in fee — Declaration that subjects to transmit to A if grantor died before B attained twenty-five — Repugnancy.

Robert Cruickshank, by gratuitous inter vivos disposition, disposed certain heritable subjects to Mrs. Forsyth, his daughter, in liferent for her liferent use allenarly, and to her daughter, Miss Agnes Forsyth, in fee, and to the heirs of her body, heritably and irredeemably, "but these presents are granted under the express condition and declaration that . . . in the event of the said Agnes Forsyth dying before attaining the age of twenty-five (without leaving issue) survived by me, the said subjects shall revert to me, and these presents shall, ipso facto, become void and null, and in that event I shall be entitled to deal with the subjects as my own, and to sell or burden the same as freely as if these presents had never been granted; and in the event of my predeceasing my grand-daughter before she attains said age, the subjects shall transmit to my said daughter, and failing her, to my own heirs whomsoever." The disposition was recorded in the Register of Sasines on behalf of Mrs. Forsyth in liferent allenarly and Miss Agnes Forsyth in fee, and Mrs. Forsyth entered into possession of the subjects. The granter of the disposition died before Miss Agnes Forsyth had attained the age of twenty-five. Held that the clause of transmission to Mrs. Forsyth in the event of the granter dying before Miss Forsyth had attained the age of twenty-five was repugnant to the gift of the fee to Miss Forsyth, and was ineffectual, and that the fee of the property belonged to Miss Forsyth.

(1261)

Gift of fee — Directions for disposal on death of fiar of part not required or used by fiar.

In a mutual disposition and settlement a husband disposed the residue of his estate to his wife in the event of her survivance, under the declaration "that, so far as not required or used by my said spouse for her comfortable subsistence, the sums to be realised from the policy of insurance on my life shall on the death of the longer liver of me and my said spouse be paid to my said sons A and B in equal shares." Held that there was no repugnancy, and that the disposition of the residue and the declaration must be read together, being in substance a disposition of an estate, with the exception of a certain part of it.

B predeceased A, leaving a will, under which he appointed executors who were found to be entitled to B's share of the residue. In addition to the inventory and legacy duties payable by A's executors the Crown claimed inventory and legacy duties from B's executors on one-third of A's residue on the ground that it had been disposed of by B's will. Held that B's executors were not liable for the duties claimed, as B had no power to dispose of and had not disposed of any part of A's estate.

(1266)

Non-exercise of power.

A testator directed his trustees to pay over to his widow a certain sum, to be by her divided among her relations "as she shall think fit." Observed that any attempt of whatever kind to compel the widow to divide the sum must be absolutely inept.

Bank of Scotland v Comrie, 1871, 8 S.L.R. 419.

(1267)

Power conferred on A and failing exercise by him on B—Effect of exercise by A.

By antenuptial marriage contract power to apportion a provision in favour of the children of the marriage was reserved to the husband, and failing exercise by him a similar power was conferred on the wife. The husband having exercised the power by his will, held that the power conferred on the widow was evacuated.

Darling's Executor v Darling, (O.H.) 1869, 41 J. 545.

(1268)

Appointment revocable or irrevocable.

A testator by his settlement directed his trustees to hold a share of the residue of his estate for the children of his brother. By a codicil he conferred on his trustees discretionary powers (1) to apportion the share among the children, (2) to exclude any child, and (3) to retain the share of any child. Observed that the trustees might exercise these powers revocably or irrevocably, but if they once made an absolute exercise of any of the powers they could not go back on what they had done.

Macfarlane's Trustee v Macfarlane, 1903, 6 F. 201; 41 S.L.R. 164; 11 S.L.T. 505.

(1269)

Delivered disposition.

The lands of N were held in trust for a father in liferent allanarly and his children in fee in such proportions as the father might appoint. The father in exercise of the power disposed one-third pro indiviso part of the lands to his second son. The disposition was delivered and infettment followed. Held that the deed was a valid and irrevocable exercise of the power of apportionment.

Murray's Trustee v Murray, 1872, 10 M. 773; 44 J. 545; 9 S.L.R. 497.

(1270)

Undelivered deed.

A mother who had a power of disposal over a certain fund executed a deed of appointment in favour of her son. Thereafter she made a will revoking all prior settlements. The deed of appointment was not delivered and was found in the mother's repositories after her death. Held that the deed of appointment was at best a testamentary deed, and, if originally operative, was revoked by the will.

Crosbie's Trustees v Wylie, (O.H.) 1902, 10 S.L.T. 395.

(1271)

Power to substitute annuity for payment of capital sum—Alimentary annuity.

By antenuptial marriage contract, the intended wife conveyed certain funds to trustees, directing them to pay the income thereof to herself during her life, and on her death, survived by her husband, to him, and on the death of both spouses, to pay the fee to the child or children of the marriage, subject to a power—conferred on the spouses jointly, and failing a joint exercise of the power, on the wife, and failing her exercise of the power, on the husband—to direct that the share or any portion of the share falling to any child or children should be laid out “in the purchase of an annuity for such child or children, . . . or in any other way or manner that may appear most for his or her benefit in the opinion of the said spouses jointly, or of either of the intended spouses who may exercise this power.” Opinion (per Lord Young) that it was a competent exercise of this power to direct that the share of a child should be laid out in the purchase of an annuity for the alimentary use only of such child, and not assignable by the child.

2. POWER OF DISPOSAL (INCLUDING POWER TO TEST).

(1) CONSTRUCTION OF POWER.

(1272)

Power to bequeath capital retained by trustees to meet annuity—Capital retained in excess of capital required.

A testator directed his trustees to pay to his widow an annuity of £500, with power to his widow to bequeath the amount retained to provide for the annuity to any one or more of the children of the marriage as she might think fit. The income of the capital retained by the trustees, after payment of the annuity, left a surplus of from £120 to £150 a year. After the death of the widow, who had exercised her power of bequest, held that the power of bequest extended to the whole capital retained to meet the annuity, the trustees having acted in good faith, and the sum retained not being so extravagant as to show that they had not exercised a reasonable discretion.

(1275)

Exercise of power by general bequest of residue.

A bequest of the moveable estate of a testator is to be construed as including any personal estate which he may have power to appoint in any manner he may think proper, and operates as an execution of such power unless a contrary intention appears by the will.

Bray v Bruce's Executors, 1906, 8 F. 1078; 43 S.L.R. 746; 14 S.L.T. 222.

—A testator directed his trustees to pay to his daughter M, during her life, the interest of a sum of £3500, and at her death to pay over the capital to her children; and in the event of her having no children, to such persons as she should direct by any writing under her hand; and failing such direction, to the heir of entail in possession of an estate (which he had directed to be entailed on his elder son); or failing him, to the daughter's next of kin. M survived the testator and died unmarried, leaving a general settlement by which she conveyed to trustees her “whole estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal, of what kind or nature soever, or wheresoever situated, presently belonging and addebt, or which shall belong and be addebt to me at the time of my decease,” for, inter alia, payment of certain legacies which amounted to £18,000. She also named certain residuary legatees. The deed made no reference to the father's will or to the power of disposal conferred by it. At the date of M's settlement her estate amounted in value only to £15,200, and she was fully aware of this and of her power of disposal of the £3500 under her father's will. Held that M had effectually exercised the power of disposal.

(1277)

A son who was entitled under his father's settlement to the fee of part of his father's estate and to the life of another part with a power of testing thereon, left a will in which, after bequeathing certain legacies, he left the residue of his real and personal estate to his brothers. Held that the will was to be construed as embracing the share of his father's estate of which he had power to dispose by will.

(1278)

A daughter had under her father's settlement "power to dispose by settlement" of any part of £2000, not exceeding £1000, the remaining part, or the whole, if she did not exercise the power, being directed to be applied, with the residue of the father's estate, in payment of the debts on his entailed estate, which devolved on his son. The daughter left upwards of £15,000, and a testament by which she nominated an executor, and directed him to divide her estate equally among her nephews and nieces, and to pay her legacies. Held that the testatrix had not exercised the power.

Mackenzie v Gillanders, 1874, 1 R. 1050; 11 S.L.R. 612.

Two powers expressly exercised and third not mentioned.

By his trust disposition and settlement a testator gave his widow (1) a power to dispose of certain furniture; (2) a power of appointment to the residue of his moveable estate; and (3) a power of appointment to one-half of the proceeds of the sale of a property called Blackmount. Failing disposal or appointment by her, he directed (1) the furniture to go to her grandnieces A and B; (2) the residue of his moveable estate to go to A and B equally; and (3) the said half of the proceeds of the sale of Blackmount to go to certain other relatives of his wife. The widow by her will appointed an executor and directed the residue of "my means and estate" to be divided between A and B, two-thirds to A and one-third to B. With express reference to the powers given to her to dispose of the furniture and of the residue of her husband's moveable estate, she (1) apportioned the furniture, and (2) by a codicil directed the residue of her husband's moveable estate to be divided between A and B equally. The will and codicil made no mention of Blackmount. Held (by a Court of seven judges) (1) that the widow's residuary bequest must be held to be a valid exercise of the power, and to include the said half of the proceeds of the sale of Black-mount, unless her will indicated a contrary intention; and (2) that her will showed no such intention.

(1280)

Exercise of power by prior general settlement.

A died in 1901, leaving a will, dated in 1894, by which he bequeathed "the whole estate and effects of every description of which I may die possessed." At the date of his death he had, under the settlement (dated in 1898) of a relative who died in 1899, the power of disposing by will of a fund which he had life-tenanted since that date. Held (1) that it was to be presumed that A intended to bequeath everything of which he should have the power of disposal at the time of his death; and (2) that the will took effect at A's death as a valid exercise of the power, although it had been executed before the power was conferred.

(1281)

In 1879 a lady executed a settlement by which she conveyed her whole estates to executors, directing them to pay certain legacies, and disposing of the residue. In 1886 she entered into a second marriage, and by antenuptial contract on the occasion of that marriage she conveyed her whole estate then belonging to her, or which she might acquire during the subsistence of the marriage, to trustees, who were directed to hold the estate for her behoof in life-tenancy, and to hold the capital for behoof of such person or persons and on such terms and payable at such periods as she might appoint by any writing under her hand, and, failing appointment, for her nearest heirs in mobilibus. The lady died about a year after her marriage, survived by her husband, and leaving the settlement of 1879, but no other writing except the marriage contract. Held that the deed of 1879 was not effectual as an appointment under the marriage contract, which was to be taken as a settlement of the lady's entire estate as existing at her death.

(1282)

A testator gave to her daughter the life-tenancy of a share of her estate and a power of disposal over the capital. Held that the daughter's will, being a general testamentary deed and there being nothing in it to show an intention to the contrary, constituted an effectual exercise of the power of disposal, although there was no express reference to the power, and that it was immaterial that the will was made prior to the death of the mother, and therefore before the power became operative, in respect that the daughter's will spoke as at her death which was subsequent to that of her mother.

White's Trustee v Mathie, (O.H.) 1899, 7 S.L.T. 81.

(1283)

Power to test—Partial exercise—Vesting.

By mutual settlement dated in 1867, a husband conveyed to his wife, in the event of her survivance, the whole estate which might belong to him at the time of his death, and the wife made a similar conveyance in favour of her husband. The mutual conveyances were declared to be subject to the following condition: that any will left by the predeceaser should receive effect in the case of the predecease of the husband, to an extent not exceeding three-fifths, and in the case of the wife to an extent not exceeding two-fifths of the estate "remaining at the death of the survivor." In 1873 the husband executed a testamentary writing, whereby, on the narrative that the funds of the spouses amounted to £5000, of which "£2000 belongs to my wife in her own right," he authorised his wife after his death "to make another settlement, and to leave to my relations the following sums, of which they will receive after your death, viz." He then specified the sums to be left to the families of his late brother and of certain sisters, and other sums to be left to his other sisters. He further directed that what was "over out of my shares of the money, as mentioned by me, viz., £3000 that belongs to me," was to be divided equally "amongst each of the families." The husband died in 1876, survived by his wife, who died in 1887. At the husband's death the funds belonging to the spouses exceeded £5000, and they had increased still further at the date of the wife's death. Held that the husband's testamentary writing was effectual as an exercise of his reserved power of testing, and that it disposed of £3000 only.

(1284)

Conveyance of acquisita and acquirenda under postnuptial marriage contract.

A lady who, under her grandfather's will, had the liferent alienarily of a share of the residue of his estate and a power to appoint to the fee by any writing under her hand, conveyed to her husband, by postnuptial marriage contract, her "whole estate, goods, chattels, and effects, heritable and moveable, real and personal, now pertaining and belonging to her, or that shall happen to pertain and belong to her in any manner of way" at the time of her death. Held that the conveyance was a valid exercise of the power of appointment.

(1286)

Exercise of power by marriage contract.

A testator conferred upon his widow a power "to leave and bequeath or otherwise dispose of" the capital of a certain fund. In contemplation of a second marriage the widow entered into a marriage contract whereby she assigned all estate "presently pertaining or belonging, or that shall pertain and be owing to her at the time of her death" for certain purposes. Held that this was an effectual exercise of the power.

Thomson's Trustees v Pringle, (O.H.) 1901, 9 S.L.T. 11.

(1287)

Destination over failing exercise of power—Donee of power directing fund to be paid to conditional institutes.

A testator directed his trustees to hold half the residue of his estate for payment of the income thereof to his sister, so long as she remained unmarried, and on her death unmarried "to pay the capital of said half of my estate to the person or persons to whom she may bequeath the same by any will," and, failing any direction by her, to pay it to certain specified legatees. The testator's sister, who survived him and died unmarried, left a settlement by which she declared that "it is my wish and desire that the capital of the said half of" the brother's "whole estate shall be divided among the legatees appointed by him under his said trust disposition and deed of settlement." Held that the sister had not exercised the power of appointment.

Misdescription of event in which power exercisable.

By antenuptial marriage contract the husband reserved power to dispose of the estate conveyed by him to the marriage contract trustees "in the event of there being no issue born of the said intended marriage or none surviving or leaving issue at the termination of the liferent interests before provided, and failing thereof to his own nearest heirs or assignees." The marriage was dissolved by the death of the husband. He left a trust settlement by which he, inter alia, provided—"Sixth, in the event of there being no issue of our marriage alive at my death, or in the event of there being issue and their dying before the youngest of them attaining the foresaid age of twenty-one years complete, I direct my trustees" to convey the marriage contract trust estate to his widow, whom failing, to certain other persons named, "whom in the foresaid order I hereby appoint to be my residuary legatees and nominees under the said antenuptial contract of marriage." There was one child of the marriage, who survived her father, attained the age of twenty-one, and died before the termination of the liferent interests created by the marriage contract. Held that in the events which had occurred the sixth purpose had the effect of constituting the widow her husband's nominee under the antenuptial contract of marriage.

(3) VALIDITY OF EXERCISE.

(1290)

Power of disposal "during her life"—Exercise by mortis causa deed.

Heritable property was conveyed to M for her liferent use only, and to her children in fee, with the declaration that "it shall be lawful to and in the power of the said M by herself alone, during her life, to sell, burden, or otherwise dispose, onerously or gratuitously, of the said subjects as she may think proper." Held that the power did not entitle her to dispose of the subjects by mortis causa deed.

Miller's Trustees v Findlay, 1896, 24 R. 114; 34 S.L.R. 71; 4 S.L.T. 138.

Power to dispose by testament—Exercise by general will.

A father in his trust disposition provided that if his only son should die unmarried he should have power to dispose "by testament of £5000 sterling of the trust estate, to be payable at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after his death." The son died unmarried, leaving a trust disposition in which he conveyed his whole estates to trustees. The direction as to residue was as follows:—"And lastly, the whole residue of my means and estate, and of the said sum of £5000 of my father's trust estate, shall . . . be applied by my said trustees in whatever manner they may judge best for the advancement and diffusion of the science of phrenology, and the practical application thereof in particular, giving hereby and committing to my said trustees the most full and unlimited power to manage and dispose of the said residue in whatever manner shall appear to them best suited to promote the ends in view." Certain well-known phrenologists were nominated trustees, to whom the testator gave powers to assume new trustees for the general management of the funds, and directions to assume as special trustees for the application of the residue "enlightened phrenologists," with powers to appoint like-minded successors ad perpetuum. Held that the son by his trust settlement effectually exercised the power given him by his father.

(1292)

A testatrix by her will, after providing for the payment of certain legacies, bequeathed the "residue" of her estate to her sisters in liferent and to her nieces in fee. The testatrix, in addition to her own estate, had a power of appointment over a portion of her father's estate liferented by her, the power being in the form of a direction in her father's will to his trustees "to pay over her portion to such person or persons, and if more than one, in such proportions as she shall by any writing under her hand direct or appoint." Held that the testatrix by the bequest of residue in her will had validly exercised the power of appointment conferred on her by her father's testament, notwithstanding that she thereby restricted the right of certain appointees to a liferent. Observations on the distinction between unrestricted powers of appointment and powers of apportionment among a prescribed class.

(1293)

Cumulative exercises of power.

A mother who had a power of disposal over a certain fund executed two deeds of appointment in favour of her son, the first of which expressly gave him one-seventh of the fund, and the second a share equal to what would have fallen to him if no appointment had been made, which practically amounted to one-seventh of the fund. Both deeds were declared to be irrevocable and were duly delivered. Held that the appointments were cumulative and not substitutional.

Crosbie's Trustees v Wylie, (O.H.) 1902, 10 S.L.T. 395.

3. POWER OF APPOINTMENT (APPORTIONMENT).

(1) CONSTRUCTION OF POWER.

(1294)

Power of selection.

A testatrix directed a share of residue to be paid to a certain person who predeceased her "to be divided among those of his children whom he may think most needful." It was maintained that this was not a power of apportionment but of selection, the non-exercise of which made the bequest void from uncertainty. Held that in virtue of the Powers Act, 1874, there was now no real distinction between a power of apportionment and a power of selection, and that the intention being to benefit the children, the bequest fell to be divided equally among them.

Weir v Young, (O.H.) 1897, 5 S.L.T. 233.

(1295)

Reserved powers—Powers applicable to a universitas.

The effect to be given to a power of apportionment is the same whether the person who is to exercise the power be the original owner of the fund, or be merely the donee of the power. It is also immaterial whether the power be applicable to a universitas or to a specified sum.

(1296)

Whether power covered heritage.

By antenuptial contract of marriage the intended husband, inter alia, gave his intended wife "full power and liberty, by mortis causa deed, to test upon and divide and apportion among my lawful children . . . my whole means and estate . . . and to that end I hereby appoint the said" wife "to be my executrix, with power to give up inventories, and all other powers competent to an executrix; and I hereby leave and bequeath my whole means and estate to her as executrix foresaid." The husband predeceased his wife intestate, and leaving heritage as well as moveable estate. It having been held that the terms of the deed were ineffectual to carry the heritage to the widow to the effect of entitling her to make up a title as trustee thereto, question, whether the power of apportionment covered heritage.

Campbell v Campbell, 1887, 15 R. 103; 25 S.L.R. 97.

(1297)

Power limited to equal division among objects.

In a marriage contract it was provided that after the death of the spouses the capital of the trust funds should belong to the child or children of the marriage, and be payable at such terms as the spouses or the survivor should appoint. Held that there was no power to appoint the capital otherwise than equally among the children.

Wylie's Trustees v Wylie, (O.H.) 1902, 10 S.L.T. 397.

(1298)

Event in which power exercisable—Vesting of share to be apportioned.

A testator provided by the sixth purpose of his settlement that "the shares of my estate shall vest in beneficiaries . . . at and only upon the arrival of the terms at which their shares . . . become payable." He bequeathed a share of his estate to a beneficiary "in liferent alienably, with power of appointment and disposal of half the fee thereof at her death." By a codicil the testator provided that the provisions contained in the sixth purpose of his settlement should not be payable until three years after his death. The beneficiary exercised the power of appointment, but died before the expiry of the three years. Held that the power had been validly exercised, the right to exercise it not being contingent on the donee of the power surviving the date of payment.

Smellie's Trustees v Glasgow Royal Infirmary, (O.H.) 1905, 13 S.L.T. 450.

(1299)

Donee of power—Trustee—Whether power exercisable by assumed trustees.

The sole trustee under a settlement was directed to retain one-third of the residue of the estate and apply it for behoof of a family of children "and that at such time or times and in such way and manner as my said trustee, in whose judgment and discretion I have perfect confidence, may think most conducive to the welfare of the said children, with full power to her to divide and apportion the said provision among the said children, or to apply the same for their behoof in such shares and proportions as she may think proper." The deed contained no power to assume new trustees. Held that the power of apportionment was personal to the original trustee and could not be exercised by assumed trustees.

Hill's Trustees v Thomson, 1874, 2 R. 68; 12 S.L.R. 20.

Power given to two out of four trustees—Death of one of the donees of the power—Validity of exercise by the survivor.

A testator, who had conveyed his estate by his settlement to four trustees, by a codicil conferred power on two of these trustees, his sister and his law agent, to allocate part of the residue of his estate among charitable objects. On the sister's death, there being no allocation of this fund, the law agent by himself executed a deed of allocation. Held, on a construction of the terms of the testator's testamentary deeds, that the two nominees had been selected delectu personarum from the body of the trustees for the purpose of allocating the fund; that the power of allocation could be exercised only by these nominees jointly and did not pass to the survivor; and accordingly that, the deed of allocation by the survivor being invalid, the fund had fallen into intestacy.

Objects of power—Children of daughter or any of them—Children born after testator's death.

A testator directed his trustees to hold and apply or pay a share of residue and the income thereof to or for behoof of one of his daughters and her children, or any of them, in such portions and at such times as his trustees might think most for the advantage of them or any of them. The daughter had two children at the date of the testator's death. Thereafter two other children were born to her before any apportionment of the share in question had been made. Held that the children born after the date of the testator's death were included among the objects of the power.

(1302)

———Power to apportion among children—Failing apportionment fund to be divided amongst survivors and issue of predeceasers.

By antenuptial marriage contract A bound himself to pay to "the child or children" of the marriage the sum of £8000 payable at the first term after the death of the survivor of A and his wife. The sum, in the event of there being more children than one, was to be "divisible in such proportions as" A shall appoint, "and failing appointment was" to be divided equally amongst the survivors and the issue of such as may have predeceased leaving issue." Held that the sole objects of the power were the children of the marriage in life at the death of the surviving spouse and the issue of predeceasers.

———Power to apportion among children—Failing apportionment, gift on death of liferenter, to children and issue of predeceasers.

A wife, by antenuptial contract, conveyed her whole estate to trustees for payment of the annual proceeds to the spouses and the survivor. "After the death of the longest liver" the trustees were directed to pay over the trust estate to the children of the marriage in such shares as might be appointed by the spouses or the survivor by writing under their hand, and failing such writing the trustees were to pay the trust estate "to the said children equally and to the issue of such child or children as may have predeceased." Held that the persons entitled to the fee of the trust estate, failing exercise of the power of appointment, were the children of the marriage alive at the death of the surviving spouse and the issue of predeceasers, and that these persons were the sole objects of the power.

Cuming's Trustee v Cuming, 1896, 24 R. 153; 34 S.L.R. 77; 4 S.L.T. 146.

(2) INTENTION TO EXERCISE POWER.

(1304)

Observations on the distinction between unrestricted powers of disposal and powers of apportionment among a prescribed class.

Exercise by general settlement.

By antenuptial contract a person bound himself to pay £2000 to the children of the marriage in lieu of legitim, &c., at the first term after his death, and after their majority or marriage, reserving power to apportion the sum among the children if more than one. He never expressly exercised the power of apportionment, but by his will he directed his executors, after payment of debts, to pay to his children, on attaining majority respectively, his whole remaining estate in equal shares. Held (by Lord Barcaple, Ordinary) that the father's general settlement was an implied exercise of the power to apportion.

———Bequest of residue—Expressio unius exclusio alterius.

By antenuptial contract of marriage, dated July, 1851, the husband, upon his part, bound himself to pay a sum of £4000 on the death of the longer liver of himself and his wife to the children of the marriage equally, and to pay to the trustees £3000 within ten years from the date of the marriage contract. The wife's father bound himself within ten years to pay £3000 to the marriage contract trustees, the two sums of £3000 so provided to be held in liferent for the spouses, and on the death of the survivor to be paid to the children of the marriage. In regard to the sum of £4000, and to the two sums of £3000, a power of appointment was given to the spouses jointly. By a mutual trust disposition and settlement, dated December, 1887, the husband and wife conveyed to trustees "all and sundry lands, sums of money, and in general the whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, of what kind or nature soever . . . presently belonging to us, or that shall belong and be addebted to us at the time of our deaths," in trust for the children of the marriage. The deed then narrated the part of the marriage contract which dealt with the two provisions of £3000, and also the terms of the will of the wife's father, whereby a sum of £1518 18s. 11d. was directed to be held by the marriage contract trustees for the purposes of the marriage contract, and proceeded—"And whereas the several sums above specified have been paid over to the said marriage contract trustees, and that the fund under their charge amounts in cumulo to £7518 18s. 11d., and now seeing that we have resolved to exercise the power of appointment and direction conferred upon us by the said contract of marriage, therefore we do hereby appoint" a sum of £10 to each of the sons of the marriage, and the remainder to the daughters equally. Held (1) that the parties intended the first part of the mutual deed to operate as a general disposition, and the second as a deed of appointment; (2) that the second part of the deed showed that the parties intended to exclude the £4000 from appointment; and (3) that accordingly the general disposition in the first part of the deed was not intended to operate as an appointment to the £4000.

———Title taken by parents to themselves, whom failing to trustees to be nominated, in trust for themselves in liferent and children nominatim in fee — Powers to parents to appoint—Mutual settlement.

A husband and wife purchased certain heritable subjects, and took the destination to themselves and the survivor, whom failing, to such trustees as they might appoint, in trust, for behoof of themselves in liferent, and their son and daughter, the only children of the marriage, equally between them, in fee, and the shares of both were declared to be subject "to such further limitations and restrictions, and to such apportionment" as the spouses should impose or make. The spouses afterwards executed a mutual settlement, whereby they conveyed to trustees in general terms all their means and estate, heritable and moveable, but no express mention was made of the subjects held under the above destination. Held that they had not intended to exercise the power of apportionment.

———Power to husband to apportion wife's estate settled by antenuptial contract — Exercise by will disposing of husband's estate.

By antenuptial marriage contract the wife conveyed to herself in liferent, and failing her to her husband in liferent, exclusive of the jus mariti, and in either case to the children of the marriage in fee, certain bank shares, subject to a power in the husband, and failing his exercising it, in the wife, to divide the provisions made for them among the children. There were three daughters and one son. By his settlement the husband conveyed his whole estate to trustees to pay certain special legacies to the daughters, and to hold "the whole residue and remainder of my estate, heritable and moveable, for behoof of my son," declaring that he had made this division in virtue of the powers in the marriage contract. The husband predeceased the wife, who thereafter executed a transfer of the bank shares to herself in liferent allenarly, and the children equally among them in fee. Held that as the bank stock never belonged to the husband, his settlement was not an exercise of the power conferred by the marriage contract.

———Conveyance of property over which testator had power of appointment.

By a deed of settlement by way of indenture between A, a married woman, and trustees, it was agreed that the trustees should hold the funds for A's issue in such shares and in such manner as she should appoint. By her will A bequeathed to other trustees the whole residue of her estate "including all property over which I have power of appointment" upon trust to hold for her two children (a son and a daughter) or such one of them as should attain 24 or die under that age leaving lawful issue, the daughter's share to be retained and the income paid to her during life, and the capital to be held for her issue "whether children or remoter descendants" in such manner as she should appoint, with power to her to appoint to her husband if he survived her a moiety of the income during his life. Held that A had, by her will, exercised the power of appointment reserved by the settlement.

———Conveyance of all property over which testator had power of disposal.

A marriage contract provided that certain funds should be held for the children in fee in such proportions and under such restrictions as (in the event which occurred) the wife might appoint. The wife died leaving a trust disposition and settlement whereby she conveyed to trustees her whole estate, "including therein all means and estate over which I have power of disposal by will or otherwise." She directed the trustees to make over the residue of the estate to her children under certain restrictions. There was no property, other than the marriage contract funds, over which the testatrix could exercise any power of appointment. Held that the testatrix, by her trust disposition and settlement, intended to exercise, and had exercised, the power of appointment over these funds. Opinions reserved as to whether a power to appoint to a limited class can be held to have been exercised by a general settlement which makes no reference to the power.

———Power to apportion profits accruing subsequent to testator's death.

A law agent in his trust disposition and settlement directed that the whole "income and profits" of his estate should be paid to his widow during her lifetime "for her own use and for the maintenance and upbringing of our children and for their education," and that after her death the whole estate should be divided equally among the children. Under a contract of copartnery, which, though the fixed period of existence had expired, was still being acted upon at the date of the trustor's death, his trustees were entitled to receive a share of the net profits of the business for ten years after his death, to be applied for behoof of his wife and children in such way and in such proportions as he might direct. The trustor's trust settlement was executed later in date than the contract of copartnery, but made no express reference to its provisions. Held that the trust settlement operated as a valid appointment to the share of the profits paid under the contract of copartnery.

———Vesting clause inconsistent with power.

By antenuptial contract a husband bound himself to pay the children of the marriage a provision, he having power to apportion the same, and, failing apportionment, equally, the period of payment being the first term after his death. By a subsequent trust disposition and settlement he provided, inter alia, that certain portions of his estate should be held for his children, subject to a liferent in favour of his widow and vesting on payment. Held that the settlement was not intended to operate and did not operate as an exercise of the powers of appointment.

(1316)

Express partial exercise—Donee of power becoming party to deed granted by object of power.

A lady who had a power of apportionment of a fund provided by her husband in their marriage contract in liferent to herself and in fee to the children of the marriage, became party to a bond and assignation in security, whereby one of the sons, in security of a loan, assigned his interest under the marriage contract to the lender, and his mother, in farther security, apportioned to her son one-fifth of the fund and declared the apportionment to be irrevocable. She died leaving no other deed expressly bearing to be an exercise of the power. By her trust disposition and settlement she left a legacy of £100 to one of her daughters, and appointed the residue of her estate to be divided equally among her children other than this daughter, declaring that these provisions should be in full satisfaction "of all claims competent to them on my decease, whether legally or under my marriage contract, or in any other manner of way." Held that the bond and assignation in security contained a valid exercise of the power of apportionment to the extent of one-fifth of the fund; that the trust disposition and settlement dealt with the lady's own estate only, and not with the fund subject to the power, which consequently was as regarded four-fifths unapportioned.

By her will A bequeathed to other trustees the whole residue of her estate "including all property over which I have power of disposal" in trust for her issue. Held that the exercise of the power by the will was not invalidated by the fact that it took the form of a conveyance to other trustees who held other funds.

A lady in her antenuptial marriage contract conveyed to trustees certain heritable and moveable estate, to be held for behoof of herself in liferent, and of her children in fee, in such proportions and on such terms and conditions as she might appoint by writing under her hand. She died, leaving a trust disposition and settlement, in which she stated her intention to exercise this power of appointment, and desired the trustees under the marriage contract to transfer the property vested in them to the trustees under the trust disposition and settlement, "it being my desire and intention that the property conveyed by the said contract of marriage, and now vested in the trustees under the same, and whether so transferred or not, shall be dealt with and divided as part of my general estate." Held that it was no objection to the exercise of the power that it was in this form.

Signed holograph marginal note on deed by which power reserved.

A purchaser of heritage took a disposition in favour of himself and his wife in conjunct fee and liferent, and after their death to his daughters in liferent, and their children in fee, full power being reserved to him to burden or dispose of the subjects gratuitously as full fiar. The deed was found in his repositories after his death, with a holograph note signed by him upon the margin as follows:—"If any of my daughters die and leave children, they fall in to the mother's share of the rents while any of their aunts live." Held that this direction was a valid exercise of the reserved power to qualify the conveyance.

(1322)

Appointment by contractual deed invalid—Right of donee of power to make new appointment.

A wife who had power to apportion a fund among her children purported to exercise it by a mutual settlement, executed by herself and her husband. The exercise of the power was contractual as between the spouses, but it was held to be invalid by the Court. Held that the wife was free to make a new appointment of the fund, and an apportionment contained in a codicil executed by her subsequent to her husband's death sustained.

(1323)

Irrevocable appointment — Appointment invalid in event which happened—Validity of new appointment.

When an appointment is made to persons in succession which is partly intra vires and partly ultra vires the validity of the appointment is to be determined by the event. By an antenuptial contract of marriage the spouses or the survivor had power to apportion a fund among their children. The surviving husband made a deed of appointment, which bore to be irrevocable, directing that the greater part of the estate should belong to his eldest son, whom failing, to the heir of his body who might be entitled to succeed to an estate belonging to the husband at the date of the husband's death. The eldest son predeceased the father, leaving issue. The father thereupon made another deed of appointment. Held that, as the son's issue were not objects of the power, the first deed, in the event which happened, contained no valid scheme of division, and that the estate fell to be divided in terms of the second deed.

The deed was delivered and infetment followed on it. Held that this was a valid partial appointment in favour of the second son and was irrevocable.

(1327)

Uncertainty—Three different powers over different funds—Will not expressly exercising powers.

A testatrix by a will (partly printed and partly holograph), in which she appointed executors, made pecuniary bequests to all her children, and divided the residue equally among them. The testatrix, in addition to her own estate, which was of small extent, had powers of apportionment over three funds, amounting to a considerable sum, coming from different sources, and held by different trustees for behoof of her in liferent and of her children in fee, the power in each case being "to divide and apportion the income and capital" among her children, "subject to such conditions, and payable at such times" as she might appoint. The will made no reference to these powers, but the amount of the pecuniary bequests to the children was practically the same as the total amount of the three funds which were the subject of the powers. Held that the will was bad as an exercise of the powers, in respect that, while the bequests to the children could not be met out of the testatrix's own estate or out of any one of the funds in the hands of the various trustees, the will did not discriminate between these, or indicate from what source the bequests were to be paid.

(1328)

Power to grant alimentary liferent.

A testator, by his trust settlement, provided that his son should be entitled to grant to his surviving widow "so long as she remains unmarried an alimentary liferent provision not exceeding one-half of the free annual proceeds of the share of my estate liferented by him." The son, by a will in English form, "in exercise of all powers and authorities enabling me in this behalf," granted to his wife "so long as she shall remain my widow the one-half of the annual proceeds of the share of my interest under the said will of my said father." Held that the son had validly exercised the power conferred on him by his father's will in respect that, although he did not repeat the restrictive word "alimentary," the context made it clear that he did not seek to give to his widow anything more than an alimentary liferent provision.

Cook v Cook's Trustees, (O.H.) 1911, 2 S.L.T. 64.

Provision of liferent to widow, with power to accelerate payment of legacies—Jus relictae claimed and liferent surrendered — Right to exercise power of accelerating.

A testator in his settlement directed his trustees to pay to his widow the income of the residue of his estate in full of her legal rights but with power to her "to consent to payment of all or one or more of the legacies" thereafter bequeathed, " . . . so as to admit of payment thereof during her life." He then directed the payment of a number of legacies "upon the death of my said wife, or should she surrender her liferent over any part thereof so as to admit of payment, then for payment of such part on such surrender." Some of the legacies were unconditional, others were bequeathed subject to a clause of survivorship and conditions in favour of the issue of the legatees. After the husband's death the widow claimed her legal rights, and thereafter executed a formal deed in which she confirmed this election and surrendered her whole rights under the settlement, and consented, so far as she competently could in exercise of the power conferred upon her in the settlement, to the immediate payment of the whole of the legacies. Held that the widow, having surrendered the whole of the provisions of the settlement in her favour, was debarred from exercising the power of consent. Held also that the unconditional legacies having vested indefeasibly at the testator's death were, owing to the surrender of the liferent immediately payable, provided the trustees had sufficient funds to pay the legacies, but that the vesting of the contingent legacies was not accelerated, and that they were not payable until the widow's death.

(1330)

Power exercised under misapprehension—Prior partial exercise.

The lands of N were held in trust for a father in liferent allanarly and for his children in fee, in such proportions as he might appoint, which failing, equally among them. The father in exercise of the power, disposed one-third pro indiviso part of the lands of N to his second son. This deed was delivered, and infettment followed on it. Ten years afterwards the father executed a settlement directing the trustee on his death to sell the whole estate of N and divide the proceeds among his children in certain proportions, viz., to his eldest son £3000, and to each of his other children an equal share of the residue. Held that the first deed was a valid exercise of the reserved power of apportionment, and irrevocable, and that the second deed, having been granted under error as to his legal powers, was inept.

Murray's Trustee v Murray, 1872, 10 M. 778; 44 J. 545; 9 S.L.R. 497.

(b) Fraud on Power.

(1331)

Option given between small sum and larger benefit not in accordance with power.

By an antenuptial contract of marriage the trustees were directed, on the death of the survivor of the spouses survived by issue of the marriage, to hold and pay over the estate conveyed by the wife to or for behoof of the children of the marriage "in such proportions and subject to such conditions" as the wife, whom failing, the husband, might direct, and failing such direction, equally. After the death of the wife the husband executed a deed of apportionment by which, in professed exercise of the power, he directed the trustees to pay to each of his daughters £500, and the whole residue to his son, but declared that the daughters should have the option of either accepting the £500 or of claiming the liferent of certain larger sums specified. Held that the power of apportionment had not been to any extent validly exercised, in respect that the professed apportionment was not a bona fide or legitimate exercise of the power, the first alternative, which would by itself have been valid, having been inserted merely for the purpose of concussing acceptance of an invalid exercise of the power.

(1332)

Bargain to accept liferent, the fee going outside power.

Held that an averment that a deed of appointment had been executed by a father as the outcome of an agreement between him and his daughters, who were objects of the power, whereby the daughters agreed to restrict their rights in the shares appointed to them to a liferent, and to make provision for the capital being secured at their death for the endowment of an institution which the father desired to found, was relevant to support a reduction of the deed of appointment at the instance of a son who was also an object of the power.

(1333)

Reduction of deed granted as consideration for ultra vires exercise of power of appointment—Title to sue.

A son brought a declarator that his father had not validly exercised a power of appointment conferred upon him by his antenuptial marriage contract on the ground that, with a view to securing the endowment of a charitable institution, he had made an agreement with his three daughters, who were also objects of the power, to appoint certain shares of the fund to them, provided they restricted their interest in their shares to a liferent and secured the capital for the endowment of the institution. The pursuer concluded for reduction of the deed of appointment and also for reduction of the deed granted by the sisters in fulfilment of the agreement. Held that the pursuer had no title to reduce the deed granted by the sisters, but observed that he would be entitled to production of it in modum probationis in support of his plea of illegal bargain.

Craig v Craig's Trustees, (O.H.) 1904, 12 S.L.T. 136.

(1334)

Purchase by donee of power of interest of object.

Held (1) that the Powers of Appointment Act, 1874, which by its first section enacts that no exercise of a power of appointment should be invalid on the ground that any object of the power is altogether excluded, applies to Scotland; and (2) that where a right was vested in children subject to a power of apportionment, an apportionment was not invalid which excluded the representatives of one of them, who had died, from a share in it.

Exclusion of representatives of deceased object of power.

In a marriage contract, dated in 1812, a fund was provided by the lady's father to the spouses in liferent and to their children in fee, with a power of apportionment to the spouses jointly or the survivor. The husband died without exercising the power, survived by six children, of whom one son died unmarried and intestate. After the son's death his mother executed a deed apportioning the fund among her surviving children. She died in 1873. Held that the exercise of the power was invalid in respect of the omission to apportion any part to the deceased son's representatives, notwithstanding the fact that his surviving brothers and sisters were his representatives.

In a deed of settlement by way of indenture between A, a married woman, and trustees, it was, inter alia, agreed that the trustees should hold the trust funds in trust for A's issue, at such ages or times not earlier than twenty-one or marriage, in such shares, and in such manner, as she should appoint. In a hotchpot clause reference was made to any "child who or any of whose issue shall take under such appointment." By her will A bequeathed to other trustees the whole residue of her estate, "including all property over which I have power of appointment," upon trust to hold for her two children (a son and daughter), or such one of them as should attain twenty-four, or die under that age leaving lawful issue, the daughter's share to be retained and the income paid to her during life, and the capital after her death to be held for her issue, "whether children or remoter descendants," in such manner as she should appoint, with power to her to appoint to her husband, if he survived her, not more than a moiety of the income during his life. Held (1) that the expression "issue" in the settlement included remoter descendants than children, and that consequently the daughter's issue were objects of the power; (2) that the testatrix had validly exercised the power by giving a life interest to her daughter with a power of appointment of the fee among her issue, and the fee to her daughter's issue as the daughter should appoint; (3) that the daughter's husband not being an object of the power, the will was not a valid exercise of the power in so far as it gave the daughter right to provide a life interest to her husband, but that this provision was to be held pro non scripto, and did not affect the validity of the exercise of the power otherwise.

A had also under her father's will a power to appoint among her issue "born or to be born during" her life, "or within twenty-one years after her death," with such future or other trusts for their benefit as she should appoint. Held that A had also validly exercised this power by her will except in so far as she gave right to her daughter to provide a life interest to her husband, and in particular, that the exercise of the power was not necessarily invalidated owing to A having given her daughter power to appoint to issue, whether children or remoter descendants, without any restriction to issue born within twenty-one years of A's death.

Appointment of liferent of part of the fund to one object of the power, and whole fee to the other object.

By a contract of marriage it was provided that the trustees should hold the capital of the trust funds "as a provision for behoof of the child or children" of the marriage, divisible "in such shares and proportions" as the spouses jointly or the survivor might appoint, and failing appointment, then equally. The husband died survived by his wife and by a son and a daughter. Held that a deed executed by the surviving wife, whereby she appointed a life interest only in part of the trust fund to her son, and the fee of the whole fund to her daughter or the daughter's heirs, was a valid exercise of the power.

(1343)

Annuity to object of power — Residue to others.

In an antenuptial marriage contract the husband conveyed the whole property then belonging to him, or which should belong to him at the time of his death, to himself and his intended wife in conjunct fee and life interest, for her life interest use alienably, and the children of the marriage in fee, declaring that it should be in his power to divide the fee in such proportions and under such conditions as he should appoint, and failing such apportionment, that the fee should be divided equally among the children. In his settlement the husband directed his trustees to pay three-fourth parts of the residue of his estate to three of his four children, and to hold the remaining fourth for his fourth child, who was insane. By a codicil he recalled the latter direction, and directed his trustees to purchase an annuity of £300 for his insane child. Held that there had been a valid apportionment, and that the residue, under deduction of the sum required to purchase the annuity for the fourth child, went to the remaining children.

Appointment to alimentary life interest with power of disposal — Power to appoint under "conditions, limitations, and restrictions."

By an antenuptial contract of marriage the trustees were directed, after the death of the surviving spouse, to hold the fee of the estate conveyed to them by the wife for behoof of the children of the marriage "in such proportions, and subject to such conditions, limitations, and restrictions, and with such terms of payment and vesting" as the wife should appoint by any deed under her hand. The husband having died leaving a son and daughter, the wife executed a deed of appointment by which she directed the trustees to retain three-fourths of the estate "for behoof of her daughter in life interest for her life interest alimentary use only," and on her daughter's death to apply the capital so life interest in such manner as her daughter might direct by any writing under her hand, whether inter vivos or mortis causa, and failing such appointment to pay and convey the same to her daughter's heirs in mobili-bus. Held (1) that the wife's deed of appointment was a valid exercise of the power, and (2) that the daughter's right under the deed of appointment was not a right of fee.

Appointment to liferent with power to test—Power to appoint under “conditions, provisions, and limitations.”

By antenuptial marriage contract the trustees were directed, after the death of the survivor of the spouses “to pay over” certain funds “to or for behoof of” the surviving child or children of the marriage, “in such shares or proportions, and subject to such conditions, provisions, and limitations” as the spouses or the survivor of them should appoint. By mutual trust disposition and settlement, in exercise of the reserved power of appointment, the spouses directed their testamentary trustees to hold these funds for behoof of their children in equal shares, and to pay to them the income, it being provided that the shares of the sons should be paid at majority, and that in the case of the daughters the share of each should be settled upon her at marriage for her sole and exclusive use, and held by trustees for her behoof, “with power to her to dispose of the fee of the same by any testamentary deed, and failing her disposing of the same by such deed, the same shall be paid, assigned, and conveyed to her heirs and executors.” In regard to the disposal of the fee of the shares of unmarried daughters the trustees were directed to pay or assign the same “according to the direction which each such daughter may leave by any testamentary deed,” and failing the execution of such deed “to her heirs and executors.” The daughters (none of whom were married) contended that their parents were not entitled to restrict their rights to a liferent with power to test. Held that the appointment was valid.

Certain sums of money were destined in fee to certain beneficiaries by (1) their grandmother's trust disposition and settlement, and (2) their mother's marriage contract. The deeds conferred upon the mother a power of appointment to the respective sums. The mother, in exercising the power, restricted the rights of the beneficiaries to a liferent with a power to test. Held that the restriction was ultra vires of the power of appointment.

Apportionment to object of power but as heir of entail.

By an antenuptial contract of marriage the wife's fortune was conveyed to trustees with directions on the death of the survivor of the spouses to “pay over or assign” the whole trust funds to the child or children of the marriage, “in such proportions and at such time and under such conditions as” the spouses should by joint deed appoint, and failing such apportionment, then in certain specified proportions. A portion of the wife's funds, amounting to £25,000, was advanced by the marriage contract trustees on heritable bond over two estates purchased by the husband for £28,000 during the subsistence of the marriage. The parents, in the exercise of their power of division, provided that the sum of £25,000 secured over the husband's estates should be “settled on and belong to our eldest son and other members of our family in succession, being heirs in possession of the entailed estate,” . . . “it being our desire and appointment that the said trustees under our marriage contract before narrated, or the survivors of them, should immediately on the death of the survivor of us discharge” the bond for £25,000. Held that this was a valid exercise by the parents of the power of appointment contained in the marriage contract in favour of the eldest son to the extent of £25,000 in fee, the addition of the words “and other members of our family in succession, being heirs in possession of the entailed estate,” importing no effectual limitation of his right and the direction to the trustees to discharge the bond for £25,000 over the entailed estate being one which could only be carried out with his consent.

(e) Appointment Subject to Unauthorised Conditions.

(1348)

Condition that object should repay on succeeding to landed estate.

By antenuptial marriage contract the trustees were directed after the death of the survivor of the spouses “to pay over” certain funds “to or for behoof of” the surviving child or children of the marriage, “in such shares or proportions, and subject to such conditions, provisions, and limitations” as the spouses or the survivor of them should appoint. By mutual trust disposition and settlement, in exercise of the reserved power of appointment, the spouses directed their trustees in making payment to their children of their respective shares of the funds in question to take them bound to repay the same “in the event of such son or daughter succeeding to the said estate of L.” The contingency had not occurred at the death of the survivor of the spouses. Held that the direction was ultra vires and ineffectual, but that its invalidity did not affect the appointment in other respects.

Wallace's Trustees v Wallace, 1891, 18 R. 921; 28 S.L.R. 709.

(1349)

Apportionment of share of fund to objects of power—Restriction to liferent with fee to issue.

By an antenuptial marriage contract, a fund was provided to the children of the marriage “in such proportions” as the spouses might “direct and appoint.” The settlement of the husband, which was also signed by the wife, contained this joint appointment—"We hereby apportion amongst our children equally, share and share alike, the fund falling to them under our marriage contract, the issue of any of them predeceasing taking their parent's share, the share of any such child or his or her issue being held, managed, and dealt with as hereafter provided for my children's shares of my estate." The father's settlement contained directions to the trustees in regard to the children's shares (including their shares of the marriage contract fund as well as their shares of his own estate), which in the case of sons might, and in the case of daughters would, have the effect of reducing their right in a share to a liferent, and in both cases without the right to dispose of it by will or otherwise. When the appointment took effect there were no issue of predeceasing children in existence. Held (1) that the appointment was not invalid in respect of the mention of the issue of predeceasing children, as issue were not included in the appointment in the event which happened; (2) that the appointment was valid as a division of the fund among the children, but that the restrictions imposed were invalid; (3) that the children were entitled (without being put to an election) to their share of the marriage contract fund free of the restrictions imposed, as well as to their share of their father's own estate bequeathed by his settlement.

Power to appoint "under conditions and restrictions."

Mrs. Warrand, by trust disposition and settlement, directed her trustees to convey the residue of her estate to the children of her brother Alexander Warrand, "in such proportions, at such times, on such conditions, and under such restrictions as he may direct by any writing under his hand executed after my death." After the death of Mrs. Warrand, Alexander executed a deed of appointment, whereby, on the narrative of the power of appointment in Mrs. Warrand's settlement, he appointed that "the said residue shall on my death belong to the said children (on the conditions and under the restrictions hereinafter written, so far as I may lawfully impose such conditions and restrictions) in the proportions" specified; and with regard to the shares of all but two of his children, he directed that the said shares shall belong to them in liferent only, and for their alimentary use allenerly, with fee to their issue and failing issue of any child the fee to be disposed of as such child should direct, and failing direction, to belong to the next of kin of such child. Held (1) that the deed of appointment, in so far as it appointed that the residue should belong to the appointer's children in the proportions specified, was a valid and effectual exercise of the power of appointment; (2) that the restriction of the children's right to a liferent, and the appointment of the fee to their issue, were ultra vires and ineffectual; and (3) that children whose shares were restricted to a liferent were entitled to payment of the fee of the shares respectively appointed to them.

(1351)

By an antenuptial marriage contract the trustees were directed to hold and apply the fee of the wife's funds for behoof of her children, "in such proportions, and with such restrictions, and on such terms, and payable at such periods" as she might appoint, and failing such appointment, equally. There were two children of the marriage, a son and a daughter. By her will and codicil the wife, in professed exercise of the power, appointed the whole fund to her son, declaring that it should be held by her trustees for his liferent alimentary use allenerly, and for behoof of his issue in fee as he should appoint, and that if he died without being survived by children or remoter issue, it should fall to her daughter or her issue, with power to the trustees to make advances to the son, and to the son to confer upon his widow a liferent of the fund, or part thereof. Held that the exercise of the power was valid in so far as it apportioned the fund to the son, but that the adjoined provisions and declarations were all invalid, and to be treated pro non scriptis.

Middleton's Trustees v Middleton, 1906, 8 F. 1037; 43 S.L.R. 718; 14 S.L.T. 187.

Under an antenuptial marriage contract the husband disposed his whole estate to the children of the marriage in fee, "under such burdens and conditions and payable at such periods and in such shares or proportions amongst the said children respectively," and the issue of children predeceasing him, as he might appoint, and failing appointment, to the children and such issue equally among them. By his trust disposition and settlement he directed his trustees to hold the residue of his estate for his children in equal shares, and to pay or apply the same as thereafter mentioned, the interest of daughters being restricted also as thereafter mentioned. In a subsequent portion of the deed it was provided that the daughters' shares should be held for their respective liferent uses allenerly and for their issue in fee, in such proportions and under such conditions as the daughters might appoint, and, in default of appointment, for such issue equally among them; and, failing issue, for such persons as the daughters might direct, and, in default of such direction, for the testator's then surviving children and the issue of predeceasing children. It was also declared that the daughters' shares should be alimentary and not assignable by them, and should be exclusive of the rights of any husbands they might marry. A daughter, who was aged sixty-seven and was unmarried, having claimed payment of an equal share of the residue free from the restrictions imposed in the trust disposition and settlement, held that these restrictions were ultra vires and ineffectual, and that the daughter was entitled to payment, as her absolute property, of an equal share of the residue.

(1353)

A testator left the residue of his estate to trustees, with a declaration that upon the death of his son, or on the death of his son's wife if she survived him, the residue of the trust funds should belong and be paid to the son's children "at such periods, and in such proportions, and under such limitations, conditions, and restrictions," as his son should direct by any deed under his hand. The son, in a deed of appointment, after making provisions for his sons, directed his trustees to hold the remainder of the fund "upon trust, to pay the interest thereof" to his two daughters for their own separate use, notwithstanding coverture, and so that the daughters should not have power to dispose thereof by way of anticipation, and upon the death of each daughter to hold her share for her children in such shares as she should have appointed, and, failing children, for such persons as she should have appointed. Held that the appointment was valid, and had vested in the daughters the capital of their shares, but that these were limited to their separate use for life, independent of any present or future husband, and were to be held by them subject to the power of appointment conferred on them by their father's settlement, but without power to make any other assignment or appointment by way of alienation.

(1354)

By antenuptial marriage contract trustees were directed after the death of the survivor of the spouses "to pay over or assign" certain funds to the child or children of the marriage "in such proportions and at such times and under such conditions" as the survivor of the spouses should appoint. The spouses were survived by three children of the marriage. The surviving spouse, professing to exercise the power of appointment, directed his trustees to "lay out and invest the third part or share falling to his daughter F" in their own names, and to pay over the annual proceeds to F during her life, and "in the event of her being married, and her husband surviving her," to pay the annual proceeds to him, and upon the death of the longest liver of F and her husband, then to hold the funds for behoof of F's children. Failing children of F, the trustees were directed at the death of the survivor of F and her husband to pay the funds "to such persons and in such manner" as F should direct. In a question between the trustees and F (who was seventy-five years of age and unmarried), held (1) that the appointment was not invalid because it restricted F's right to a life-rent, with a power to test; and (2) that although the provisions in favour of F's husband and children were ultra vires and ineffectual, their invalidity did not affect the gift of the power of disposal in the event of F having no children.

Marriage contract provision—Power to apportion exercised by will—Date of payment of provision altered.

By antenuptial contract a person bound himself to pay £2000 to the children of the marriage at the first term after his death, and after their majority or marriage, reserving power to apportion the sum among the children if more than one. He did not expressly exercise the power, but by his will he directed his executors, after payment of debts, to pay his whole remaining estate to his children in equal shares on their respectively attaining majority. Held that the father's general settlement was an implied exercise of the power which was not rendered invalid by the alteration in the date of payment.

(f) Appointment to Parties not Objects of Power.

(1356)

Liferent to object of power with fee to persons not objects of power.

By an antenuptial contract of marriage the trustees were directed, on the death of the survivor of the spouses survived by issue of the marriage, to hold and pay over the estate conveyed to them by the wife to or for behoof of the children of the marriage "in such proportions and subject to such conditions" as the wife, whom failing, the husband, might direct, and failing such direction equally. By her will the wife, inter alia, directed her trustees to hold "for my daughter A the sum of £20,000," and pay her certain sums per annum till she was twenty-five, and thereafter the whole income, and upon her death to divide the capital among A's children equally. Failing children at A's decease the money was to revert to the general estate of the testatrix. Held that this was not to any extent a valid exercise of the power of apportionment, there being no initial gift of the £20,000 to the daughter, which could be separated from the limitation of her right to a life-rent, with the fee to her children, who were not objects of the power.

only, and her "children per stirpes in fee, payable . . . in such proportions and subject to such conditions and restrictions" as his daughter might appoint. By her appointment the daughter, who was survived by three sons, directed that, as regarded half of the funds in question, each son should have the liferent only of one-third, and his children the fee. Held that the appointment was invalid, as the sons' children were not objects of the power.

(1358)

A husband, by his antenuptial contract of marriage, bound himself to provide and secure his whole estate to the children of the marriage in fee, declaring that it should be in his power if there were more than one child to divide the estate among them as he should think proper, and, failing such division, that the estate should be divided equally. He had several children, one of whom, a son, predeceased him, leaving a widow and children. He bequeathed by his settlement a share of his estate to this son's widow in liferent, and in part to the son's son in fee on his attaining a certain age, and the remainder to the son's daughters in liferent, and the heirs of their bodies in fee. The remainder of the residue of his estate he bequeathed to his two daughters, who survived him, in liferent allenerly and to their children in fee. He also bequeathed a legacy to his grandson. Held that the testator's children took under the marriage contract a protected succession which he could not defeat by any gratuitous deed, that his power was limited to apportioning his estate among them, and therefore that the settlement was invalid as an exercise of the power, because it conferred a benefit on persons who were not objects of the power, and gave liferents only to two of the children who were objects of it.

Annuity only apportioned to object of power.

Parents purchased heritage and took the title to themselves and the survivor, whom failing, to such trustees as they might appoint, in trust, for behoof of themselves in liferent, and their only son and daughter, equally, in fee, but subject "to such further limitations and restrictions, and to such apportionment" as the parents should impose or make. The parents afterwards executed a mutual settlement, whereby they conveyed their whole means and estate to trustees. Under this deed the daughter's share of her parent's estate was restricted to a small annuity and certain interests were given to the grandchildren of the spouses. Held that this mutual settlement was not in execution of the power of appointment reserved.

(1362)

Liferent to objects of power—Fee to certain objects of power or their heirs—Heirs not necessarily objects of power.

A testator left the sum of £2000 to his daughter in liferent, and directed that on her death it should be paid to any one or more of his descendants in such shares or proportions as his daughter should direct, and failing such direction to his descendants equally among them per stirpes. His daughter died, leaving a trust disposition and settlement by which she appointed a liferent of this sum to her niece (a descendant of the testator), and directed that on the expiry of that liferent the capital should be divided among certain persons (all descendants of the testator) and their heirs in mobilibus. Held that the appointment was bad for two reasons—(1) in respect that the introduction of heirs in mobilibus introduced persons who might not be descendants of the testator and so not objects of the power; (2) in respect that the introduction of the liferent postponed the division of the capital and the ascertainment of beneficiaries to a future date, contrary to the intention of the testator that this should take place on the death of the liferentrix. Held further, that as there was no valid appointment of capital to any one the sum fell to be divided among the testator's descendants as at the daughter's death.

Appointment to liferent with power to test—Power to object to confer fee on non-object.

A, by his marriage contract, assigned £18,000 to trustees, to hold the capital for the children of the marriage in fee, in such shares and subject to such conditions and restrictions as he should appoint, with power to him to restrict the share of any of the children to a liferent and settle the fee on their offspring. By the 13th purpose of his trust disposition and settlement A directed the trustees therein named to hold the residue of his estate for his children in liferent only, and for his grandchildren per stirpes in fee, "in such proportions and . . . subject to such restrictions, limitations, and conditions" as the children might appoint; and provided that if any child died without issue, the share liferented by him should go to the surviving children and the issue of children who had predeceased. He further declared that the £18,000 was to be treated as falling under this purpose, and that the provisions in the settlement were granted "upon the special condition and provision" that they should be in satisfaction to the children of legitim, and every other claim competent to them against his estate, and "in full and in lieu and place of all provisions" conceived in their favour in the marriage contract. One of A's children, B, having died without issue, a question arose as to the validity and effect of this appointment of the marriage contract funds. Held (1) that the exercise of the power was bad, in respect that while the marriage contract permitted a child's interest to be reduced to a liferent only for the purpose of giving the fee to his issue, A's settlement went beyond this and empowered the child to restrict to a liferent the interest of his issue and to confer a fee on his grandchildren; and (2) that B could not set aside the disposition in A's settlement quoad the marriage contract funds, and at the same time take benefit under that disposition quoad the remainder of A's estate, but was put to his election.

Power to apportion among surviving children—Apportionment to children then surviving and nascituri.

A testator left heritable property to a father in liferent and his issue in fee with a destination over in the event of the father dying without issue. The trust disposition and settlement also conferred on the father a power of apportionment among such issue as survived him. During his life he executed a deed of apportionment which he declared to be irrevocable and by which he divided the property between his then surviving children and his children nascituri. Held that the attempted exercise of the power was invalid even quoad those children who survived the father, in respect that it was attempted to include persons who were not objects of the power and to create an immediate fee contrary to the terms of the trust disposition and settlement.

Gift to objects of power—Conditional institution of non-objects.

Under an antenuptial marriage contract one-half of the trust funds were payable on the death of the wife to the children of the husband's former marriage. Power was reserved to the spouses to apportion the fund among the children, and vesting was suspended until the wife's death. By deed of apportionment the spouses apportioned the sum of £10 to I, one of the children, and the balance of the half of the trust funds to the other children, "the children of any child predeceasing before the period of payment taking . . . the share which the parent would have taken had he or she survived." There were three children of the former marriage I, J, and R, of whom R predeceased the date of payment without taking a vested right. Held that the deed of apportionment was effectual in so far as it apportioned £10 to I and one-half of the balance to J.

(g) Separability of Invalid Appointments.

(1366)

Per Lord Cairns (Lord Chancellor)—"The plain rule is to be derived" from the authorities "that if you cannot disconnect that which is imposed by way of condition or mode of enjoyment from a gift, the gift itself may be found to be involved in conditions so much beyond the power that it becomes void. But where that is not so, where you have a gift to an object of the power and where you have nothing alleged to invalidate that gift but conditions which are attempted to be imposed as to the mode in which that object of the power is to enjoy what is given to him, then the gift may be valid and take effect without reference to those conditions."

Power exercised in part in favour of persons not objects.

By the terms of an antenuptial contract of marriage the husband had power to apportion a fund among the issue of the marriage, which the Court interpreted to mean the immediate children. By his trust disposition and settlement he exercised the power in favour of children, and the children of a predeceasing child. Held that the invalid exercise of the power in favour of grandchildren was to be held pro non scripto, and did not invalidate the exercise of the power quoad children.

(1369)

A father who had power by his antenuptial contract to apportion a fund of £60,000 among his children settled a sum of £5000 on his eldest daughter by her antenuptial marriage contract which contained a discharge of all the daughter's claims under her parent's marriage contract. Thereafter the father settled a sum of £5000 on his second daughter by her antenuptial contract which contained a similar discharge. Subsequently, on entering into a second marriage, the father settled a sum of £20,000 on his youngest daughter, taking from her a discharge in similar terms, and he settled the balance of the fund on his second wife in life and the issue of his second marriage in fee and on the failure of issue on his youngest daughter in fee. Held that there had been a valid appointment of £5000 to each of the two elder daughters, and of £20,000 to the youngest daughter, but that the balance of the fund had been invalidly appointed and fell to be divided equally among the three daughters as in default of appointment.

Smith Cuninghame v Anstruther's Trustees; Mercer v Anstruther's Trustees, 1872, 10 M. (H.L.) 39; L.R., 2 H.L. Sc. 223; 44 J. 407; 9 S.L.R. 431.

Invalid provisions rendered inseparable—Clause of forfeiture in the event of deed of appointment being impugned.

A deed of appointment contained both valid and invalid provisions concluded with a forfeiture clause, which declared that any of the appointees who impugned the appointment "in any manner of way" should forfeit all interest, "to the same effect" as if they had been expressly excluded from any share in the appointed fund. Held that the effect of the forfeiture clause was to bind the conditions of the deed so closely together that (apart from other considerations) it was impossible to separate the valid provisions from those which were ultra vires, and that accordingly the deed was wholly invalid, and that the fund fell to be divided as if there had been no deed.

Collins's Trustees v Collins, 1913 S.C. 588; 50 S.L.R. 421; 1913, 1 S.L.T. 185.

(h) Consent of Beneficiaries to Invalid Appointment.

[See also XXI., infra.]

(1371)

Appointment to persons not objects of the power—Consent of object of the power—Necessity for written consent.

A lady, who reserved a power of appointment over the estate conveyed by her in her marriage contract, the objects of the power being her children, exercised it by leaving a legacy and an annuity to her son, and the rest of the estate to her daughter in life, and to her daughter's three children and the son of her son equally in fee. There was no written consent by the daughter to the exercise of the power in favour of the grandchildren of the appointer, but she did not dispute its validity. Held, in an action of reduction at the instance of the son, that as regarded the three-fourths appointed to the daughter's three children the appointment was valid, as having been made with the consent, though not expressed in writing, of their mother, the proper object of the power, but (per Lord Fraser, Ordinary, and acquiesced in) that as regarded the fourth appointed to the pursuer's son, the appointment was bad, as having been made without the pursuer's consent, and that the fourth fell to be divided as unappointed estate between the son and daughter equally, in terms of the provision of the marriage contract for that event.

(1372)

A father made provision in his marriage contract for payment after his death of certain sums to the capital value of £3000 to the children of his marriage, reserving to himself power to apportion these sums among his children. He died, survived by sons and daughters. In his will he professed to exercise the reserved power by bequeathing a legacy of £25 to each of his sons, and by directing his trustees to hold a sum of £7000 of the residue of his estate for his daughters in life and for their issue in fee. In a special case in which the daughters, as parties, consented to and upheld the validity of this appointment, held that the appointment, although made to persons who were not objects of the power, had been wholly validated by this consent.

Macleod's Trustees v Macleod's Trustees, 1914 S.C. 10; 51 S.L.R. 35; 1913, 2 S.L.T. 290.

—Subsequent consent of object of the power.

A lady who had power to apportion a fund among her children purported to exercise the power by a mutual settlement, executed by her and her husband, whereby she appointed one-half of the fund to her son A in fee, and the other half to her son B in life and to his issue in fee, B being mentally infirm and having no issue. Held (1) that the appointment in the mutual settlement was invalid in respect that strangers to the power, viz., B's possible children, were introduced; (2) that the assent of B's curator to this appointment, given after the death of the donee of the power—assuming that it was within his power as curator to assent to it—did not cure the invalidity of the appointment.

MacGillivray's Trustees v Watson's Trustees, 1911 S.C. 1103; 48 S.L.R. 887; 1911, 2 S.L.T. 104.

(4) DISPOSAL OF UNAPPOINTED FUNDS.

(1374)

Apportionment wholly invalid.

Darling's Trustees v Darling's Trustees, 1909 S.C. 445; 46 S.L.R. 394; 1909, 1 S.L.T. 207, No. 1362, supra.

(1375)

Partial appointment—Right of appointee to share unappointed portion.

A testator directed his trustees to hold a share of the residue of his estate for behoof of his daughter, Mrs. Sandilands, in liferent, and her children in such proportions as she might appoint, and failing appointment then "equally among them," in fee. Mrs. Sandilands, who had five children, executed a deed of appointment, whereby in contemplation of the marriage of her daughter Maud (afterwards Mrs. Simpson), she appointed "one equal one-fifth part or share" of the fund to that daughter. Mrs. Sandilands died without having executed any further deed of appointment, survived by her five children. In a question between Mrs. Simpson and the four other children of Mrs. Sandilands, held that Mrs. Simpson was entitled to an equal share along with the other children of the unappointed four-fifths of the fund, in addition to the one-fifth appointed to her by her mother.

Johnson's Trustees v Sandilands, 1903, 5 F. 518; 40 S.L.R. 393; 10 S.L.T. 716.

(1376)

The liferent of a sum of money was settled on a father, and, on his death, on his children in such shares and proportions as the father might appoint, and failing such appointment equally among them. There were four children. The father died, having appointed a quarter of the sum to a son, and a quarter to a daughter, but leaving the remaining half unappointed. Held that the unappointed portion fell to be divided equally among the four children, including the children who had already received portions.

Mackenzie's Trustees v Lord Kilmarnock's Trustees, 1909 S.C. 472; 46 S.L.R. 217; 16 S.L.T. 676.

(1377)

A lady who had under her marriage contract power to apportion a fund among her children apportioned one-fifth of the fund to her eldest son, and died without making any further apportionment. Held that the remaining four-fifths fell to be divided among the children, exclusive of the eldest son.

Bowie's Trustees v Paterson, 1889, 16 R. 983; 26 S.L.R. 676.

(1378)

Right of appointee to share—Heritage.

The lands of N were held in trust for a father in liferent and his children in fee in such proportions as the father might appoint, and failing appointment, equally. The father, by irrevocable deed, appointed one-third pro indiviso part of the lands of N to his second son. Held that the unappointed two-thirds fell to be divided equally among the whole children including the second son.

Murray's Trustee v Murray, 1872, 10 M. 778; 44 J. 545; 9 S.L.R. 497.

(1379)

Donee of power becoming insane after partial exercise.

A trustee under a settlement had power to apportion a fund among a family of children. The trustee became insane after partially exercising the power. Held that as the power could no longer be exercised, the fund must be divided among the children in such a way that each child should have an equal share of the whole fund.

Exercise partly inoperative.

By an antenuptial marriage contract the husband had power to apportion a fund among all or any of the children of the marriage, subject to such limitations or conditions as he might appoint. Failing such apportionment, or in so far as such apportionment should not extend, the fund was to be divided equally among the children, vesting being postponed till, in the case of sons, they reached the age of twenty-one. The husband, by his trust disposition and settlement, apportioned the fund by directing that it, along with the residue of his estate, should be held in trust for his children equally, the shares of sons to vest in them and be payable on their reaching the age of thirty. One of the sons died at the age of twenty-eight. Held that nothing having vested in virtue of the settlement in the son who had died under thirty years of age, the share of the marriage contract fund intended for him was unappropriated, and fell to be divided equally among the other children of the marriage.

(1381)

Exercise partially invalid.

(1382)

Invalidly appointed fund—Residuary appointment.

In an antenuptial marriage contract the trustees were directed to convey the wife's funds to the children of the marriage in such proportions as she should appoint, and failing such appointment, equally. She apportioned part of the funds among certain of the children, appointed another part to persons not objects of the power, and, in the third place, directed that "after fulfilling or providing for the fulfilment of the above directions the whole remainder of the trust funds and property shall be divided equally" among three of the children already favoured. There was one child in whose favour no appointment was made. Held that the sum invalidly appointed fell to be divided as "remainder" under the deed of appointment, and not as an unappointed fund.

(1383)

Provision to daughter in her marriage contract.

A father, who had settled his whole estate by his marriage contract on his children, reserving to himself a power of appointment, and, failing an appointment, providing that the division should be equal, subsequently bound himself in a daughter's marriage contract to make payment of £2000 to her at his death. He died without making an effectual appointment. Held that the obligation to pay his daughter £2000 was a debt, and must be paid out of his estate before the equal division among the family could take place.

Effect of discharge by appointees.

An antenuptial marriage contract conferred power on the spouses or the survivor to apportion a fund of about £60,000 among the children of the marriage. There were three daughters of the marriage. The two eldest daughters in their antenuptial marriage contract discharged their claims under their parents' marriage contract, each in consideration of a payment of £5000 paid to trustees for the daughters in liferent and their children in fee. After the mother's death the father entered into a second marriage and granted a trust deed, by which he directed £20,000 to be paid to the youngest daughter in full, and settled £30,000 on his second wife in liferent and the children of the second marriage in fee. The youngest daughter signed the settlement in token of her acceptance of the provisions. Held (1) that the discharges obtained from the daughters were ineffectual to limit their rights; (2) that there had been valid appointments in favour of the daughters of £5000, £5000 and £20,000; and (3) that the three daughters were entitled to participate equally in the unappointed balance of the fund.

(5) EFFECT OF APPOINTMENT AS REGARDS VESTING.

[See VESTING IX. 4.]

4. POWER TO ENCROACH ON CAPITAL—POWER TO CONSUME—POWER TO SELECT.

(1385)

Power to encroach on capital.

By mutual settlement a husband conveyed to his wife in the event of her surviance the whole estate which might belong to him at his death and the wife made a similar conveyance to the husband. The conveyances were declared to be subject to the conditions (1) that a will left by the predecessor should receive effect to the extent of a defined proportion of the estate remaining at the death of the survivor, and (2) that the survivor should have power to "use or encroach on the funds, means and estate hereby conveyed on either side." The husband exercised the power to test, and was survived by the wife. Held that the power to encroach on the estate was limited to a power to encroach for the survivor's own use exclusively, and did not postpone vesting in the legatees under the husband's will.

(1386)

By his will a testator directed his trustees to pay to his wife (1) £2100, with full power of disposal, and (2) £2000 "to be held by her during her lifetime, and the uncontrolled possession and profit of which she shall enjoy as long as she lives, which sum, however, should nothing occur to render it necessary to touch upon or induce her to dispose of it otherwise, which she shall have power to do, the same or balance thereof shall return and form part of my trust estate." In a supplementary settlement the testator directed his trustees to pay to his wife (1) the £2100 to be at her sole disposal, and (2) the £2000 "the free and unfettered use of which she shall enjoy so long as she lives, with power even to trench upon the principal, should she ever under any emergency require to do so," declaring, however, that the said £2000 so far as not required for my wife's personal use shall at her death return, and, if thought necessary, be ordered by her to return, to the trust estate." The wife survived. At her death she left the £2000 separately invested. Held that the wife had no power to dispose of the £2000 by will.

Power to encroach for maintenance—Capital intermixed with liferenter's estate.

A testator gave to his widow a liferent of his whole estate with power to encroach on the capital for her better maintenance and support. He gave the fee to his children. The widow lost part of the estate in investments and intermingled the rest with her own estate. Held that she did not become fiar except in so far as the estate had actually been used for her maintenance.

M'Kinlay's Trustees, (O.H.) 1897, 5 S.L.T. 253.

(1388)

Power to call up trust funds—Marriage contract—Purchasing and furnishing house or any other purpose.

In an antenuptial marriage contract the wife conveyed funds to the trustees for, inter alia, the following purposes:—

"Fourth, that if during the subsistence of the marriage the said" wife "shall by a writing or writings under her hand require the said trustees to do so, they shall be bound to pay over to her, for the purpose of purchasing a dwelling-house or residence for herself and her said intended husband and their family, and furnishing the same, or for any other purpose, such amount of the trust funds in their hands as shall be specified in such writing or writings, and if a house shall be purchased and furnished from the money so to be paid the title thereto shall be taken in favour of the said trustees, and the same shall form part of the said trust estate." Held that the clause was to be construed as entitling the wife to call up the whole trust funds for any purpose.

Power to consume—Gift over of portion unconsumed.

In a mutual settlement by spouses the husband conveyed his whole estates to trustees and directed them to pay to his wife, if she survived him, as an alimentary allowance for her and their children, the income of his estate and such portions of the capital as his trustees should deem necessary; "and in like manner and in consideration of what is above written," the wife conveyed her whole estates to her husband under the burden of maintaining her whole children, with full power to him "to consume such parts or portions of the capital during his lifetime as he may find or think necessary," and also power "to realise . . . said estates . . . and in general to deal and intromit therewith as freely as" she could have done herself. She appointed him to be her sole executor. Upon the death of her husband if he survived her (as he did), she conveyed her "said estate or such portion thereof as may be unconsumed" by him to trustees for certain purposes. The wife died in 1893. After the wife's death the husband realised certain properties which had belonged to her, and paid the proceeds into his own bank account, so that they became immixed with his own funds, and could not ultimately be traced or identified. The husband died in 1905. Held (1) that under the mutual settlement the husband was not bound to account to the wife's trustees for his intromissions with his wife's estate, and that consequently his trustees were not bound so to account; (2) that the onus of proving what part of the wife's estate was unconsumed by the husband was upon the pursuers; and (3) that the proceeds of the wife's properties sold by the husband having been immixed with the husband's funds, and being now incapable of identification, must be held to have been consumed by the husband in the sense of the mutual settlement.

Gift of fee—Gift over of what might remain at beneficiaries' death.

Terms of a will on which held that, notwithstanding a gift of the testator's whole estate in terms importing an absolute fee to his wife, the gift was qualified by an express condition that what remained of the estate after the wife's death was to be divided among certain beneficiaries, and that this condition could not be defeated by the wife's will. Observed that the wife's interest was more than a life interest, but less than a fee.

Stephen's Executrix v Forsyth, (O.H.) 1905, 12 S.L.T. 778.

(1391)

Power to encroach for personal benefit.

Under a mutual settlement by a husband and wife, the survivor was given a life interest with a power of encroachment on the fee. Terms of the settlement under which opinion (per Lord Skerrington, Ordinary) that the survivor did not have a general power of disposal either inter vivos or mortis causa, but merely a power to encroach upon and use the capital for his personal benefit, and that in any event the right of the survivor remained a mere right of life interest until the power had been duly exercised.

Dingwall v Dow, (O.H.) 1909, 2 S.L.T. 311.

(1392)

Power to hold possession during life.

The holograph will of a testator provided, inter alia, "My wife, Mrs. M'C., to hold possession of all my belongings during her life." Held that the widow was entitled to a life interest of the whole estate heritable and moveable, but had no power to encroach on the capital.

M'Crorie's Curator Bonis v M'Crorie, (O.H.) 1909, 1 S.L.T. 544.

(1393)

Gift over of subjects so far as not consumed.

By mutual settlement executed by a husband and wife, the wife, in consideration of provisions made in her favour by the husband, gave to the husband if he survived (which he did) her whole estate, subject to certain burdens, "with full power to my said husband to consume such parts . . . of the capital during his lifetime as he may find or think necessary," and also power to sell, and to deal and intromit therewith, and upon the death of her husband she conveyed her estate or "such portions as may be unconsumed by my said husband" to trustees for certain trust purposes. The spouses reserved power to alter or revoke the settlement during their joint lives, with power to the survivor to alter or revoke, but only in so far as regarded his or her separate estates. In a question between the trustees under the mutual settlement and the husband's testamentary trustees under a will made by him after the wife's death, held that under the mutual settlement the husband did not take a full and unlimited right of fee in the whole estate of the wife.

(1394)

Power to select articles of furniture — Testamentary exercise of power.

A testator directed his trustees to deliver to M, his widow, "such articles of jewellery, linen, silver plate, books, and other household furniture belonging to me as she may choose to select for her own absolute use," and to allow her and his daughter and the longest liver of them the life interest use of his mansion-house of Easter Livelands, "and also such articles of household furniture, plate, . . . and plenishing of every description which shall be found at the time of my death remaining after the said M shall have made her selection as aforesaid, or the whole in case of no such selection being made." After the testator's death his widow and daughter lived together at Easter Livelands for a number of years, in joint possession of his plate, jewellery, and furniture. The widow did not during her life exercise the power of selection given her by the testator, but she left a settlement whereby she bequeathed to different legatees certain of the articles to which the power applied. Held (1) upon the construction of the husband's settlement, that the power of selection given to the widow was a power to be exercised within a reasonable time after the testator's death; and (2) that the power had not been exercised within due time, and had lapsed.

XX. ACCUMULATIONS—THELLUSSON ACT.

STATUTES.

Act 1800—The Thellusson Act—39 & 40
Geo. III. c. 98.

Act 1843—The Entail Amendment Act, 1843
—11 & 12 Vict. c. 36—sec. 41.

Act 1892—The Accumulations Act, 1892—
55 & 56 Vict. c. 58.

1. WHETHER ACCUMULATION DIRECTED.

(1395)

Implied direction to accumulate—Heritage to be purchased — Income not expressly disposed of.

A trustor left heritable and moveable estate, with directions that his moveable estate should forthwith be converted into heritage, which, with the heritable estate belonging to him at the time of his death, was to be held by his trustees until the death of the last survivor of his nephews and nieces (his heir at law and next of kin) and widow, and then entailed upon a series of heirs. He directed his trustees to pay the free rents and income of his heritable estate to his widow during her life, and after her death, and until the death of the last survivor of his nephews and nieces, such income, together with the income derived from the heritage to be purchased with the proceeds of his moveable estate, should be accumulated and from time to time employed in the purchase of lands to be entailed as aforesaid; but the settlement did not contain any directions with regard to the disposal of the income derived from the heritage to be purchased with the proceeds of his moveable estate during the period between his own death and the death of his widow. Held that, although the testator had not expressly disposed of the free income arising from the proceeds of the said portion of the estate during the life of the widow, his intention that it should be accumulated and invested along with the capital in purchasing lands to be entailed was implied by the terms of the settlement.

Campbell's Trustees v Clarke, 1871, 10 M.
227; 44 J. 137; 9 S.L.R. 160.

(1396)

Implied direction to accumulate—Annuities not exhausting income of estate—Vesting of fee suspended.

A testator directed his trustees to pay certain annuities, which did not exhaust the revenue of his estate, and on the death of the last survivor of the annuitants to realise his whole estate and divide the residue among certain persons who until that event were to have no vested right. Two of the annuitants were in life at the expiry of twenty-one years from the death of the testator. Held that there was an implied direction to accumulate the surplus income, which was struck at by the Thellusson Act.

Logan's Trustees v Logan, 1896, 23 R.
848; 33 S.L.R. 638; 4 S.L.T. 57.

(1397)

Gift to heirs of body of B—B in life at death of testator—Income not expressly disposed of.

A testator directed that the residue of his estate should be conveyed to the heirs of the body of A, whom failing, to the heirs of the body of B. The income of the residue was not specifically disposed of. The testator was predeceased by A without issue, but was survived by B, and the heirs of B's body could not be ascertained until her death. Held that there was an implied direction to accumulate the income of the residue until the death of B, which was struck at by the Thellusson Act as from a date twenty-one years after the death of the testator.

Gollan's Trustees v Dallas, (O.H.) 1905, 13

(1398)

Power to set apart savings of income.

A testator conveyed the residue of his estate to trustees, and directed them to apply the annual income in forming an "institute" for a town, with authority "to set apart and accumulate" the balance of income from such residue for the purpose of erecting a suitable building for the institute, but no power was given to them to employ the capital for this purpose. The trustees accordingly accumulated the income. Held, at a date more than twenty-one years after the testator's death, that, as the Thellusson Act strikes at accumulations, the directions of the trust, so far as they necessitated accumulations, ceased to be operative after twenty-one years, but that the Thellusson Act does not prevent savings out of income, and accordingly that the trustees might still continue to make savings out of income.

Lindsay's Trustees, 1911 S.C. 584; 48 S.L.R. 470; 1911, 1 S.L.T. 374.

Accumulation due to trustees' inability to find proper objects of a discretionary trust.

A testator directed his trustees "from time to time, as they think proper, to make such special payments out of the free residue and remainder of my estate to such of my children or children's children as they may think most deserving, with special instructions to relieve any of them who may appear to be in want, provided always that they have not brought themselves into such circumstances by their own misconduct. My great desire is to assist merit and thrift, and not to acknowledge indolence or folly." For a period of twenty-one years from the testator's death the income of the residue was accumulated, no distribution thereof being made by the trustees, owing to the fact that they were not satisfied that among the testator's children and grandchildren any cases existed which warranted payments out of the trust funds. Held that as the accumulation of income was due, not to the direction express or implied of the testator, but to the extraneous circumstance that no occasion for payments out of income had, in the opinion of the trustees, as yet arisen, the Thellusson Act did not apply.

Mitchell's Trustees v Fraser, 1915 S.C. 350; 52 S.L.R. 293; 1915, 1 S.L.T. 97.

(1400)

Payment of premiums on insurance of life selected by testator—Sum insured to be applied for purposes of trust—Insured surviving testator more than twenty-one years.

A testatrix empowered her trustees, "if they see cause, to make insurances on the life" of a nephew, "in such a way as to enable" them "to receive a sum or sums at his death to be then applied for the purposes of" the trust. The testatrix died in 1841, and her trustees in 1845 effected insurances on the life of the nephew, paying the premiums out of the income of the estate until his death, in 1878. Held that the application of the accruing income in payment of the policies on the nephew's life did not constitute illegal accumulation within the meaning of the Thellusson Act.

v 21

(1401)

Direction to accumulate beneficiary's share of income—Whether applicable to accreting share.

By his trust disposition and settlement A left directions to his trustees to retain one-third of the free income of his estate and invest it for behoof of B, paying her the interest annually until she attained the age of twenty-five years, when she was to receive the accumulated sum. He further directed his trustees to pay to C the remaining two-thirds of the free annual income, and declared that if either B or C died without issue before B attained the age of twenty-five years, "the share of the predeceaser shall accrete and belong to the survivor." C died within a year of the death of the testator, without issue. Held that B, the survivor, took her accreting share, subject to the same conditions as to accumulation, &c., as her original share.

Paris' Trustees v Gow, 1870, 8 S.L.R. 184.

2. WHETHER ACCUMULATION ILLEGAL.

(1402)

Accumulation of capital payments—Rent of mineral field opened after testator's death.

A testator conveyed his estate to trustees, with directions to hold the same for behoof of certain beneficiaries in liferent, and on the death of all of them to convey the same to the person who should then be the heir-male of the testator's father. Subsequent to the testator's death the trustees let the coal under the testator's lands for a fixed rent or lordships. The coal was not worked, and the fixed rent was paid to the trustees. Held that the fixed rent or lordships formed part of the corpus of the estate, and fell to be retained by the trustees for behoof of the person ultimately found entitled to a conveyance of the fee, and that the Thellusson Act did not apply.

(1403)

Provision for payment of debt—Thellusson Act, sec. 2—Debts not in existence at testator's death.

A testator directed his trustees to pay certain annuities, and also to pay to B out of the free revenue of his heritable estate an allowance not exceeding £1000 per annum. The annuities and the allowance together did not exhaust the revenue of the heritage. On the death of B the testator directed his trustees to entail certain land on a series of heirs. He also authorised his trustees to purchase other lands to be entailed on the same series of heirs. Prior to the expiry of twenty-one years from the testator's death, the trustees had bought certain lands for that purpose, the price of which was partially paid out of the proceeds of a loan over the land belonging to the testator at his death. This loan was outstanding, to the extent of £15,000, at the expiry of twenty-one years from the testator's death (at which date B was still in life). Held that subsequent to the expiry of the twenty-one years the trustees were not entitled to accumulate income for the purpose of paying off the debt, any implied direction so to do being struck at by the Thellusson Act.

Observed (per Lord Gifford) that the debts for the payment of which accumulation is permitted by sec. 2 of the Thellusson Act must be debts in existence at the death of the trustor, and must be subsisting at the time when the trust comes into operation.

(1404)

Portions to children—Direction to reserve and invest sum out of income of residue—Accumulations to be paid to children of life-renter at majority or on life-renter's death.

By a codicil to his settlement a testator directed his trustees to pay the income of the residue of his estates to A, his nephew's widow, during her life, and by a later codicil he directed them out of this income "to reserve £1000 annually, and to invest the same, with the interest . . . accruing thereon" in the trustees' names for behoof of A's two daughters "equally between them, share and share alike, or in the event of one dying without leaving lawful issue then the whole to the survivor." Held that the direction as to the annual reservations for behoof of A's daughter was a "provision for raising portions" for the children of a person taking an interest under the testator's settlement within the meaning of the second exception in sec. 2 of the Thellusson Act.

Direction to accumulate surplus income—Income of accumulations to be paid to children at majority—Capital to be set apart for children at death of testator's widow.

A testator directed his trustees to pay a certain annuity to his widow, and in the event of there being any surplus income from his estate, to accumulate the same for behoof of his children, and to divide among his children equally, on their attaining majority, the income derivable from the accumulated surplus. On the widow's death the trustees were directed to set apart for each of his children "an equal share of the capital estate and accumulations." The testator was survived by his widow and three children. Twenty-one years having elapsed since the testator's death and the widow being still alive, held that the provisions for the testator's children were not provisions "for raising portions" in the sense of the exception in sec. 2 of the Thellusson Act, and that consequently the Act applied, and the direction to accumulate after twenty-one years was void.

(1406)

Direction to accumulate balance of revenue—Residue of estate and accumulations destined to children of testator in life-rent and their children in fee.

A testator directed his trustees to pay certain annuities to his widow and daughters and "to accumulate the balance of the revenue," and on the widow's death to realise his whole means and estate and dispose of the proceeds thereof as well as the accumulations of the same, if any, as follows, viz. (after providing certain sums for some of his children), "to hold and invest the residue and remainder of my said means and estate and accumulations of revenue, if any, for behoof of" his sons and daughters equally in life-rent allanarly and their respective children in fee. In the event of all his children dying before the period of division without issue, the testator directed his trustees to divide his estate between his own and his wife's next of kin. Held that the direction to accumulate was not a provision for raising portions to children of the grantor in the sense of sec. 2 of the Thellusson Act.

Moon's Trustees v Moon, 1899, 2 F. 201; 37 S.L.R. 140; 7 S.L.T. 257.

(1407)

Terminus a quo of period of legal accumulation.

Held that the Thellusson Act prohibits any accumulation after the lapse of twenty-one years from the date of a testator's death, although the time specified for accumulation may not commence until long after his death.

A testator directed his trustees to pay to his widow the rents of certain lands during her life, and on her death to accumulate the rents for the purchase of additional lands till the death of the longest liver of certain nephews and nieces, and upon that event to execute an entail in favour of a series of heirs. The testator's widow survived him for thirty-two years. Held that the whole directions in the settlement providing for accumulation were void.

(1408)

Date of settlement—Agreement between trustees and beneficiary.

A testator by his trust settlement directed his trustees to accumulate the income of his trust estate for behoof of the children of his marriage. The direction to accumulate was struck at by the Thellusson Act. After the death of the testator his trustees entered into an agreement with his only child, under which one-half of the income was to be accumulated in terms of the settlement. Terms of the agreement under which held that the testator's child was not himself, in respect of the provisions of the agreement, the settler of the property so as to prolong the period during which accumulations were permitted by the Act, Muir's Trustees v Jameson, (O.H.) 1903, 10 S.L.T. 701.

(1409)

Accumulation of income of heritage—Deed prior to 1848—Conversion—Act 1800, sec. 3—Act 1848, sec. 41.

A testatrix, who died in 1841, gave her trustees power to sell such of her heritable property as "they may think expedient," and reinvest it. The only heritable estate left by her consisted of house property and a heritable bond. The heritable bond was paid up in 1845, and the house property was sold in 1861, and the proceeds of both reinvested. The trustees having, in accordance with the testatrix's instructions, accumulated the income of the whole estate for thirty-six years, held that the discretionary power to sell given to the trustees, even though followed by a sale, did not operate as conversion of the heritable estate, and that therefore there had been no illegal accumulation of the income thereof, as heritage fell under the exception in the 3rd section of the Thellusson Act (which was not repealed at the death of the testatrix).

Direction to accumulate one-fourth of income from land purchased.

The granter of a trust disposition, on the narrative that he had executed an entail of an estate in favour of his nephew C and a series of heirs, directed his trustees to lay out the residue of the trust funds in the purchase of land near the entailed estate so soon as a favourable opportunity occurred, to entail the land so purchased on the heir of entail in possession of the estate, and to pay to him three-fourths of the interest or profits of the residue until a purchase could be made, "the surplus interest being applied to increase the amount of the disposable funds." Held that accumulation subsequent to the expiry of twenty-one years from the testator's death was struck at by the Thellusson Act.

Mackenzie v Mackenzie's Trustees, 1877, 4 R. 962; 14 S.L.R. 596.

(1411)

Direction to accumulate one-fourth of income of fund.

A testatrix directed her trustees to invest a sum of £4000 as a fund for payment of bequests to certain charitable institutions, to add one-fourth of the interest yearly to the capital and to pay three-fourths of the interest to the charitable institutions. Held that accumulation subsequent to the expiry of the statutory period of twenty-one years was prohibited by the Thellusson Act.

Accumulation for equitable compensation.

By his trust disposition and settlement a testator directed his trustees to hold his estate for his only child, a daughter, in liferent, and, on her death, to convey the fee to her issue, whom failing, to other persons named. The daughter having claimed and received legitim, the trustees retained and accumulated the income of the estate. On the expiry of twenty-one years from the testator's death, the daughter brought an action against the trustees concluding for payment to her of the future income of the estate, on the ground that further accumulation was prohibited by the Thellusson Act and that the income fell to her as her father's heir. In defence it was averred that the accumulated income had not sufficed to replace the capital withdrawn by the pursuer in name of legitim; that under the principle of equitable compensation the income fell to be accumulated till the capital was so replaced; and that accumulation for this purpose was not within the operation of the statute. Held that further accumulation of the income was prohibited by the Thellusson Act, and decree pronounced in favour of the pursuer.

(1413)

A daughter, liferent in the residue of her mother's estate by the latter's will, claimed and received payment of her legitim. In consequence of this claim the trustees retained and accumulated the income of the residue for the purpose of making equitable compensation to the disappointed beneficiaries. On the expiry of twenty-one years from the testatrix's death, the accumulated income had not sufficed to replace the capital which had been withdrawn to pay the legitim. The daughter was still alive, and the fee of the residue was not vested, vesting being postponed under the will until her death. Held that further accumulation of the income was prohibited by the Thellusson Act, and that the income fell to be paid to the daughter as the heir ab intestato of her mother.

A trustee directed his trustees to hold the residue of his estate, with accumulations of income, after payment therefrom of annual allowances to his children, during the lives of his children, and after their death to pay the capital and any accumulations to the lawful issue of his children. The trustee's only surviving child, who attained majority, a daughter, repudiated the settlement, and, a special case having been presented, the Court pronounced a judgment of which the effect was that the trustee's direction to hold the residue of his estate with accumulations of income till his daughter's death, and thereafter to pay the capital and accumulated income to her lawful issue, became restricted to the dead's part. After the trustees had been in possession of and had been accumulating in come on the said fund for twenty-one years from the date of the trustor's death, held that the further accumulation of income was prevented by the Thellusson Act, and that the directions of the trustor on the matter not being applicable, the future income of the fund fell to be paid to the person who would have been entitled to succeed to it ab intestato, viz., the testator's daughter.

Gillies' Trustees v Bain, 1893, 30 S.L.R. 651.

Accumulation for a purpose alleged to be void from uncertainty—Period for deciding as to disposal of accumulations.

A testator by holograph will, after expressly declaring that C, one of his nephews, was "to get nothing," and leaving legacies to certain of his relatives named, appointed four persons to be his trustees—two of them being legatees, the third a stranger, who got no legacy, and the fourth a sister, who also got no legacy—and directed his trustees to accumulate the income of his estate for fifty years, "After the fifty years is past, the money to purchase an estate in my name that cannot be sold nor indebted, and the income from it, after paying expenses, to be divided amongst those mentioned in my will yearly." There was no other direction as to the estate. In a multiplepounding raised a year after the testator's death it was maintained that the above quoted clause was void for uncertainty. Held that the direction to accumulate must receive effect in so far as permitted by the statute, and that it was premature to determine in hoc statu the rights of parties in the capital and accumulations.

Edward's Trustees v Edward, 1891, 18 R. 535; 28 S.L.R. 360.

3. DISPOSAL OF ILLEGAL ACCUMULATIONS.

(1) WHETHER FALLING INTO INTESTACY.

(1417)

Annuities not exhausting income of estate—No gift of residue until death of annuitants—Intestacy.

A testator directed his trustees to realise his personal estate, and to lease out his heritable estate, and to pay certain annuities, and also directed them, when the accumulations of the surplus revenue of his estate should permit of it, to pay off a bond burdening his heritable estate, and on the bond being paid off to invest any further accumulations on heritable securities. He further directed his trustees—"Ninthly. After the death of the last survivor of the said annuitants, my trustees shall sell and dispose of all my said heritable subjects, . . . and my estates, heritable and moveable, being totally realised, my said trustees shall pay over the whole surplus residue and remainder of my said estates in their hands to the directors of the Glasgow Royal Infirmary, to whom I leave, bequest, and destine the same for the use and behoof of that valuable institution." At the end of twenty-one years from the testator's death some of the annuitants still survived, and further accumulation of the surplus revenue became illegal under the Thellusson Act. Held that as there was no present gift of the residue the surplus revenue accruing from the end of the twenty-one years to the death of the last annuitant fell not to the Infirmary but to the testator's heirs ab intestato.

(1418)

A testator directed his trustees to pay to his widow an annuity, declared to be in full of all claims in respect of terce and jus relictæ, and, with regard to the residue of his means and estate, he further directed them, "should my said wife survive me, to hold and retain the same and all accumulations thereof until her death, and on her death or at my own death should she predecease me my said trustees shall pay over the whole of said residue and all accumulations thereon" to an infirmary. The widow elected to take her annuity. After twenty-one years, the widow being still alive, it became impossible by operation of the Thellusson Act to continue to accumulate the surplus income. In a question as to the right to the surplus income thus set free. Held that, there being no present gift of the fund directed to be accumulated, further surplus income fell to be paid to the testator's heirs ab intestato.

A testator directed his trustees to pay a certain annuity to his widow, and in the event of there being any surplus income from his estate to accumulate the same for behoof of his children, and to divide among his children equally on their attaining majority the income derivable from the accumulated surplus. On the widow's death and as the children respectively attained majority the trustees were directed to set apart for each child "an equal share of the capital estate and accumulations." The testator was survived by his widow and three children. Twenty-one years after the testator's death the widow was still alive, and further accumulation was struck at by the Thellusson Act. Held that there was no present gift of the money directed to be accumulated, and that the income set free fell into intestacy.

(1420)

A testator directed his trustees to pay annuities to his widow and daughters, to accumulate the balance of the revenue, and on the death of the widow, to realise his whole estate, and "dispose of the proceeds thereof as well as of the accumulations of the same, if any, as follows, viz., . . ." to hold and invest the residue and remainder of my said means and estate "and accumulations of revenue, if any," for behoof of his sons and daughters in liferent allenerly and their respective children in fee. In the event of all his children dying before the period of division without issue, he directed his trustees to divide his estate between his own next of kin and his wife's next of kin. The testator's widow survived the expiry of twenty-one years from the testator's death, and accumulation subsequent to that date was struck at by the Thellusson Act. Held that the income set free by the operation of the Act fell into intestacy in respect that no right either of liferent or of fee vested in the residuary legatees until the death of the testator's widow.

(1421)

A testator directed his trustees, upon the death of the last of certain annuitants, to "realise and convert into cash" his whole estate, and "divide" the residue among certain persons who until that event were to have no vested right. The surplus revenue was accumulated in the hands of the trustees. At the expiry of twenty-one years from the testator's death two of the annuitants still survived. Held (1) that there was an implied direction to the trustees to accumulate the surplus income; and (2) that further accumulations being prohibited by the Thellusson Act, and no one having a vested right to residue, the surplus income as it accrued fell to the testator's heirs ab intestato.

Logan's Trustees v Logan, 1896, 23 R. 848; 33 S.L.R. 638; 4 S.L.T. 57.

(1422)

—Gift to charitable institutions to be nominated by trustees—Date of nomination subsequent to expiry of statutory period.

A testator directed his trustees, after providing for an annuity to his wife, to hold the residue of his estate until the death of his wife, and upon her death to set aside £10,000 as an endowment of a chair in a Free Church college, to apply another sum of £10,000 in erecting and endowing a Free church, and also to apply such further sum as they should see proper in providing a manse for that church, and, "lastly, after all the above purposes shall have been fulfilled . . . to apply and pay over the whole residue and remainder of my estate, if such there shall be, to and for the use and benefit of such four of the schemes of the Free Church of Scotland, and in such proportions as to my trustees shall appear most expedient." The income of the residue exceeded what was necessary to pay the widow's annuity. She survived the testator more than twenty-one years, and further accumulation of the surplus income was struck at by the Thellusson Act. Held that the four schemes could not be selected until the widow's death, and that, prior to that event, there could be no residuary legatee, and that the surplus income fell to the testator's heirs ab intestato.

Elder's Trustees v Treasurer of Free Church of Scotland, 1892, 20 R. 2; 30 S.L.R. 28.

Accumulations for purchase of lands—Lands to be entailed on heirs under existing entail.

The granter of a trust disposition, on the narrative that he had executed an entail of an estate in favour of his nephew C and a series of heirs, directed his trustees to lay out the residue of the trust funds in the purchase of land near the entailed estate so soon as a favourable opportunity occurred, and to entail the land so purchased on the heir of entail in possession of the estate, and to pay to him three-fourths of the interest or profits of the residue until a purchase could be made, "the surplus interest being applied to increase the amount of the disposable funds." The trustees did not purchase any lands under this direction for thirty-four years after the truster's death. The Thellusson Act applied to the accumulations so made by the trustees after the lapse of twenty-one years from the testator's death. Held that the person entitled to these accumulations under the Act, as the person "who would have been entitled thereto if such accumulation had not been directed," was the heir of entail, who would have been entitled to the rents if the lands had been purchased, and not the testator's next of kin.

Mackenzie v Mackenzie's Trustees, 1877, 4 R. 962; 14 S.L.R. 596.

Direction to accumulate—Entail at a future date—Institute not ascertained—Acceleration.

A testator directed his trustees to pay the rents of certain lands to his widow during her life, and on her death to accumulate the rents for the purchase of additional lands till the death of the longest liver of certain nephews and nieces, and on that event to execute an entail in favour of the heirs-male of the body of his nephew L C and a series of heirs. The testator's widow survived him for thirty-two years, so that accumulation subsequent to her death was struck at by the Thellusson Act. Held that the failure of the trust purpose for accumulation did not accelerate the date for executing the entail, as until the death of the longest liver of the nephews and nieces it could not be known who should be the institute, and that the rents accruing subsequent to the widow's death fell into intestacy.

(1425)

—Accumulation of entire income during life of A—Vesting of fee suspended till death of A.

A testatrix, who died in 1841, left the residue of her whole estate to trustees, to be held "for behoof of the daughter or daughters, and, failing them, the son or sons, to be procreated of the body of" a nephew J. The income was directed to be invested, and no part thereof paid to any beneficiary during the lifetime of J. Upon his death the amount of capital of the estate was to be fixed, and upon the marriage of his daughter or daughters it was to be divided among them, but, in the event of there being no daughter, the estate was to be paid over to his sons or son. J died in 1878—upwards of thirty-six years after the testatrix—leaving one daughter, who was married, and a son. The trustees had accumulated the income of the estate during the whole thirty-six years, and a question arose as to who was in right of the fee of the estate, and of the accumulations of income after twenty-one years from the death of the testatrix. Held (1) that J's daughter, being married at her father's death, became then entitled to the fee of the estate; and (2) that the accumulations after the twenty-one years fell to the next of kin of the testatrix, there being no gift of the estate to J's daughter prior to the date of J's death.

—Annuity to A out of rent of lands—Implied direction to accumulate surplus—Direction to entail on second son of A on A's death.

A testator directed his trustees to pay an annuity to A, and on A's death to execute an entail in favour of A's second son and a series of heirs. A survived the expiry of twenty-one years from the testator's death, and any implied direction to accumulate the rents thereafter was struck at by the Thellusson Act. Held that the surplus rents accruing subsequent to the expiry of twenty-one years from the death of the testator did not belong to A's second son, but went to the person who would have succeeded to the lands if the testator had died intestate.

—Gift of specified estate with accumulations on death of liferenter—No residuary gift.

A testator directed the interest on his estate to be accumulated until the death of the survivor of three liferenters, and then the whole estate and accumulations to be given over to a certain beneficiary. Held that accumulations struck at by the Thellusson Act fell into intestacy, and not to the beneficiary, who, although entitled to the fee of the whole estate as at the death of the survivor of the liferenters, had not been made residuary legatee.

Magistrates of Ayr v Shaw, (O.H.) 1904, 12 S.L.T. 126.

—Three-fourths of income of residue payable to charities—One-fourth to be accumulated to increase fund—Right of charity to receive whole income.

A testatrix directed her trustees, after the lapse of certain annuities, to invest a sum of money as a fund for payment of certain bequests to charitable institutions, and for the purpose of increasing said fund to add thereto yearly one-fourth part of the interest payable on the said sum, and to pay the remaining three-fourths of the interest to the charities equally. The direction to accumulate was struck at by the Thellusson Act after the expiry of the statutory period. Held that the capital of the fund having been bestowed on the trustees for behoof of the charities, and the direction to accumulate being a mere burden or limitation of the bequest, the whole income, after the lapse of the statutory period, fell to be paid over to the charities.

—Direction to accumulate proceeds of mines—Accumulated sum to be paid at future date to heir under entail—Heir's right to receive proceeds.

A testator directed the proceeds of his mines and minerals to be accumulated until a sum of £25,000 should be raised. The sum of £25,000 was to be paid over to the heir in possession of the testator's entailed lands. The interest of the accumulations was not to be accumulated, but was to be paid over as it accrued to the heir in possession of the entailed lands for the time being. Before the sum of £25,000 was raised, further accumulation was stopped by the operation of the Thellusson Act. Held, on a construction of the whole terms of the settlement (1) that the testator's sole purpose in postponing the payment was accumulation; and (2) that further accumulation being impossible, the heir in possession for the time being was entitled to the fund.

(1431)

Heir of provision.

A, the proprietor of an estate under a destination in favour of himself, whom failing, of B, one of his heirs-portioners, left a trust settlement, in which he directed his trustees to pay an annuity to B, and on his death to execute an entail in favour of B's second son and a series of heirs. B having survived the expiry of twenty-one years from the date of the testator's death, held that surplus income accruing subsequent to the expiry of the twenty-one years fell to be paid to B as heir of provision to the testator.

(1432)

Widow—Jus relictæ.

Held that a widow was not entitled in virtue of her jus relictæ to claim any portion of surplus revenue falling into intestacy under the Thellusson Act, in respect that it did not form part of the testator's estate at his death.

By a settlement disposing of his whole estate a testator made certain provisions in favour of his wife which were declared to be in full of jus relictæ. The wife accepted the testamentary provisions. Held that she was entitled to claim jus relictæ out of accumulations of income, which fell into intestacy in consequence of the operation of the Thellusson Act.

(1434)

Jus relictæ—Terce.

A testator directed his trustees to pay an annuity to his widow in full satisfaction of terce, share of moveables, and other legal claims. The widow accepted the provision. In consequence of the operation of the Thellusson Act, income of the estate accruing subsequent to the expiry of twenty-one years from the testator's death fell into intestacy. Held that the widow was entitled to jus relictæ out of the income falling into intestacy in so far as it was derived from moveable estate, and to terce out of the income falling into intestacy in so far as it was derived from heritage.

(1435)

Date of ascertainment of heirs—Rents of heritage.

A testator was survived by his widow for thirty-one years. In consequence a direction to accumulate the rents of certain heritage became void, and the rents fell into intestacy. Held that each term's rent as it accrued belonged to the person who at that date possessed the character of heir in heritage ab intestato of the testator.

(1436)

Heritable or moveable—Conversion.

A testator directed his trustees to pay certain annuities which did not exhaust the revenue of his estate, and on the death of the last survivor of the annuitants to "realise and convert into cash" his whole estate and "divide" the residue among certain persons who, until that event, were to have no vested right. At the expiry of twenty-one years from the testator's death two annuitants were still in life, so that surplus income thereafter accruing fell into intestacy. Held (1) that the direction to realise did not operate conversion of the heritage until the date of division; (2) that the rents of each term as they accrued fell to the person holding at that time the character of heir at law of the testator; and (3) that the rents accumulated by the trustees prior to the expiry of the twenty-one years being moveable estate, the surplus income derived therefrom fell to the heirs in mobiliis of the testator as at his death.

(1437)

Heritable or moveable—Conversion—Incidence of annuities.

When by the operation of the Thellusson Act the accruing revenue of a mixed estate falls to be divided as intestate succession, the funds are to be distinguished as heritable or moveable, according to their source as existing at the testator's death without regard to any conversion authorised or directed by him for the purpose of his settlement. Annuities left by the testator fall to be deducted from the income of heritage.

(1438)

Collation between heir and next of kin.

Held that when by the Thellusson Act the income of the heritable and moveable estate of a person deceased falls to his heirs ab intestato, an heir in heritage, who is also one of the next of kin, cannot take his share of the moveable succession without collating the heritage.

Moon's Trustees v Moon, 1899, 2 F. 201; 37 S.L.R. 140; 7 S.L.T. 257.

XXI. ELECTION.

1. GENERALLY.

(1439)

The doctrine of "approbate and reprobate" in Scotland is identical with that of "election" in England.

Crum Ewing's Trustees v Bayly's Trustees, 1911 S.C. (H.L.) 18; [1911] A.C. 217; 48 S.L.R. 401; 1911, 1 S.L.T. 397.

(1440)

Necessity for immediate election.

A testator directed his trustees to pay to his widow until her death or re-marriage an annuity of £500 in full of her legal rights, or such other sum, more or less, as they in their discretion might think reasonable, and that at such times as they might think fit, and provided that the balance of the income, and on the death or re-marriage of the widow the fee, of the estate should be paid to her children. The testator died survived by his widow and children. Held, in a special case submitted to the Court shortly after the testator's death, that as none of the other beneficiaries could show any present interest which required the widow to make an immediate election between the testamentary provisions and her legal rights, she was not bound to do so.

Watson's Trustees v Watson, 1910 S.C. 795; 47 S.L.R. 723; 1910, 2 S.L.T. 62.

(1441)

Special powers granted to curator bonis.

The Court granted special power to the curator bonis of a lunatic to elect between testamentary provisions and legal rights where it was necessary in the interests of other beneficiaries that an election should be made at once.

Skinner's Curator Bonis, 1903, 5 F. 914; 40 S.L.R. 677; 11 S.L.T. 196.

(1442)

Right of trustees to require discharge of claim for legitim before paying legacy.

2. WHETHER PARTIES PUT TO ELECTION.

(1443)

Impossibility of approbating cum effectu—English Statute of Mortmain.

A legatee, who has also a claim ex lege to part of the testator's estate, included by that testator in a general settlement, cannot be called on to make his election between the legacy and his legal right, if, by his abandonment of his legal right, the estate to which that right entitles him will not be surrendered to the uses of the will, but will be treated as undisposed of. A testator in a general trust disposition and settlement, inter alia, left to a nephew, who was also his heir, three legacies. The testator directed that the residue of his estate should be divided among certain charities. Part of the trust estate consisted of real estate in England. By the English Statute of Mortmain neither the real estate nor the proceeds of it, if sold, could pass under the trust settlement to charities, while, if the heir waived his right to it, the effect of that statute was that the real estate would be treated as undisposed of. Held that in these circumstances the heir was not put to his election.

(1444)

Impossibility of subjecting share to trusts of settlement.

A testator, who was domiciled in Scotland and was survived by seven children, by his settlement conveyed his whole estate (including immoveable property in the Argentine) to trustees in trust equally for six of the children in fee and for the other child, a daughter, in liferent and her issue in fee. By Argentine law trusts are not recognised or allowed effect; and, accordingly, the settlement was declared null quoad the Argentine property by the Courts of that state, and each of the testator's children entered into possession of one-seventh of that property in accordance with Argentine law. The daughter having claimed legitimum and thereby forfeited her interests under the trust, the daughter's issue (as the ultimate heirs, under the settlement, of a one-seventh share of the estate) maintained that the testator's other children were bound to elect between their testamentary provisions and their shares of the Argentine property. Held that they were not put to their election, in respect that it was impossible for them to render the Argentine property subject to the uses of the trust, and that they could not be called upon to make an equivalent benefit.

Brown's Trustees v Gregson, 1920 S.C. (H.L.) 87; [1920] A.C. 860; 57 S.L.R. 391; 1920, 1 S.L.T. 311.

Repudiation by beneficiary of part of deed—Invalid appointment by testator—Effect of challenging appointment—Fund available for equitable compensation.

A testator in his trust disposition and settlement directed his trustees to hold a share of his estate for behoof of his daughter in liferent and her children in fee, in such proportions as she might direct, and, failing such direction, then equally among them. The daughter professed to exercise this power by a settlement by which she conveyed to trustees (1) this share of her father's estate; (2) a sum settled by her marriage contract on her in liferent and her children in fee, subject to a power of apportionment by her; and (3) her own estate, and directed the trustees to hold the sums conveyed to them for her children in liferent, for their liferent alimentary uses only, and for their issue in fee. Quoad the share of her father's estate the appointment was bad, in respect that it restricted the children's interest to a liferent, and conferred the fee on persons who were not objects of the power. Held (1) that the doctrine of "approbate and reprobate" in Scotland is identical with that of "election" in England; (2) that, in accordance with that doctrine, the children were, in the circumstances, put to their election, the circumstance whether or not their mother knew that the appointment was bad being immaterial; (3) that the fact that the children's shares of their mother's estate were restricted to alimentary liferents did not prevent the income being available for equitable compensation, and so did not bar election.

(1446)

A testator, by his trust disposition and settlement, disposed of the residue of his estate, and also, in like manner, of certain antenuptial marriage contract funds, in virtue of a power of apportionment conferred on him by the contract, to certain residuary legatees, one of whom was not a proper object of the power contained in the marriage contract. Held that the other residuary legatees were not barred from objecting to any part of the marriage contract funds being paid over to one who was not a proper object of the power, but that if they did so, they were put to their election, and if they elected to take their shares of the marriage contract funds as appropriated by the settlement, they could take no share of the residue without making good therefrom the loss occasioned to the other residuary legatee by their challenge of his right to share in the marriage contract funds.

Invalid appointment under power—Testamentary bequest.

A testator, who had a power of apportioning among his children certain funds derived from his wife's estate, and held by his marriage contract trustees for their behoof, exercised the power in his settlement, but qualified the apportionment of a daughter's share by conditions which were ultra vires. The testator at the same time made a large provision for the daughter out of his own estate. The settlement contained a declaration that the sums provided to the children were in full not only of all claims "competent to them by or through my decease in any manner of way, but also in full of all claims competent to them under my contract of marriage." Held that the provision to the daughter from her father's estate was conditional on her acquiescing in the apportionment as made, and that she could not take the provision from her father's estate and quarrel with the conditions attached to the appointment.

(1448)

Valid appointment under power—Invalid conditions.

Under a marriage contract spouses had power to apportion a fund among their children. The husband's settlement, which was signed by the wife, contained a valid joint appointment of the fund, with invalid conditions added. Held that the children were not put to their election, but were entitled to claim both their shares of the marriage contract fund free of restrictions, and their share of the husband's own estate bequeathed to them by the settlement.

(1449)

A testator died, leaving a trust disposition and settlement and relative codicils, and also a deed of directions, whereby he purported to exercise a power of appointment which he had over certain shares of a trust estate. The power of appointment was invalidly exercised. Circumstances where held that beneficiaries taking under the trust disposition and settlement were barred, on the principle of approbate and reprobate, from challenging the exercise of the power of appointment.

(1450)

Election between legal rights and testamentary provisions—Legacy in full of legitim.

Held that a daughter who claimed a legacy left in her father's trust deed as in full of legitim, &c., was barred from also claiming legitim.

McLaren v Howie, 1869, 8 M. 106; 42 J. 52; 7 S.L.R. 56.

(1451)

Testamentary writings disposing of whole estate.

(1452)

Special destinations contained in titles to heritable property in favour of the widow of the proprietor were revocable. The proprietor left a will disposing of his whole estate. Held that the special destinations formed part of the scheme of testamentary disposition, and that the widow accordingly could not take benefit under these destinations if she claimed her legal rights.

Dallas's Trustees v Dallas, (O.H.) 1905, 13 S.L.T. 332.

(1453)

Inter vivos disposition of heritage to wife—Whether part of general settlement—Wife claiming jus relictæ—Whether bound to elect between heritage and legal rights.

A husband, by an antenuptial contract of marriage entered into on the occasion of his second marriage, assigned to trustees the whole estate, heritable and moveable, which might belong to him at his death, and gave directions as to its disposal. His second wife having died, he married a third wife, without a marriage contract. During the subsistence of the third marriage he conveyed his dwelling-house and furnishings to his wife by an inter vivos disposition. The third wife survived her husband, and claimed ius relictæ. Held that she was not put to her election between the provisions in the inter vivos disposition and her ius relictæ, in respect that, as the antenuptial marriage contract operated only on estate belonging to the husband at the time of his death, the inter vivos disposition did not fall to be read along with it as forming a universal settlement of the husband's estate.

———Right to aliment and education out of father's estate.

A testator conveyed his estate to trustees for payment of his whole estate to his wife, subject to payment of his debts and to payment of the cost of upbringing and maintaining his children. Held that the children were entitled to legitim out of the testator's moveable estate, and also to the expense of their upbringing and education out of the remainder of the estate, but only in so far as the shares of legitim were insufficient for their upbringing and education.

(1456)

———Legitim from mother's estate—Father's will expressly putting children to election.

In his trust disposition and settlement a testator, who died in 1876, declared that the provisions therein made in favour of his children should "be accepted of by them, and the same are hereby declared to be in full of all legitim, portion natural, bairns' part of gear, executry, and all others whatsoever which they or any of them can ask or demand by or through my decease, or by and through the death of their mother, or in any other manner of way." The testator's widow died in 1907, and, on her death, a son who had accepted the provision made to him in his father's trust disposition and settlement claimed legitim from her estate under the Married Women's Property Act, 1881. Held that the above clause in the father's trust disposition and settlement had the effect only of protecting the father's estate from adverse claims, and did not exclude the son's claim to legitim from his mother's estate.

(1457)

A father who died in 1863 by his trust disposition and settlement made certain provisions for his children, declaring them to be in full satisfaction of legitim. On the death of the mother in 1905, held that the only surviving son who had accepted his father's conventional provisions was not excluded from claiming legitim out of his mother's estate by reason of the declaration contained in his father's settlement.

Buckle v Buckle's Curator, (O.H.) 1907, 15 S.L.T. 98.

(1458)

Election between legal rights and other provisions—Provision by father to child in child's marriage contract—Power to child to test on one-half of marriage contract funds—Remaining half destined to father's heirs—Claim of legitim out of remaining half.

H S, in his daughter's antenuptial marriage contract, bound himself to convey £8000 to trustees, to hold for the spouses and the longest liver of them in liferent allenerly, the fee to belong to the children of the marriage, whom failing, to such persons as H S might appoint, whom failing, to his heirs and successors whomsoever, but with power to his daughter to test on one-half. There was no clause by which the daughter accepted these provisions as in full of her legal rights over her father's estate. H S executed a trust settlement by which, in the event of his daughter and her husband dying without issue, the whole property liferented by the spouses was to be divided amongst certain legatees. After the father's death the daughter claimed her legitim. The Court found that she was not barred by her acceptance of the provisions in the marriage contract from claiming legitim. The daughter thereafter, there being no issue of the marriage, exercised the power to test on the £4000, and also to claim as legitim half of the remaining £4000. Held that the daughter was not barred from testing on the £4000, either (1) by having claimed legitim generally; or (2) by having claimed as legitim half of the remaining £4000.

———Legitim not discharged by marriage contract—Children claiming both legitim and provisions.

A husband by antenuptial marriage contract undertook to make over to his children at his death one half of his whole estate, reserving a power of apportionment. The marriage contract did not exclude legitim. Certain of the children having claimed legitim, held that, this being an onerous provision due to the children by contract, it fell to be deducted from the estate before the amount of legitim was computed, and that the children claiming legitim were entitled both to legitim and to their share of the provision.

(1460)

Election between testamentary and other provisions—Policy of insurance.

A effected a policy of insurance on his life, the policy having on it, as issued, a memorandum signed by the secretary of the insurance society, setting forth that "the amount insured by this policy to be in favour of" A's wife "should she survive him, but in the event of her predeceasing him, then the policy to revert to his executors, administrators, or assigns." The policy was delivered to A's wife, but was afterwards handed back to A. He deleted the memorandum, and wrote on the policy, "I hereby revoke and cancel the above bequest in my wife's favour. I have provided for her in my will." A died, survived by his wife. At the date of A's death the policy of insurance had the above quoted revocation deleted. A left a trust disposition and settlement by which he, inter alia, made certain provisions in his wife's favour to be accepted by her "as in full satisfaction of all jus relictae, terce, or other claim of any kind, competent to her through my decease." Held that the wife was the primary creditor under the policy of insurance; that the sum due under the policy did not form part of A's estate at his death; and that the widow was entitled to the sum in the policy, as well as to the provisions in her favour under A's settlement.

Hay's Trustees v Hay, 1904, 6 F. 978; 41 S.L.R. 809.

Pension to widow from military fund.

A husband subscribed during his lifetime to a military fund, whereby after his death his widow became entitled to a pension, payable to her alone. He left a trust disposition and settlement dealing with his whole estate, and containing certain provisions in favour of his widow, which she repudiated, electing to claim her legal rights. Held that on so doing she was not bound to account to the estate for the pension, and that she was entitled to her legal rights in the estate in addition to the pension.

Forfeiture on "taking exception to any of the provisions hereinbefore contained"—Right to challenge deed so as to ascertain rights.

By an antenuptial contract of marriage a husband was given, in the event of his survivance, an alimentary liferent of his wife's whole estate, and he renounced his legal rights as a husband. After the marriage the husband and wife entered into an agreement to make an immediate termination of the marriage trust, which provided that the husband's renunciation of his legal rights contained in the marriage contract should remain effective. Subsequently the wife made a will containing certain provisions in favour of the husband, and a forfeiture clause providing that on the husband stating any other claim or right the provisions in his favour should be cancelled. Held that a challenge by the husband of the inter vivos deed did not involve forfeiture of his provisions under the will.

(1463)

Election between marriage contract and testamentary provisions.

Opinion (per Lord Barcaple, Ordinary) that the principle of approbate and reprobate applied to a claim for conventional provisions as well as to a claim for legitim, and that a child taking under her father's general settlement could not claim a share of a sum which the father bound himself by antenuptial contract to pay to the children of the marriage in lieu of legitim.

Darling's Executor v Darling, (O.H.) 1869, 41 J. 545.

(1464)

Provisions in father's settlement in full of marriage contract provisions.

A father, in the marriage contract of his daughter, directed trustees, who held for him a policy for £3000 on his life, to assign it, to the extent of £2000, to the marriage contract trustees for behoof of the daughter in liferent and her children in fee. This and other provisions were declared to be in full of the daughter's legal rights out of her father's estate. The father died leaving a settlement, by which he directed one-third of the residue of his estate to be held for behoof of the daughter in liferent and her children in fee, declaring that the provisions for her should be in full of all his obligations under her marriage contract remaining unimplemented. Held that if the daughter and her husband took the share of the residue, they were not entitled to any part of the policy fund.

Legacies in satisfaction of provisions over entailed estate.

An heir of entail, by his trust disposition and settlement, left the residue of his estate to the heir entitled to succeed him in the entailed estates, and by a codicil thereto directed his trustees to hold, apply, and pay over, inter alia, legacies of £5000 each to three younger sons, "which provisions of £5000 shall include and comprehend and be subject to abatement and deduction, or shall consist, as the case may be," of the sums to which these sons should be entitled under their father's marriage contract, and under a bond of provision over the entailed estates, "it being my will and intention that each of my three younger sons shall receive in all a provision of £5000." By a second codicil the trustee revoked the destination of the residue in his settlement, and directed that it should be divided among the three younger sons. He further confirmed the settlement and first codicil except in so far as thereby altered. In an action by one of the younger sons against the heir of entail, held that, under the combined effect of the settlement and codicils, the legacies and shares of residue bequeathed to the younger sons were given to them in satisfaction of their claims as creditors in the bond of provision, and that they were not entitled to payment of their shares of the bond of provision except on condition of making compensation to the heirs of entail out of the general estate of the testator.

(1467)

Legal rights out of part of estate falling into intestacy — Testamentary provisions declared to be in full of legal rights.

Held that a declaration by a testator in his settlement that certain provisions he had made for his wife and children were to be in full of all claims by them for terce, jus relictæ, legitim, or otherwise, were to be construed as excluding such claims in so far only as conflicting with the settlement, and that his widow, who had accepted her provisions, was entitled in addition thereto to terce and jus relictæ out of such heritage and moveables as fell to be disposed of as intestate succession.

Held that a declaration by a testator in his settlement that a provision which he had made for his wife was in full satisfaction to her of terce, share of moveables, and every other claim competent to her by law through his decease, was to be construed as excluding such claims in so far only as conflicting with the settlement, and that his widow, who had accepted the provision, was entitled in addition thereto to terce and jus relictæ out of the income of heritage and moveables which fell to be disposed of as intestate succession owing to the stoppage of accumulation under the Thellusson Act.

As a general rule, a clause in a universal settlement whereby provisions to a widow or children are declared to be in full of legal rights is to be regarded as intended solely for the protection of the settlement, and acceptance of the provisions will not bar the acceptors from claiming their legal rights in any portion of the estate which may fall into intestacy. By a settlement disposing of his whole estate, a testator made certain provisions in favour of his wife, which, by a clause in the will, she accepted as in full of jus relictæ and all other claims competent to her in consequence of his death, and signed the will together with her husband. After her husband's death the widow received and accepted payment of the provisions under the settlement. Held that, in addition to her conventional provisions, she was entitled to jus relictæ out of accumulations of income (prohibited by the Thellusson Act) which had fallen into intestacy.

Division of intestate estate—Computation of legitim paid.

The executor of a daughter claimed and was paid legitim out of her father's estate. Forfeited share falling into intestacy — Right of beneficiaries incurring forfeiture to share as heirs ab intestato.

A trust disposition and settlement contained a clause in terms of which any of the testator's children who claimed legitim forfeited all rights competent to them under the settlement. The deed also contained a clause giving direction as to the disposal of lapsed provisions, but not of provisions forfeited by claims of legitim. Held that the forfeited provisions of certain of the children who had claimed legitim fell into intestacy, and that the children who forfeited the provisions were entitled to share in the provisions so forfeited along with the other heirs ab intestato.

(1474)

Bequest of residue void for uncertainty—Residue falling into intestacy—Discharge granted by child claiming legitim.

A testator made certain provisions in favour of his only child, a son, which he declared should be accepted by him as in full satisfaction of his legal rights. He further directed his trustees, in the event of his son claiming his legal rights, to distribute the residue of the trust estate among certain beneficiaries. The son claimed his legal rights and, on receiving payment thereof, he granted a discharge in favour of his father's trustees, discharging them of all he could have asked or claimed out of his father's estate. It was afterwards found that the bequest of residue was void from uncertainty, and the son, as his father's sole heir ab intestato, claimed payment of the residue as having fallen into intestacy. Held that the son, in granting the discharge, had not thereby discharged his rights as heir ab intestato, and that he was accordingly entitled to receive payment of the residue.

——— Clause declaring legacies void if legatee impugned settlement.

A testator provided that, if any party claiming benefit under her will should take any objection thereto or to the exercise by his trustees of any of the powers thereby conferred, the legacies . . . left to him should become null and void. The bequest of residue in the testator's will was void from uncertainty. Held that, apart from this provision, legatees who were also heirs ab intestato were not bound to elect between their legacies and their rights on intestacy, and that the special provision was in the circumstances ineffectual, as its only effect would be to forfeit the objecting legatees' legacies for the benefit of the objecting legatees and of other objectors who were not legatees.

——— Husband's consent — Married Women's Property Act, 1881, sec. 1, subsec. (2).

Held that neither at common law nor under the Married Women's Property Act, 1881, is a married woman entitled to discharge a claim to legitim without her husband's consent.

——— Dispensing with husband's consent—Curator ad litem.

A married woman, living apart from her husband against his will, presented a petition for authority to dispense with her husband's consent to her election between her legitim and the testamentary provisions in her father's will. The Court, holding that the husband was in such a position that he could not be called on to advise his wife, appointed a curator ad litem to the wife for the purposes of her election; and on the curator reporting in favour of acceptance of the testamentary provisions, granted the prayer of the petition. Observed (per Lord President Dunedin) that an election by a wife must be an election by an advised wife, not by an unadvised wife.

——— Conveyance of whole estate to marriage contract trustees—Exclusion of trustees by father's settlement.

A lady conveyed to her marriage contract trustees the whole means and estate "to which she might succeed or acquire right during the subsistence of the marriage." Her father died during the subsistence of the marriage, and by his will made certain conventional provisions in her favour, subject to conditions designed to prevent her share of his estate falling under her marriage contract. Her marriage contract trustees called upon her to claim legitim, but she declined to do so. Held that the right of election is personal and not transmissible, and that the lady was not barred by the terms of the conveyance of acquirenda in her marriage contract from electing to take the conventional provisions under her father's will.

——— Wife's representatives.

Per Lord Watson—"Where there is no antenuptial contract, and the husband makes a voluntary provision in favour of his widow, as in full of her legal claims, she is put to her election upon his predecease; and, in the event of her death before she has had the opportunity of making her choice, the right of election passes to her representatives. On the other hand, if the wife has, during the subsistence of the marriage, consented to accept the provisions in substitution for her legal claims she may retract her consent as a donatio inter virum et uxorem, but her right of revocation being strictly personal cannot be exercised by her representatives."

Child's representatives.

A testator died in 1867 survived by three sons, Alexander, James, and John. James died in 1884 survived by five children. John died intestate and childless in 1891 without having elected between his legitim and the provisions made to him in his father's settlement. Thereafter one of the children of James brought an action against Alexander, who had been appointed John's executor-dative for a share of the legitim which the latter might have claimed from his father's estate. The defender, who had the residuary interest in that estate, objected that James had barred himself by his actings from making any claim in respect of said legitim, and that the pursuer as representing her father under the Intestate Moveable Succession Act, 1855, was equally barred from making such a claim.

Held (1) that the pursuer claimed in her own right, and therefore that her claim was not barred by anything that her father might have done; and (2) that as John's right of legitim was of much greater value than the provisions made to him in his father's settlement, the defender, as his executor, was bound to claim the former.

Lunatic—Curator bonis.

Where a person is legally incapacitated from availing himself of a right of election between testamentary and legal provisions he does not lose the right, even though he receive temporary benefit for his maintenance and support out of the estate, and he may exercise it if the incapacity be removed, or, if it be not removed, the right may be exercised by his representatives after his death.

Circumstances which were held insufficient to justify a curator bonis for a lunatic in making such an election.

Curator bonis.

Special power to elect.

In an application under the Judicial Factors Act, 1849, by the curator bonis of a lunatic for special powers to elect to accept testamentary provisions in his ward's favour under her husband's will in preference to claiming her legal rights, the Court granted the powers craved in respect (1) that it was necessary in the interest of other beneficiaries that the election should be made at once; and (2) that it was in the interest of the ward that it should be made in the manner proposed. Observed that it rests with the Court to determine how such an election should be made.

Settlement consisting of two separate deeds—Challenge by party who in ignorance of one took under the other.

A father executed a trust deed for payment of certain debts and regulating his succession, in fraudem of his antenuptial marriage contract, and to the prejudice of the heir of the marriage, and afterwards another trust deed, the two forming together a complete settlement of his whole estate, heritable and moveable. The heir made up a title under the marriage contract, and under it possessed the lands contained in the first trust deed, and took benefit under the second deed, but in ignorance of the existence of the first trust deed. Held that his trustees and executors were not barred from challenging the earlier deed, but were entitled to elect either to abide by his approbation of his father's settlement or to renounce and restore the benefit he had taken and challenge the first deed.

4. PROOF AND VALIDITY OF ELECTION.

(1488)

Mora—Legitim—Claim for legitim by trustee in bankruptcy.

Personal bar—Conditional acceptance of testamentary provision.

The widow of a manufacturer of smallwares was by her husband's settlement left the liferent of his house, along with the fee of the furniture and plenishing. The trust deed provided that the widow should be allowed, if willing, and so long as she remained unmarried, to carry on her husband's business for behoof of herself and their children; and that the provisions for the widow should be accepted by her in full satisfaction of all her legal claims. A family of children survived their father, whose whole assets amounted to £2800, in addition to the house and furniture. The widow continued to occupy the house with her children for upwards of a year, and carried on the business for her and their behoof, borrowing, under the provisions of the deed, £1000 from the trustees to enable her to do so. She then executed a deed of obligation, in which she bound herself to redeliver the stock and business to the trustees in the event of her resolving to marry again, and declared that she accepted these provisions in full satisfaction of her legal rights "so long as I continue to carry on said business." On her desiring to enter into a second marriage, held that, in the peculiar circumstances of the case, and it being still possible to give effect to what she asked without prejudice to any one, she was not barred from making her legal claims against her husband's estate.

(1493)

Minute approving of husband's will.

(1494)

Conveyance by daughter to trustees.

A father's settlement left a fourth of the residue to A, his daughter, which exceeded in value her share of legitim, but was contingent upon her surviving her mother. A, who never intimated any election, conveyed to her marriage contract trustees her rights under her father's settlement to the extent of £4000, and subsequently executed a will leaving her whole estate to testamentary trustees for behoof of her husband. In an action of multiplepinding raised after her death, A's marriage contract trustees claimed the £4000 under her father's settlement. No claim was lodged by A's testamentary trustees. Held, in an action for legitim at the instance of A's testamentary trustees (1) that the marriage contract being res inter alios, the defender was not entitled to found on it as implying election; (2) that no claim had been made in the multiplepinding by A's testamentary trustees; and (3) that, as the claim for legitim had not been discharged or satisfied, the pursuer was entitled to recover it.

Essential error—Error in law.

A daughter, who had intimated to her father's trustees her election to take legitim in place of her testamentary provisions, in the belief that her right to the whole legitim fund was admitted by the trustees, of whom her brother was one, subsequently, when her brother declared his intention to dispute her right to more than half of the legitim fund, withdrew her election and claimed her testamentary provisions. Held that she was not barred from doing so. Opinion (per Lord Shand, 14 R., at p. 759) that, even if the error had been one of law, and whether induced by another or not, the daughter would have been entitled to withdraw her election.

(1496)

Circumstances in which held that a widow had not made a final and irrevocable election between her rights under her antenuptial marriage contract and those under her husband's will, and that, even if what she had said and done amounted to election, it might be recalled, because made under error, and without independent legal advice.

(1497)

Ignorance of rights—No independent agent—Undue haste.

Decree of reduction of a deed of election by a widow granted, the Court holding (1) that, considering that the widow's liferent provision was to cease in the event of her entering into a second marriage, and that there was nothing in the circumstances of the trust to require an early decision, she had been prematurely called upon to make her election; (2) that though no fraud or intentional misstatement by the trustees had been established, the information upon which she made her election was in fact inadequate; and (3) that, in the circumstances, the trustees should have insisted on her having an independent law agent.

(1498)

—Acceptance of certain articles and payments.

A testator left his son his household furniture and the income of half the residue of his estate. Held that the son was not barred from claiming legitim by the mere fact that he had accepted delivery of the furniture and payment of a few sums out of the income of the estate.

5. EFFECT OF ELECTION.(1) APPLICATION OF SURRENDERED SHARE.*(a) Forfeiture or Equitable Compensation.

(1501)

General rule.

Where, under a general settlement of a father's estate, a provision is expressly given to a child in satisfaction of legitim, legitim cannot be claimed either in whole or in part without a complete surrender of the provision. But where the provision is not stated to be in full of legitim, and there is no express condition or declaration of forfeiture, the child's claiming and receiving legitim will not infer entire forfeiture of the testamentary provision, but only equitable compensation to those prejudiced by his claim.

Macfarlane's Trustees v Oliver, 1882, 9 R. 1133; 19 S.L.R. 850.

Testamentary provision to child not declared to be in full of legal rights—Equitable compensation.

A testator made provision by way of life-ent for his daughter by general settlement, but did not declare the provision in full of legitim, or otherwise exclude the claim. The daughter claimed and received legitim. The trustees thereafter accumulated the income otherwise payable to the daughter, until they had restored to the estate the amount withdrawn for her legitim, and compensated the beneficiaries injured by the withdrawal. Held (by a majority of the whole Court) that, there being no declaration of forfeiture of the testamentary provision in the event of legitim being claimed, and no express exclusion of legitim, none such was to be implied beyond what was necessary to give effect to the settlement, and that after the amount of legitim, with interest, was restored to the estate, the daughter was entitled to the life interest bequeathed to her for the remainder of her life.

Macfarlane's Trustees v Oliver, 1882, 9 R. 1133; 19 S.L.R. 850.

Testamentary provision declared to be "in full of legal rights"—Forfeiture.

A testatrix, by her trust disposition and settlement, made certain provisions for her son, which were declared to be "in full of" his legal rights. The son claimed legitim. Held (by a majority of seven judges) that, by electing to claim legitim, the son had finally lost all right to the conventional provisions in his favour, even though, by the operation of equitable compensation, the estate should afterwards be restored against the loss occasioned by the claim of legitim.

(1504)

By a general settlement a husband made certain provisions for his wife which, he declared, should be "in full of all her claims of terce, jus relictæ, and others legally competent to her" against his estate, but there was no declaration that the provisions should be forfeited if she claimed her legal rights. Question, whether her election not to accept the provisions of the settlement in her favour, but to claim her legal rights, resulted in her forfeiting her testamentary provisions finally, or merely gave rise to a claim of equitable compensation to the estate.

Jacks's Trustees v Jacks, 1913 S.C. 815; 50 S.L.R. 536; 1913, 1 S.L.T. 341.

—Whether declaration applicable to gifts in codicil—Disposal of forfeited share.

A testatrix, by the second purpose of her trust disposition and settlement, directed her trustees, on her death, to convey to her son a capital sum. By the fifth purpose she bequeathed to him her household furniture, and by the sixth purpose she directed her trustees to pay to him the whole free annual income from the residue of her estate. By the seventh and eighth purposes the trustees were directed, on the death of the son, to divide and pay the residue among his children and the issue of predeceasers, whom failing, among certain charities. The trust purposes were followed by a declaration that "the foregoing provision in favour of my said son shall be accepted and held by him in full satisfaction of his claim of legitim." By a codicil the bequest of capital contained in the second purpose of the trust disposition and settlement was revoked, and in lieu thereof the trustees were directed to invest the amount in their own names, and to pay the free income to the testatrix's son during his lifetime, and, on his death, to divide the capital among his issue, whom failing, among certain named beneficiaries. On the testatrix's death the son, her only child, claimed and was paid his legitim. Held (1) that the declaration in the trust disposition and settlement applied to the whole provisions in favour of the son contained in both the trust disposition and the codicil, and accordingly that, by claiming legitim, the son had finally lost all right to the testamentary provisions in his favour; and (2) that the income of the residue did not fall to be disposed of as residue in terms of the seventh and eighth purposes of the trust disposition and settlement, but was intestate estate of the testatrix; and accordingly that, after the estate had been compensated for the sum withdrawn to meet the claim of legitim, the income fell to be paid to the son as his mother's heir.

(1506)

Clause of forfeiture—Annuity payable out of forfeited share.

A testatrix directed her trustees to hold four-tenths of her estate for her son in liferent, and on his death to pay to his widow out of the income of the four-tenths an annuity of £100. There was a provision in the will that the son should forfeit for himself and his issue all claim to any share of the estate in the event of his claiming his legal rights. The son died shortly after the testatrix, and his representatives claimed his legal rights. Held that the widow's annuity was not forfeited.

Gunn's Trustees v Macfarlane, (O.H.) 1897, 4 S.L.T. 334.

(b) Disposal of Forfeited Interest.

(1507)

Gift of liferent to child—Forfeiture of liferent—Right of other beneficiaries.

A testator directed his trustees to invest a sum of £3500 for the children of his son R, nominatim, and any other children that might be born to him, payable on the death of their father; and till his death to pay the income to him for the maintenance of himself and the maintenance and education of his children; and the testator expressed his desire that the trustees should secure that the children should receive a good education. It was declared that the provision in favour of the son should be alimentary and that the provisions were in full of legal rights. The son claimed his legitim. Held (1) that he had forfeited his right of liferent, (2) that the children had no such independent interest therein as would entitle them to claim, and (3) that it was payable to the beneficiaries, who were prejudiced by the father receiving his legitim.

Jack v Marshall, 1879, 6 R. 543; 16 S.L.R. 326.

A testator directed his trustees to divide the residue of his estate into three equal portions, one-third to be paid to the children of a deceased daughter, another third to another daughter, whom failing, her issue, and the remaining third to be held by the trustees for a third daughter in liferent and her issue in fee. These provisions in favour of daughters and grandchildren were declared to be in satisfaction of legitim. The third daughter claimed legitim and thus forfeited her right of liferent, but her children's right of fee was not forfeited. Held that the income of the share of residue destined to the daughter who claimed legitim fell to be applied in compensating the beneficiaries who had suffered through legitim being claimed.

(1509)

—Heritable subjects conveyed to child in liferent and his issue in fee—Forfeiture of liferent—Right of residuary legatees.

A testator in his mortis causa settlement directly conveyed specific subjects to his children in liferent alienarily, and to certain of his grandchildren in fee, conveying the remainder of his estate to trustees, with directions to divide the free residue among his grandchildren. Three of his children repudiated the settlement and claimed legitim. Held (1) that they thereby forfeited the liferents; (2) that the fiars did not on that account at once take the fee free from the burden of the liferents; (3) that the liferents thus set free did not go to the heir ab intestato; but (4) that they went to the residuary legatees who were injured by the claim for legitim.

Davidson's Trustees v Davidson, 1871, 9 M. 995; 8 S.L.R. 646.

(1510)

Clause of forfeiture containing destination of income—Forfeiture of liferent—Power to trustees to accumulate income.

A testator who was survived by seven children directed his trustees to divide the residue among all his children, and declared that if any of them should repudiate the settlement and claim their legal rights such child should forfeit all share in the estate which the testator might dispose of by law, and that "the share or shares of such child or children shall in that event accrete and belong equally to my other children or their issue." By a codicil the testator directed his trustees, instead of paying over her share to one of his daughters, to hold that share for her behoof and to pay her the income, "or in their discretion to pay and apply the said income or so much thereof as they may consider necessary for her behoof"; and he directed that on the daughter's death the share of residue "and any accumulations of income thereon in the hands of the trustees" should be divided among the daughter's children then alive and the issue of predeceasers. The daughter claimed her legal rights and forfeited her testamentary provisions, but her children's right of fee was not forfeited. Held that in spite of the discretionary power to accumulate the income of the daughter's share for her children, the whole of that income was carried during her lifetime to her brothers and sisters by the destination over in the forfeiture clause.

(1511)

———Forfeiture of liferent and fee on life-rentrix claiming legitim.

A testator directed his trustees to pay a sum of £2000 to his son and to hold the residue of his estate for his two married daughters in liferent and their "heirs and successors equally amongst them" in fee. These provisions were declared to be in full of any claims they might have against the testator's estate after his death. The testator provided that in the event of any child creating any dispute in regard to his will, the child so acting should forfeit all rights competent to him thereunder, and the trustees were directed to deal with such child's share, if it were a daughter's share, as follows:—"To hold the half of such share for behoof of my other daughter in liferent, and pay the fee of the same to her heirs as aforesaid, and pay and make over the other half to my said son and his heirs." A daughter claimed legitim, and the rights of herself and her heirs and successors under the settlement were thereby forfeited. Held that the repudiated share of residue fell to be divided in terms of the deed among the beneficiaries who had not repudiated.

(1512)

———Child claiming legitim—Clause of forfeiture of interest of issue—Right of child to plead clause of forfeiture—Intestacy.

A testator directed the residue of his estate to be held by his trustees, who were to pay annual allowances to his children during their lives, and after their death to pay the capital, and any accumulations, to the lawful issue of his children, and, failing lawful issue of any of his children, then to the lawful issue of the survivors or survivor, equally among them per stirpes. He further declared that any child repudiating the above provisions should forfeit for him or herself, and his or her issue, all right and interest under the settlement; and that the provisions made for the child or children so repudiating, and their issue, should pass to and be held for the child or children abiding by the settlement, and their issue. The trust's only surviving child who attained majority, a daughter, while still unmarried, repudiated the settlement. Held (1) that, having done so, she was not entitled to found on the declaration as to the forfeiture of the right and interest of her possible issue, to the effect of throwing the dead's part into intestacy, and herself taking as heir ab intestato; and (2) that as the clause of forfeiture was in favour of children who did not repudiate, and their issue, and as no such persons existed, the clause did not take effect, and that the residue must be retained by the trustees for behoof of any issue that might be born to the daughter.

Gillies v Gillies' Trustees, 1881, 8 R. 505; 18 S.L.R. 323.

(1513)

Annuity to widow—Claim for jus relictæ—Disposal of annuity between liferenters and fiars.

A testator, who died survived by a widow and family, by his settlement provided his widow in an annuity of £900, and left the residue of his estate, including the capital set aside to secure the provision to his widow, to his three daughters in liferent and to their children in fee. The settlement declared that its provisions should be in satisfaction to the widow of jus relictæ. The widow having claimed jus relictæ and received £27,000, one-third of the moveable estate, held that the annuity of £900 fell to be applied in compensating those prejudiced by the widow's claim in proportion to their loss.

Claims by the daughters for one-third share each of the liferent of the capital sum required to secure the £900 annuity were disallowed, and the Court found that each annual instalment of £900 should be apportioned between the daughters as liferenters and their children as fiars in the proportion of the losses respectively sustained by them through the widow's claim.

Widow rejecting testamentary provision and claiming liferent of lands under inter vivos trust—Son entitled to liferent of lands—Right of son to surrogatum out of income of testamentary estate.

A husband by trust disposition and settlement gave his widow a liferent of the residue of the testamentary trust estate, and in respect thereof "recommended" and "enjoined" her "to discharge or abstain from exacting" from a son of the marriage her liferent right in certain lands under a previous inter vivos trust deed. This deed gave to the son, on his surviving his mother, an alimentary liferent of the lands. The widow having elected to take the liferent of the lands, held (by Lord Mure, Ordinary, and acquiesced in) that the son was entitled during his mother's life to payment of an equivalent provision out of the annual proceeds of the residue as a surrogatum for the liferent of the lands.

Compensation out of heritable estate destined to son—Son claiming legitim.

By a universal settlement a testator conveyed his heritable estate to his widow in trust, for behoof of herself in liferent and of his son in fee. He conveyed his whole moveable estate to his widow absolutely. The son having claimed legitim, the widow raised an action against him for declarator that the heritable estate belonged to her in fee simple. The Court appointed the son to state in a minute whether he averred that the value of his interest in the heritable estate, subject to the pursuer's liferent, exceeded the value of his legitim with the interest accrued thereon, and the son having lodged a minute stating that he did not make this averment, the Court held that the pursuer was entitled to the lands in fee simple to compensate her pro tanto for the loss which she had sustained in consequence of the defender's election.

Compensation out of capital to liferentrix—Alimentary provision to wife out of income.

A testator directed his trustees to pay the income of three-fifths of his estate to his widow for her liferent alimentary use and to pay the income of the remaining two-fifths to his children during her life, and on her death to divide the whole trust fund equally among the children then surviving and the issue of predeceasers. These provisions were declared to be in full of jus relictae and legitim. Owing to the character of the investments the legitim fund extended to one-half of the estate. The children having claimed legitim, held (1) that the trustees were not entitled to encroach annually on the capital of the half of the estate remaining in their hands to the extent required to pay the widow a sum equal to the income of three-fifths of the whole estate; and (2) that the question whether her representatives could claim to be compensated from capital for her loss of income due to the claim would not arise until her death.

Son claiming legitim not a beneficiary under settlement—Provisions to son's issue forfeited—Resulting loss to liferentrix.

A testator left the free income of his estate to his widow for behoof of the children of the testator's son James in liferent and their issue in fee. The testator further provided that in the event of James impugning the settlement the provisions in favour of his children and their issue should be cancelled and the testator's wife should have right to dispose of the difference between the sum paid to James in name of legitim, and the one-fourth share of the estate destined to James' children. James, who was not a beneficiary under the will, claimed legitim, and the amount of his legitim was larger than one-fourth of the residue. Held that the testator's wife was not entitled to equitable compensation out of the capital of the estate for the loss of income caused to her by James electing to claim legitim.

Hood's Trustees v Hood, (O.H.) 1905, 13 S.L.T. 564.

(1520)

Beneficiary prejudiced by election entitled to compensation—Heritage specially destined to sons subjected to terce.

Heritable properties specially destined to a testator's sons became subject to terce in consequence of the testator's widow claiming her legal rights. Held that the sons were entitled to equitable compensation.

Dallas' Trustees v Dallas, (O.H.) 1905, 13 S.L.T. 332.

(1521)

Whether party actually prejudiced.

A trustor directed his trustees to hold a portion of his estate for the liferent behoof of one of his daughters who was married and had issue, under deduction of a sum advanced by him on behalf of the said daughter and her son. This advance was to form part of the free residue, and on the death of the said daughter the trustees were to divide amongst her children in certain proportions the moneys held for her in liferent. The daughter claimed legitim, and it was held by the Court (see No. 1527, infra) that the income of the share of residue destined to her and her family vested in the trustees, and was to be applied by them in compensation of the legitim received by her and that her children had a separate and independent interest in the fee of the provision. In a question as to the appropriation of the income of the share of residue held by the trustees the Court found that the daughter's legitim had suffered abatement in consequence of the advance above mentioned being imputed to it, and that the share of residue falling to the children was thereby enlarged to a greater extent than it was diminished by the withdrawal of legitim, and therefore held that the children were not entitled to any portion of the income.

Whether party actually prejudiced—Bequest of share of free residue.

A testatrix left the free residue of her estate to be divided into three shares and held for her three sons A, B, and C in life-rent, and their children in fee, one share to each son and his children, these provisions being declared to be in full of all their claims against her estate. She was survived by A, B, and C, and by three daughters. The three daughters claimed legitim. A repudiated the settlement and also claimed legitim. B and C accepted the provisions in their favour. Before any division of the estate had been made, A and B died without issue, and the shares provided for them and their children fell into intestacy. In a multipointing raised to ascertain the rights of the parties, C contended that he and his children were entitled to the share of the residue bequeathed to them without any deduction being made to meet the claims for legitim, or alternatively that they were entitled to receive as equitable compensation out of the sum set free by the death of his brothers without issue, such a sum as would make his and his children's share equal to what it would have been before the residue was reduced by payments of legitim. Held that the free residue of the testator's estate consisted of what remained after the claims for legitim had been satisfied, and that if C and his children got their share of the free residue as ascertained, they got all that the will gave them, and thus no room was left for the application of the principle of equitable compensation.

Gunn's Trustees v Macfarlane, 1900, 37 S.L.R. 499.

Legitim claimed by all children—Interest of one child not sufficient to make equitable compensation—Effect on equitable compensation by others.

A testator left the residue of his estate to his five children equally among them and the survivors in life-rent and their respective issue in fee. All the children claimed legitim, and one child, A, died before the estate had been fully compensated in respect of the sum paid to her as legitim. Held that a child B was not entitled to ascribe in compensation of the sum paid to her as legitim any of the life-rent destined to her by the survivorship clause until full compensation had been made to the ultimate heirs in respect of the legitim paid to A.

Clark v Clark's Trustees, (O.H.) 1905, 13 S.L.T. 694.

(1524)

Computation of equitable compensation—Gift to daughter in life-rent and issue in fee—Daughter claiming legitim—Advances to daughter's issue both before and after opening of life-rent—Interest on advances.

A testator, who died in 1882, left the residue of his estate to be life-rented after the death of his widow, to whom he bequeathed an annuity, by his five daughters in equal shares, and to go in fee to their children. A daughter claimed and received legitim, reserving in the discharge her right under the trust disposition after compensation. The income of the trust left a large surplus after meeting the annuity to the widow. Certain advances were made towards the maintenance of the trust's grandchildren out of the surplus income undisposed of. The widow died in 1893, and in 1906 the daughter claimed the life-rent of a share of the residue on the ground that compensation for the withdrawal of her legitim had been fully made. She maintained that the whole amount of her children's said advances should be debited against their interest in the capital of the trust funds. The trustees maintained that these should be charged against the annual income which would have fallen to the daughter had she not elected to take her legitim. Held that in estimating to what extent compensation to the estate had been made, the advances for the maintenance of the grandchildren both up to the widow's death and thereafter fell to be charged against the capital falling to the grandchildren; but that the daughter was not entitled to be credited with anything as interest on those advances, the trust having de facto received no interest.

Main v Clark's Trustees, 1909, 47 S.L.R. 118; 1909, 2 S.L.T. 375.

Expenses — Litigation between father's trustees and son's creditors as to son's right to elect.

In February, 1891, A, whose estates were then sequestrated in bankruptcy, granted to his father a discharge of his claim to legitim. In March, 1891, the father died, leaving a trust disposition and settlement by which he directed his trustees to pay a life-rent alimentary provision to A. The trustee in A's bankruptcy then claimed A's legitim from his father's trustees, and the father's trustees having put forward A's discharge in answer to the claim, the trustee in bankruptcy brought an action against the father's trustees for reduction of the discharge and for payment of A's legitim. The father's trustees lodged defences, and the action was ultimately compromised by the father's trustees paying to the trustee in bankruptcy about half of the estimated amount of A's legitim, the trustee in bankruptcy assigning his claim to A's legitim to the father's trustees, and each side paying its own expenses. In 1899 A brought an action against his father's trustees for an accounting, and for payment of the alimentary life-rent provided to him in his father's settlement. He averred that the amount paid to the trustee in his bankruptcy had been compensated by the amount of the life-rent provision hitherto retained by the defenders. Held that as the father's trustees had litigated with the trustee in A's bankruptcy in the interest of all the trust beneficiaries, the amount of the expenses incurred by them in that litigation did not fall to be compensated out of A's liferent provision, but was a charge against the trust estate generally.

Paton v Paton's Trustees, 1903, 5 F. 528; 40 S.L.R. 402; 10 S.L.T. 707.

Equitable compensation not completed—Right of fiar to immediate payment—Contingent rights of liferentrix.

A trustor directed her trustees to hold the residue of her estate for behoof of her daughter in liferent and her grandchildren in fee, with an express declaration that the fee should vest a morte testatoris. The daughter claimed legitim, and, on receiving it, discharged her liferent. Upon the fiars coming of age, they claimed immediate payment of the estate, and the daughter maintained that the trust must be kept up during her lifetime to meet the possibility that the liferent might revive by the accumulations of income exceeding the legitim. Held that as the estate vested a morte testatoris, and as there was no probability that the accumulations of income would equal the amount of the legitim, either during the probable lifetime of the daughter or during the twenty-one years allowed for accumulation of income by the Thellusson Act, the fiars were entitled to succeed.

Lee's Trustees v Fingzies, (O.H.) 1896, 34 S.L.R. 613; 4 S.L.T. 227.

(2) LIFERENT TO PARENT AND FEE TO CHILDREN—EFFECT OF PARENT'S REPUDIATION ON CHILDREN'S RIGHTS.

(1527)

Parent claiming legitim.

A testator directed his trustees to hold a third of his residuary estate for the liferent behoof of a daughter (who was married, and had issue), under deduction of the sum advanced by him, and to divide between and among her children "after named the moneys held for her liferent behoof as aforesaid, and that in the following proportions:— . . . the legacies to my said grandchildren being intended to vest at my death." The trustor further declared "that the provisions in favour of my daughters and grandchildren hereinbefore written shall be accepted by them . . . in full satisfaction to them of all legitim, bairns' part of gear, or any other claim competent to them on my death." The third daughter claimed legitim. Held that the children had a separate and independent interest in the fee of the provision, and that their interest was not affected by their mother's election to claim legitim.

A testator, who was survived by seven children, directed his trustees to divide the residue of his estate equally among all his children, and declared that, if any of them should repudiate the settlement and claim their legal rights, such child should forfeit all share in the estate which the testator might dispose of by law, and that "the share or shares of such child or children shall in that event accresce and belong equally to my other children or their issue."

By a codicil, the testator directed his trustees, instead of paying over her share to one of his daughters, to hold that share for her behoof and to pay her the income thereof, "or, in their discretion, to pay and apply the said income or so much thereof as they may consider necessary for her behoof"; and he directed that on the death of that daughter "the share of residue retained as aforesaid, and any accumulations of income thereon in the hands of my trustees, shall be equally divided among the children of my said daughter then alive, and the issue of any who may have predeceased per stirpes." The daughter, who had children, having claimed her legal rights and thereby forfeited the testamentary provisions in her favour, held (1) that, as the gift of the fee of the daughter's share to her children was a separate and independent bequest, it was not affected by the forfeiture of her liferent interest in that share; (2) that, in spite of the discretionary power to accumulate the income of the daughter's share for her children, the whole of that income was carried during her lifetime to her brothers and sisters by the destination over in the forfeiture clause.

—Liferent to parent for maintenance of his children—Fee to children.

A testator directed his trustees to invest a sum for behoof of the children, nominatim, of a son and of any children that might be born to him, payable on the death of their father, and till his death to pay to him the income for the maintenance of himself, and the maintenance and education of his children; and he desired the trustees to secure that the children should receive a good education. It was declared that the provisions should be in full of legal rights. The son having claimed his legitim, held that though the grandchildren had an independent right to the fee of the provision, which was not forfeited by the act of their parent, they had no independent interest in the income, which was accordingly forfeited.

(1530)

—"Share" construed to include rights of fee and liferent.

A testator, who was survived by six children, directed his trustees to divide the residue of his estate into six equal shares, one share to be paid to his son "Peter and his heirs," one share to his daughter Mary Ann and her heirs, one share to his son James and his heirs, and,

"with regard to the three remaining shares," one share to be held and applied for behoof of each of his three other children, John, Alexander, and Duncan, and their children, whom failing, their other next of kin as thereafter directed. The testator further provided that in the event of any of his children claiming their legal provisions such children should forfeit all right to any "share or shares" of that part of his estate, which the testator could dispose of by law, and that the shares of such children should accresce to the children who should abide by the settlement, any shares accrescing to John, Alexander, or Duncan to be held by the trustees for their liferent use alienarily and their issue in fee. John declined to accept the provision made for him, and claimed legitim. Held that on a construction of the whole settlement the word "share" was throughout used in the sense of an aliquot sixth part of the residue, and that John by his repudiation forfeited not only his own rights under the deed, but also those of his issue or other next of kin.

Clause of forfeiture applying to issue — Child claiming legitim.

A testator directed the trustees under his settlement to pay over a sum of £2000 to his son, and to hold the residue of his estate for behoof of his two married daughters in liferent, and their "heirs and successors equally amongst them" in fee; declaring that these provisions should be in full to them of any claims they might have against his estate after his death, "and that in the event of any of my children creating any dispute in regard to these presents, the child so acting shall forfeit all claims competent to him or her under the same, and my trustees are hereby directed to deal with such child's share in the event of it being that falling to my son in the same manner as I have appointed in regard to the residue of my means and estate, and in the event of its being in regard to the share conceived in favour of either of my daughters, then to hold the half of such share for behoof of my other daughter in liferent, and pay the fee of the same to her heirs as aforesaid, and to pay and make over the other half to my said son and his heirs." One of the daughters repudiated the provisions in her favour and claimed legitim. Held that on a construction of the special terms of the deeds the daughter by her repudiation forfeited not only her own rights under the settlement but those of her heirs and successors.

(1532)

Revocation of provision in favour of one of children—Claim for legitim by that child—Effect on provision for issue of child.

A testator directed his trustees to hold and convey one-fourth of the residue of his estate for behoof of his son John in liferent, and John's children in fee, and made similar provisions in favour of his sons Thomas and George, and their children, and provided the remaining one-fourth part to the children of his deceased son James. The settlement contained this declaration—"Declaring that in the event of any of my said sons or their descendants repudiating this settlement, or by any means preventing it from taking effect in whole or in part, then such sons, as well as their descendants, shall forfeit their whole right and interest in those portions of my means and estate that I am entitled to dispose of, which right and interest shall in that event accresce and belong to such of my sons, the said John, Thomas, and George, and their descendants, and the descendants of my son James, as shall abide by this settlement and accept of the provisions herein contained." By codicil the testator revoked the liferent provision of one-fourth share in favour of his son John, and instead directed his trustees to hold and apply the said share for behoof of John's children, "and with this alteration I confirm the said trust disposition and settlement in every respect." John claimed and received payment of legitim. Held that the right to the portion of the trust estate bequeathed to John's children by the trust disposition and codicil had not been forfeited by John having claimed and received payment of his legitim.

I. CONSTITUTION OF ESTATES OF SUPERIOR AND VASSAL.

1. GENERALLY.

(1)
Obligation to give land to feuars—Non-enforceable obligation.
The superior of a village bound himself in a contract with feuars and intending feuars to make streets and a market-place, and to give each feuar a patch of moor ground. The contract further contained the following clause :—“[The superior] is also to give each feuar or tenant patches of arable or improved land, at an adequate rent, with access thereto.” Held that the obligation to give arable land was not so expressed as to give the feuars the power of enforcing it.

Lord Clinton v Brown, 1874, 1 R. 1137; 11 S.L.R. 665.

Verbal contract followed by rei interventus—Receipts for feu-duty.

A proprietor of land entered into a verbal contract to feu, and upon receiving the first term's feu-duty granted a holograph receipt, which contained a note of the extent of the ground feued and the amount of the feu-duty. The vassal entered into possession of the ground, and built certain erections on a part of it, and continued to pay feu-duty to the proprietor and his representatives, for which he obtained receipts as for "feu-duty," but these subsequent receipts were not holograph. Held that a contract of feu had been constituted effectual against the superior and his representatives.

Stodart v Dalzell, 1876, 4 R. 236; 14 S.L.R. 164.

—Agreement as to subjects to be feued and rate of feu-duty.

Where two parties, who had been negotiating with reference to a feu, were at variance as to whether the feu was to be subject to certain building restrictions, a matter vital to the contract in the view of both parties, held that the alleged vassal was not entitled to declarator that a binding verbal agreement to feu had been entered into, on proof by writing that the parties had agreed as to the subject to be feued and the feu-duty payable, and that the agreement had been followed by rei interventus.

Kerr v Forrest's Trustees, (O.H.) 1902, 10 S.L.T. 67.

Pro indiviso right to commonalty accessory to feus — Vassal possessing divided lot without title—Right of superior to remove possessor.

A superior in 1679 feued out a town site in forty-five steadings, giving each feuar right to a proportional pro indiviso part of certain waste lands in the neighbourhood. In 1750 the feuars divided among them by agreement a portion of the commonalty, and in 1808 a process of division of the remainder was brought, in which a scheme of division was settled and acted on, though decree was never pronounced. Thereafter the titles to many of the divided lots were feudalised, but others continued to be held on the former pro indiviso titles, as defined by the possession of a divided portion. Held in 1886 that the superior, in virtue of his title of superiority, was entitled to remove the possessor of one of the divided lots of the commonalty, who could not produce a title thereto or connect himself with a holder of one of the pro indiviso rights, though it was proved that the lot had been in possession of him and his predecessors since 1818.

Edmonstone v Jeffray, 1886, 13 R. 1038; 23 S.L.R. 646.

(5)

Superior's title in question with vassal—Onus of proof.

Macdougall v Earl of Breadalbane, 1881,

8 R. (H.L.) 92; 18 S.L.R. 748, No. 106, infra.

Earl of Loudoun v Morton, 1909 S.C. 880; 46 S.L.R. 519; 1909, 1 S.L.T. 462, No. 107, infra.

Feu ultra vires of granter—Reduction by successor in feu—Title to sue.

A feu granted by trustees in 1867 was sold by the vassal in 1888 to A, who recorded the disposition in his favour in the Register of Sasines, and thereby obtained an implied entry. In 1895 A raised an action against the trustees for reduction of the feu charter, on the ground that it was ultra vires of the trustees. Held that the ground of reduction stated was not relevant, in respect (1) that the pursuer, if prejudiced, was not prejudiced by the feu charter, but by the contract he had made with the original vassal, to which the trustees were not parties; (2) that the pursuer, being an entered vassal, was not entitled to reduce the feu contract without clearing the record of the disposition in his favour.

—Disposition in security—Power to security holder to sell or feu the estate—Feu granted by disponent without concurrence of security holder—Disposition by security holder of dominium utile of feu—Validity.

The proprietor of an estate, which was burdened with a disposition in security containing power to the security holder to sell or feu the estate in whole or in part, granted a feu charter of 18 acres of the estate, at a feu-duty of £274, without obtaining the concurrence of the security holder. Thereafter the security holder, professing to act under his power of sale, disposed to a purchaser these 18 acres "to the extent of the dominium utile only," but under the burdens contained in the before-mentioned feu charter, and in particular under burden of payment of the feu-duty of £274 to the superior. In a competition as to the right to the 18 acres between the successor of the original feuar and the disponee of the security holder, the Court granted decree in favour of the successor of the original feuar, holding that the disposition of the dominium utile of the feu by the security holder was ineffectual, in respect that no one could acquire right to the dominium utile under the feu charter as a distinct estate except by disposition from the vassal infeft under the charter.

Alston v Nellfield Manure and Chemical Co., 1915 S.C. 912; 52 S.L.R. 730; 1915, 2 S.L.T. 50.

(8)

—Prescription.

Question, whether a feu charter granted by trustees in 1867, and bearing to be granted in the exercise of powers conferred by a private Act of Parliament (which was mentioned), and only in so far as consistent with the Act, could be validated by prescriptive possession, so as to exclude the plea that it was ultra vires of the trustees in respect that the conditions of the Act had not been complied with.

—Udal lands in feudal form—Superior's author obtaining Crown charter subsequent to constitution of vassal's right—Liability of vassal to casualty.

The proprietors of certain lands in Shetland held the lands by a long progress of titles in feudal form, and subject to an annual payment to the grantor and his successors under the name of feu-duty. The present successor of the grantor raised an action for payment of a casualty of composition against the present holders of the lands. The pursuer founded upon a decree of judicial sale of date 1774, by which the superiority of the lands was awarded to his ancestor, and upon a Crown charter of resignation and confirmation of the superiority in 1857, both subsequent to the grant of the lands to the defenders' authors. Held that the casualty was not due, in respect that the pursuer's authors had no feudal title at the date when the lands were conveyed to the defenders' authors, and, the original grant being of udal lands, the position and obligations of the defenders and their authors could not be affected or the feudal burdens imposed by subsequent charter from the Crown.

Spence v Union Bank of Scotland, (O.H.) 1894, 31 S.L.R. 904; 1 S.L.T. 648.

Error in records—Plan incorrect as to superior's obligation to make roads—Common error—Partial reduction of a feu contract.

By a feu contract the grantor became bound to form certain roads on the ground disposed, in so far as delineated and tinged brown on a plan appended to the contract. On the plan appended a number of other roads were by mistake also tinged brown. The feu contract, with the erroneously coloured plan, was duly recorded. None of the parties to the contract observed the blunder at the time of signing, and it was not discovered until some years afterwards, when the ground had been sold by the original vassals to a building company. The company then raised an action against the superior for payment of the cost of forming the roads erroneously tinged brown on the plan, and the superior brought an action against the company for reduction of the feu contract, in so far as it imported an obligation on him to form these roads. Held that as the original feu contract was not intended to impose an obligation to make the roads in question on the superior, and as the company in contracting with the vassals did not stipulate for and did not understand that they were getting such an obligation, the mere fact that such an obligation erroneously appeared in the feu contract and in the record did not entitle the company, though bona fide purchasers for value, to object to the Court rectifying the feu contract and the records. Observed (per Lord Young) that one purchasing on the faith of the records is not entitled to rely on the validity or subsistence of such incidental obligations as an obligation to make roads although appearing on the records undischarged.

Glasgow Feuing and Building Co. v Watson's Trustees, 1887, 14 R. 610; 24 S.L.R. 429.

Extent of grant—Tenendas clause.

Opinion (per Lord Justice-Clerk Moncreiff) that the rule that the tenendas clause may only be looked at to interpret the meaning of a grant or to specify pertinents is not to be so strictly applied in feu charters from subject superiors as it is in Crown charters.

Lord Advocate v M'Culloch, 1874, 2 R. 27; 12 S.L.R. 1.

Whether teinds conveyed to vassal.

A proprietor separately infeft in lands and the teinds thereof feued part of the lands as possessed by a tenant, excepting from the warrandice "cess, teind, and other public burdens" imposed or to be imposed on said lands. The feuar possessed the teinds, and was localised on for stipend in various localities. Held that the feu-contract had conveyed the teinds to the vassal.

Disposition of superiority—Disposer vested with mid-superiority of part under separate titles—Whether carried by terms of disposition.

In a joint deed of disposition A and B conveyed five parcels of land, declaring that the dominium directum only of these lands was conveyed. In four of these parcels the disponents were immediate superiors under the Crown, the dominium utile belonging to another. In the fifth, B was immediate superior under the Crown, and, in addition, had completed a title to the dominium utile by a writ of clare constat from himself as immediate lawful superior; part of this parcel he had feued out to a railway company, and thus split the dominium utile into an estate of mid-superiority in himself, and an estate of fee in the railway company. In the disposition four of the parcels conveyed were specifically described, the fifth was conveyed under the general terms "all other lands and others" in a certain county, parts of a certain estate. Held that the deed of disposition in conveying the dominium directum was not meant to convey, and did not convey, the mid-superiority of the ground feued to the railway company.

 —Whether “right and privilege” included right to a loaning—Jus quæsitum tertio—Res inter alios acta.

On 19th August, 1723, the proprietor of the barony of Struie granted feus of four portions thereof to different persons—(1) The wester half of Mains of Struie, with the privileges and haill pertinents thereof as marched from the other half, “with half of the right and privilege of the loan leading to and from that hill belonging to the haill Mains of Struie called Douchrie,” about six hundred yards distant, “according as the said loan lies meithed and marched betwixt the lands of Whitehill and Baulk of Struie.”

(2) The easter half of Mains of Struie described in the same way, mutatis mutandis. (3) Whitehill, “reserving the loan belonging to the Mains of Struie leading to the hill of the said Mains called Dochrie, as the said loan lies and is meithed and marched betwixt the lands of Whitehill and lands of Baulk of Struie, in which space the said loan is not to be cast upon by the possessors of Mains of Struie.” (4) Baulk of Struie, “reserving the loan” in similar terms. In 1889 the proprietors of the wester half of Mains of Struie, who had also acquired right from the proprietor of the easter half to the latter’s right to the hill of Dochrie, and to the loan, brought an action against the proprietor of Whitehill and Baulk for declarator that the pursuer had the right of property in the loan. The defender maintained that it belonged to himself, or, alternatively, to the superior, who, however, had no right of access to the loan. There was no trustworthy evidence of possession, the whole lands having been possessed together in tenancy for upwards of forty years. Held on a construction of the titles, aided by an estate plan dated in 1842, which showed Whitehill and Baulk as non-contiguous, and included the loaning within the boundary lines of Struie and Dochrie (1) that it was not to be presumed that the property in the loaning had been retained by the superior; (2) that the property in the loaning had not been given out to Whitehill and Baulk; and (3) that the phrase “right and privilege” was sufficient to carry it with Mains of Struie.

A right of trout fishing, apart from possession of land, is not a feudal estate, and a grant of such right creates merely a personal obligation upon the grantor, and will not affect singular successors.

Prescription of right to hold of the Crown.

The vassal in possession of certain lands, held under a lord of erection, in 1818 obtained from the Crown a charter of confirmation, and in 1841 a charter of resignation and confirmation, which bore that the lands were to be holden of the Sovereign as immediate lawful superior—coming in place of the monastery and abbey of Melrose by virtue of the Acts of Annexation—for a reddendo of 10s. Scots, payable to the Crown or its donatory, the lord of erection. The vassal for the prescriptive period paid to the lord of erection £3 10s. Scots, which was the reddendo stipulated in a charter of the lands granted in 1627 by the lord of erection, and on which various writs by progress had followed down to 1776. No vassal had entered with the lord of erection, as superior, after 1776. The lord of erection having raised an action against the vassal for payment of a casualty, as having been impliedly entered with him as superior in 1874, the vassal pleaded that he had prescribed a right to hold of the Crown, and explained the payment made by him as being a payment to the donatory of the Crown under the Crown charter. The discrepancy between the sum actually paid and the reddendo in that charter he explained by producing a correspondence in 1866 between the agents of the parties, from which it appeared that a question having then been raised as to whether the reddendo was £3 10s., or 10s. Scots annually, the vassal agreed to pay the larger sum rather than raise any question. From that correspondence it appeared that the pursuer’s agents were then made aware of the existence of the Crown charter, and claimed the payments as due to their client as lord of erection and donatory of the Crown, not as feudal superior. Held that the vassal had by prescription obtained right to hold of the Crown, and must be assolvied.

Duke of Buccleuch v Boyd, 1890, 18 R. 1; 28 S.L.R. 19.

—A person in possession of lands which were alleged to be kirk lands resigned them in 1806 to the Crown for new infeftment and took a charter on a blench tenure for a penny Scots si petatur tantum. Up to this date the lands had been held in feu of a subject-superior (who held his superiority under a strict entail), for a reddendo of £6 Scots. After obtaining the Crown charter the vassal held the lands for more than the prescriptive period, but paid the feu-duty of £6 Scots to the subject-superior, who remained infeft in the superiority; no payment was ever demanded by the Crown, except some payment on the charter being granted, the character of which was not ascertained. Some of the vassals from 1806 downwards were enrolled as freeholders, and voted as such. The subject-superior having in 1871 brought against the vassal a reduction of the Crown title, as having been unwarrantably obtained in prejudice of his rights as superior, the vassal pleaded prescription. Held that there had been no sufficient possession by the vassal on that title, and the plea of prescription repelled, and the title reduced.

Personal title—School board possessing transferred school on personal title—Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, sec. 38.

In 1833 A granted a feu disposition of a portion of the lands of Craigrothie to B, who entered into possession but did not take infeftment. A schoolhouse was built on the ground, which was transferred by B's successors in 1873 to the school board, who took possession but were not infeft. In 1883 the lands of Craigrothie were bought by D, who completed his title by infeftment upon the disposition, which contained a clause of warrandice excepting all feu rights granted by the disposer or his predecessors.

In an action by the school board against D for declarator of the right to the piece of ground, the pursuers founded on the unfederalised feu disposition and on sec. 38 of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, which enacts that when a school has been transferred to a school board, the school and the site shall vest in the school board. The pursuers did not allege that D knew of their right at the date of his purchase.

Held (1) that D's right to the lands was not affected by the unfederalised feu disposition; and (2) that sec. 38 of the Act did not give the school board a better title than that of their author, and therefore that their title was not valid in competition with the title of D.

Double title—Evacuation of precept of sasine by infeftment on Crown charter.

Held that a precept of sasine in a feu disposition was not evacuated by the superior subsequently granting an a me disposition of the lands in which he assigned a Crown charter of resignation containing an unexecuted precept upon which the disponee was infeft, the disposition containing an exception of the feu right from the warrandice, and assigning the feu-duty and not the rents, and the person founding on the disposition being a representative of the disponee and not a singular successor.

Abolition of ward holding—Fortress—Possession by vassal as keeper of castle—Clan Act, 1747.

From ancient times the lands of Penny-castle of Dunstaffnage, with their parts and pertinents, were held by a vassal on a ward holding, the reddendo including (besides a feu-duty) the rendering of military services to the superior and the military guardianship of the castle of Dunstaffnage, as well as the duty of maintaining the castle fit for the residence of the superior. The property in the castle admittedly remained with the superior, but the vassal's duties as keeper of the castle involved the occupation and possession of it by him. After the passing of the Clan Act in 1747, by which ward holding was abolished, the military services were commuted for a money payment, but the other obligations of the vassal still continued. In 1810 the castle was burned down, and was never rebuilt. In an action between the superior and the vassal brought in 1909, the vassal asserted a right of property in the castle, and maintained that, after the passing of the Clan Act, his possession of the castle was no longer that of military keeper for the superior, but was that of proprietor. Held that the superior was still the proprietor of the castle, in respect that the Clan Act, though abolishing military services, did not alter the proprietary rights in the subjects, and that after 1747 the vassal had continued in possession of the castle solely as keeper for the superior for the purpose of rendering the civil services enumerated in his charters.

Split—Effect on feudal title of a series of deeds beginning with a disposition of lands to trustees for payment of debts, on which they were infeft base, and a conveyance of the dominium directum by the grantor's successor—Whether permanent split of superiority and property effected.

A, a Crown vassal infeft in the dominium plenum of a barony, in 1776 disposed it heritably and irredeemably, under burden of certain family provisions, to trustees for payment of £10,000 of his debts, with precept a me vel de me, under the conditions that the trustees should enter only with the Crown to the extent of the lands sold by them, and that on the trust purposes being fulfilled the conveyance and infeftment of the trustees should become extinct, or otherwise that the trustees should be bound to execute the deeds necessary to reinvest the truster. The trustees in 1776 were infeft base, but never sold or possessed any part of the subjects. B, who succeeded to the estate as institute under a defective deed of entail executed by A in 1776, in 1801 sold "the superiority of S," part of the estate, to create a freehold franchise. In 1819 M, who had acquired the purchaser's right to the superiority of S, with an assignation to an unexhausted precept in a Crown charter, was infeft as Crown vassal in the lands of S. In 1832 the trustees under the deed of 1776 reconveyed the estates, including the dominium utile of S, to C, the heir of entail then in possession, who took infeftment. C's estates were sequestrated after his death, and the trustees, after the debts had been paid, granted a general conveyance of the barony to D, the succeeding heir of entail. D took up by special service to C the whole lands held of the Crown except S. In 1859 M (the holder of the superiority) conveyed the lands of S to D, who conveyed the whole estates to his testamentary trustees. In an action brought by a creditor of a succeeding heir of entail to adjudge the dominium utile of S as still in hereditate jacente of C, held that the right to the dominium utile of S had been vested in D, and was carried by his settlement to his trustees.

Whether consolidation had brought dominium utile of lands within an entail.

An entail, dated in 1715, comprised, inter alia, certain lands the dominium utile of which had been disposed by the entailor or his predecessors prior to the date of the entail, so that the entail only carried the superiority thereof. The dominium utile was acquired in 1721 by the next succeeding heir of entail, who took a disposition in favour of himself and his heirs and assignees whomsoever, being a different destination from that contained in the entail. He was not infeft either under the entail or under the disposition. In 1765 the next heir was infeft upon the unexecuted precept in the conveyance of 1721, having previously served heir-in-general to the last heir. The next heir in 1780 made up a title under the entail, but no separate title to the said lands, which he possessed along with the entailed estate down to 1843, when he died. Held that consolidation had not operated so as to bring the dominium utile of the said lands within the entail, and that a subsequent heir was therefore proprietor thereof in fee simple.

Earl of Glasgow v Boyle, 1887, 14 R. 419; 24 S.L.R. 329.

Double titles to land—Prescription.

A, who was infeft in the dominium utile of certain lands, disposed these by a marriage contract in 1777 in favour of himself and the heirs male of his body, whom failing the heirs whatsoever of the marriage, whom failing his nearest heirs and assignees, subject to the declaration that if the lands should devolve on heirs portioners, the eldest heir portioner should exclude the others; but no infeftment was ever taken on this disposition. On A's death in 1791 B, his eldest son, succeeded to the lands, but he neither served heir nor made up a title. In 1794 B purchased the superiority of the lands, and in 1798 obtained a Crown charter of adjudication and resignation in favour of himself and his heirs and assignees, on which he was infeft in 1800. B possessed the lands till his death in 1868, when he was succeeded by his grandnephew C, who was infeft by expeding and recording a decree (in which the lands were described as in the Crown charter) of special and general service to B, and who thereafter granted a writ of clare constat in his own favour. In a question between two nieces to whom the succession opened on C's death, held that by B's possession of the lands on the superiority title for the prescriptive period, the dominium utile had been consolidated with the superiority, and that the destination in the superiority title (the Crown charter) ruled the succession to the lands.

(30)

Extinction—Feu acquired under Lands Clauses Act, 1845—Compensation.

Where a railway company, which had compulsorily taken land forming part of lands held by the same owner under one title, completed a statutory title thereto under sec. 80 of the Lands Clauses Act and entered into possession without compensating the superior for the loss of casualties, held that, notwithstanding the failure of the company to pay compensation, sec. 126 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, excluded any claim by the superior against the company for feu duties or casualties. Opinion (per Lord President Inglis) that when a title is completed by a railway company under sec. 80 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, no feudal relation is completed between the promoters and the superior of the lands taken, and therefore that any action founded on that relation is incompetent.

Question, whether the superior, having allowed the company to enter into possession without paying compensation, could afterwards recover it.

Magistrates of Elgin v Highland Railway Co., 1884, 11 R. 950; 21 S.L.R. 640.

Feu acquired under Lands Clauses Act, 1845—Charter of confirmation—Compensation.

Sec. 80 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, enacts, with reference to purchases of lands under the Act, that conveyances duly executed in the form prescribed by the Act and registered in the Register of Sasines "shall give and constitute a good and undoubted right and complete and valid feudal title in all time coming to the promoters of the undertaking." Held that when a title is completed by a company under the above enactment no feudal relation exists or can be established between the company and the superior of the lands taken, and therefore that a charter of confirmation granted by a superior to a company which had completed a statutory title under sec. 80 was null.

Magistrates of Inverness v Highland Railway Co., 1893, 20 R. 551; 30 S.L.R. 502.

Feu acquired under Lands Clauses Act, 1845—Failure of company acquiring lands to register conveyance timeously—Right of superior to demand casualty—Process—Form of action.

A railway company acquired certain lands, being the whole lands held by the same owner under the same title, by compulsory powers under the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, and on 12th August, 1867, obtained a conveyance thereto, substantially in the form prescribed by sec. 80 and Schedule A of that Act. This conveyance was not registered until after the expiry of sixty days from its date, and the feudal charges upon the lands remained unredeemed. In October, 1885, on the death of the seller, the superiors obtained payment of a casualty of composition from the railway company. In 1910, after the lapse of the statutory period of twenty-five years, the superiors demanded a further casualty, which the railway company refused to pay. In a petitory action by the superiors for payment of this casualty the company pleaded in defence that no casualty was now, or ever had been, exigible from them, in respect that they had completed a valid statutory title to the lands to the effect of extinguishing the pursuers' rights of superiority therein.

Held that the defenders, having failed to comply with sec. 80 of the Act of 1845, by not registering the conveyance within sixty days, held only on a common law title, and not upon a statutory title acquired under that Act, and that the composition sued for was exigible under sec. 5 of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874. Held further that a petitory action was the appropriate method of enforcing payment. Opinions that prior to the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, in a case where a corporation had acquired a statutory title under sec. 80 of the Act of 1845, no petitory action could be brought by the superior against the corporation for recovery of a composition, but that, since the Act of 1874, such an action was competent where the lands acquired by the corporation were the whole lands of the same owner held under the same title. Nature and effect of a statutory conveyance and a statutory title discussed.

Feu acquired under Lands Clauses Act, 1845—Compensation to superior—Mora.

In 1874 a railway company acquired certain lands by compulsory purchase under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, and obtained a statutory conveyance thereto, which was duly recorded. The lands were a portion of an estate held by the same owner under the same titles. In 1908 the superior brought an action against the railway company for declarator that the company were bound to pay compensation for the loss of the superiority of the lands thus acquired, including the feu-duties and casualties appertaining thereto. The superior did not aver any pecuniary loss through failing to recover these feu-duties or casualties. The company maintained that the claim for compensation was irrelevant, as the pursuer had suffered no loss. Held that the action was relevant as a claim for compensation, in respect that the superior, having by the effect of sec. 126 of the Act been deprived of the security of these subjects for feu-duties and casualties, was entitled to be compensated therefor in terms of that section.

Held further, that the superior was not barred from now claiming compensation.

either by having allowed the company to enter on possession or by mere lapse of time.

Feu acquired under Lands Clauses Act, 1845—Compensation to superior.

In 1846 a railway company compulsorily acquired a portion of an estate under the Lands Clauses Act. As the proprietor refused to grant a conveyance, the company consigned the compensation due to him, and entered into possession without making up a title. In 1875 the company obtained a statutory conveyance from the proprietor's successors and recorded it; and in 1903 the superior, for the first time, claimed compensation for the loss of his rights as superior.

Transference of Lands Act, 1847.

Forfeiture of superiorities below £5 under the Transference of Lands Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 48) sec. 8, is ineffectual unless directed against those having the personal right to the superiority.

Under both the above Acts.

The last entered superior of the lands of M, which were held of the Crown, died in 1799. The right of superiority passed to his daughter, who, without making up a title to it, conveyed it in 1819, under a general conveyance of her whole estate, to her marriage contract trustees. The right to the superiority remained personal from 1799 till 1872, when the trustees, the trust still subsisting, made up their title to it. The right to the property of the lands of M fell in 1803 to A. M., who was served and infeft as heir of the last vassal, and who in 1813 brought a process of tinsel of the superiority under the Act 1474, c. 57, against the heir of line of the superior last infeft, on which the Crown confirmed his infeftment. In 1849 W. C. M., who was served and infeft as heir of A. M., obtained decree of forfeiture of the superiority (the reddendo being below £5) under the Transference of Lands Act, 1847, sec. 8, against the heir of line and heir male of the superior last infeft, but without calling the trustees, who were de facto (though without his knowledge) the persons in right of the superiority. In a process of reduction, and for recovery of the casualties of non-entry, held (1) that the tinsel of superiority in 1813 under the Act 1474, c. 57, was only temporary, and fell with the death of the vassal obtaining it; and (2) that the decree of forfeiture of the superiority obtained in 1849 under the Transference of Lands Act, 1847, was invalid, the persons de facto in right of the superiority not having been called in the process.

Right to resume possession brevi manu.

A feued ground for building purposes to B, with entry at Whitsunday, 1880, and on condition that B should erect and finish certain prescribed tenements thereon by Whitsunday, 1881. A agreed to advance sums of money to B by instalments to enable him to erect the tenements; and it was stipulated that for the security of any advances made he should hold the subjects and tenements thereon erected, with power to sell them, and with power to finish any tenements left unfinished previous to selling the same. The work went on, and instalments were paid until A, having received a report by the architect that the work was very bad, intimated to B, first, that he must remedy the defective work, and then, since B had abandoned the work, that if he did not proceed with the work within a week A would resume possession of the subjects and complete the building. Thereupon B having neither remedied the defects nor resumed work, A entered into possession of the subjects, and proceeded to finish the work. In an action for damages against him at the instance of B's trustee in bankruptcy, held that A's conduct was justified in the circumstances, and A assoltied accordingly.

Ob non solum canonem—Effect on subaltern rights.

Held that when a vassal incurs the irritancy ob non solum canonem (whether under the statute or conventional) the feu reverts to the superior unaffected by any sub-feu rights granted by the vassal.

Per Lord Selborne, L.C.—“On principle,

—"All parties not called"—Subjects held by spouses in liferent with power to alienate—Fee to children nominatim—Spes successionis in children.

A superior in one and the same action concluded for irritancy of the feu ob non solum canonem, and for payment of a casualty. The lands were held by spouses in liferent with power to alienate, with a fee to their children nominatim. The spouses alone were called as defenders. Plea of "all parties not called" repelled, on the ground that the children had a mere spes successionis, and consequently no interest to appear.

Brown & Co. v Brown, (O.H.) 1893, 1 S.L.T. 91.

(42)

—Superior proceeding against sub-feuar or unentered disponent.

Held that it is incompetent for a superior to pass over his vassal and bring a declarator ob non solum canonem against a sub-feuar or unentered disponent.

Nelson's Trustees v Tod, (O.H.) 1901, 9 S.L.T. 369.

(43)

—Right of vassal to retain feu-duties.

Held that it was no defence to an action of declarator of irritancy ob non solum canonem that there was a question between the superior and the vassal as to the latter's right to erect certain buildings.

Thom v Chalmers, 1886, 13 R. 1026; 23 S.L.R. 735.

—Failure to build—At what date incurred.

By minute annexed to articles of roup and feu, dated in 1873, a vassal was taken bound to erect buildings upon the subjects feued "within two years after the 17th December, 1873." The feu contract embracing this condition was not executed until 1876. The whole conditions in the feu contract were fenced by an irritancy. The buildings never having been erected, the superior in 1879 brought a declarator of irritancy, forfeiture, and removal against the original vassal's disponees, who had purchased in 1877, founding upon the failure to erect "within two years after the 17th day of December, 1873." The defence was that the condition had become impossible, and must be held pro non scripto. On the conclusion of the summons being amended by the addition of the words "or at all events within two years from the date of the feu contract," the Court granted decree as craved.

Magistrates of Glasgow v Hay, 1883, 10 R. 635; 20 S.L.R. 419.

—Where separate subjects conveyed by one disposition—Effect of irritancy incurred in respect of one subject on right to the other.

In a feu contract a proprietor, "in consideration of the feu-duty and other prestations" therein written, disposed two pieces of ground, forming part of one feuing estate, to trustees for a firm, for separate feu-duties. The contract took the disponees bound to erect on each piece buildings yielding a rent equal to double the feu-duty, and to leave on one piece a pend to allow of access to the other. There followed a clause of irritancy in the event of the vassals failing to erect and maintain the specified buildings. The stipulations and irritancies were constituted real burdens on the subjects. One of these subjects, on which the stipulated buildings had been timeously erected, was acquired by a third party. The original vassals retained the other subject, but, having become bankrupt, they failed to erect the stipulated buildings thereon. In an action of declarator of irritancy of the feu raised by the superior against the holders of both the subjects, the singular successor alone defended the action. Held that his feu right was not irritated by the failure of the original vassals to implement the obligations in the feu contract applicable to the subject still remaining in their hands.

Welsh v Jack, 1882, 10 R. 113; 20 S.L.R. 82.

—Effect of irritancy—Whether superior or vassal's trustee in bankruptcy entitled to insist in claim of compensation against a railway company.

Held that a claim of damages under the Lands Clauses Act by a proprietor against a railway company on the ground that his land had been injured by the formation of the railway between it and the sea was, if competent at all, personal to the proprietor, and was not carried to the superior by a decree of irritancy ob non solum canonem.

Caledonian Railway Co. v Watt, 1875, 2 R. 917; 12 S.L.R. 592.

—Irritancy attached to obligations ad facta præstanda—Whether purgeable at the bar.

Held that conventional irritancies attached to obligations ad facta præstanda, or for payment of annual duties contained in conveyances of property, whether by way of feu right or by contract of ground annual, are purgeable at any time before extract of a decree of declarator of irritancy.

Review of the law relating to the purging of irritancies.

Duncanson v Giffen, (O.H.) 1878, 15 S.L.R. 356.

(48)
Purging irritancy—Arrears of feu-duties due to superior as assignee of predecessor—Sheriff Courts Act, 1853, sec. 34.

A superior claiming arrears of feu-duties, partly in his own right and partly as assignee of his predecessor, presented a petition to the sheriff under sec. 32 of the Sheriff Courts Act, 1853, for removal of the vassal. The vassal in his defences tendered payment of the arrears due to the superior in his own right, and pleaded that this was sufficient to purge the irritancy. Held (1) that the tender by the defender was sufficient to purge the irritancy; and (2) that the proper interlocutor was one finding that the irritancy had been incurred, but that it had been purged, and not an interlocutor dismissing the action.

IV. FEU-DUTY.

1. GENERALLY.

(49)
Personal obligation in feu contract—Liability of executors.

A feu contract bore that the vassal "binds and obliges himself and his heirs, executors, and successors whomsoever" to make payment of a certain sum in name of feu-duty. The vassal having died, his heir declined to take up the feu. In an action against the vassal's executors for payment of the feu-duties which had become due since his death, and for damages for breach of contract, in failing to take up the feu on the heir declining to do so, held (1) that there was no obligation upon the executors to pay feu-duties accruing after the date of the vassal's death; and (2) that they were not liable in damages for breach of contract.

Aiton v Russell's Executors, 1889, 16 R. 625; 26 S.L.R. 478.

Liability of executors—Conjunct and several liability.

A feu contract bore that the vassal "binds and obliges himself, his heirs, executors, and successors whomsoever, conjunctly and severally," to pay feu-duties and implement certain other obligations. Held that the personal obligation remained effectual on him and his representatives in perpetuity, notwithstanding that he had disposed the feu to a singular successor, who was duly infeft and entered with the superior.

Police Commissioners of Dundee v Straton, &c., 1884, 11 R. 586; 21 S.L.R. 410.

Stipulation for additional feu-duty for ground "on which buildings shall be erected"—Construction.

A feu contract provided that the vassal should pay to the superior "besides the feu-duty above stipulated, the sum of two shillings sterling of additional feu-duty for every square pole of the said piece of ground on which buildings shall be erected." A singular successor of the original vassal acquired part of the subjects, upon one acre of which he erected a public laundry. The buildings occupied about one-half of the acre, the remainder being occupied by a road forming the approach to the laundry, a road of an average breadth of 7 feet surrounding it, and a grass slope separating the buildings from a reservoir. Held that the additional feu-duty was payable for the ground actually built on, and not for the road and other accessory ground not built on.

M'Farlane v Stirling-Maxwell, 1902, 5 F. (H.L.) 1; 40 S.L.R. 64; 10 S.L.T. 341.

Liability of bondholders inter se.

Prior bondholders who had entered into possession, and intromitted with the rents of a subject, held liable to relieve a postponed creditor, who held an ex facie absolute disposition of the subjects in security of debt, of the feu-duty paid by him to the superior.

Liquidators of the City of Glasgow Bank v Nicolson's Trustees, 1882, 9 R. 689; 19 S.L.R. 461.

(53)
Conversion—Vitual feu-duty—Bear or barley.

The reddendo of certain lands in the county of Fife held under a charter of date 1622 was a virtual feu-duty of "three chalders bear, guid and sufficient stuff." Held that the term "bear" occurring in deeds of the date of the original charter of 1622 applied equally to bear and barley, which were different varieties of the same species of grain, and that barley grown in that part of Fife was the "bear" to be delivered under the reddendo.

Ferguson's Trustees v Magistrates of Kinghorn, 1876, 3 R. 401.

(54)
Option to take in kind—Irritancy ob non solum canonem—Agricultural services.

A vassal was bound by his charter to pay as feu-duty "£2 Scots money, twelve capons, or 10s. Scots for each capon, and four shear dargs, or 6s. 8d. for each darg not performed, all in" the superior's "option." For many years 2s. 6d. had been paid for each capon to the superior in lieu of delivery in kind. The vassal subsequently refused to continue this payment, and tendered 10s. Scots as conversion money. The superior having refused conversion money, and the vassal having made no payment for six years, the superior brought an action of declarator of irritancy against the vassal and his disponee, who had not entered with the superior. Held (1) that the superior, having refused the money conversion, had thereby sufficiently intimated his option of taking the capons; (2) that the vassal not having tendered the feu-duty for upwards of two years, the feu-duty was in arrear, and the irritancy had been incurred; (3) that the shear dargs could not be demanded after the year in which they were exigible was past, nor the conversion in lieu thereof.

Hope v Aitken, 1872, 10 M. 347; 44 J. 185; 9 S.L.R. 241.

(55)

Retention—Right to feu reserved in disposition in security—Feu-duties assigned to creditors—Vassal's right of retention against creditor for unfulfilled obligation of superior.

In a bond and disposition in security power was reserved to the granter of the bond to feu the subjects, the feu-duties being assigned to the holder of the bond, and the granter's right of superiority being declared to be subject to the security. The granter, after feuing ground, failed to implement an obligation to the vassal to form streets and sewers, and became bankrupt. In an action by the bondholder against the vassal for payment of feu-duties, held (1) that the holder of the bond had no claims or rights against the vassal, excepting such as would have been open to the superior; and (2) that the superior having become bankrupt, the vassal was entitled to retain the feu-duties so long as the obligation to form streets and sewers was unfulfilled.

Arnott's Trustees v Forbes, 1881, 9 R. 89; 19 S.L.R. 54.

(56)

Arrears.

Held (by Lord Ormidale, Ordinary) that the Crown, after granting to a vassal a charter of confirmation containing a discharge of one year's non-entry duties, was not entitled thereafter to claim arrears of feu-duties.

Lord Advocate v Lord Rollo, 1872, 10 M. 1024.

(57)

Interest — General rule — Relief — Extrajudicial demand.

Held that when a sub-vassal had undertaken the burden of relieving the superior of a part of the feu-duty due to the Crown, and had failed to pay, the superior, who had paid the feu-duties to the Crown, could only recover the principal from the sub-vassal, as the ordinary rule that feu-duties do not bear interest applied.

Question, whether interest runs on feu-duties after an extrajudicial demand has been made for them.

Marquis of Tweeddale's Trustees v Earl of Haddington, 1880, 7 R. 620; 17 S.L.R. 392.

—Stipulated — Purging irritancy — Arrears of feu-duty.

A feu contract stipulated for payment of interest on arrears of feu-duty without specifying any rate. Opinion that a vassal who had incurred an irritancy ob non solutum canonem was entitled to purge the irritancy by payment of the arrears of feu-duty without interest.

Burgage — Feu-duty and corresponding casualty stipulated for in disposition.

Held that the owner of the subjects was personally liable for the annual payments and duplications thereof stipulated in his titles, but that the clauses relating to these payments had no feudal effect, being incompatible with a burgage holding, and did not constitute real burdens.

Magistrates of Arbroath v Dickson, 1872, 10 M. 630; 44 J. 347; 9 S.L.R. 389.

2. ALLOCATION.

(60)

Right of purchaser of heritage to require seller to obtain an allocation of cumulo feu-duty from superior.

A house was sold on the condition that "the feu-duty is understood to be not more than £4." The house was part of a tenement erected on ground held by the seller at a cumulo feu-duty of £35. The seller recorded a disposition in his own favour of his whole feu, in which he allocated £4 as the feu-duty of the portion sold, and subsequently tendered to the purchaser a disposition in which the feu-duty was stated at that sum, but he did not obtain the consent of the superior to the allocation. In an action by the seller to have the buyer ordained to implement the contract, held that the terms of the contract did not oblige the seller to obtain the consent of the superior to the allocation of the feu-duty in the disposition tendered.

Obligation to allocate—Obligation in favour of "singular successors"—Bondholder over part of feu.

A feu contract provided that "singular successors" in any portion of the ground feued should be bound to pay to the superior a rateable proportion of the cumulo feu-duty, "for which proportion only they shall be bound." Held that a creditor in a bond and disposition in security over part of the feu, duly recorded, was not a "singular successor" in the sense of the feu contract; and that, even if he should be assumed to have been entered with the superior by virtue of the implied entry of the Conveyancing Act of 1874, that entry could not affect the character of his right, which was a mere encumbrance on the right of the original feuar, so as to make him a "singular successor," and therefore that he could not take the benefit of the clause providing for allocation of the feu-duty.

Campbell v Deans, 1890, 17 R. 661; 27 S.L.R. 521.

Obligation to erect buildings of certain value — Bankruptcy of vassal — Trustee's right to insist on allocation without undertaking to implement whole obligation as to buildings.

Under a feu charter the vassal was taken bound within three years to erect buildings on the feu of the value of £5000. The feu-duty was declared to be £50, and the vassal was to have the power as soon as buildings of the requisite value were erected to allocate the feu-duty in such proportions as might be approved by the superior. The vassal thereafter proceeded to erect a tenement of the value of £3000 on the eastmost half of the feu, and the superior by letter agreed to allocate thereon £20 of the cumulo feu-duty "when the same is completed." Before the tenement was completed the vassal became bankrupt. His trustee thereafter completed the tenement, and called upon the superior to allocate £20 of feu-duty thereon in terms of his letter. The trustee declined to give an undertaking that he would implement the rest of the obligation as to buildings, and the superior declined to make the allocation. Held (1) that the letter was to be construed as an obligation by the superior to allocate £20 of the cumulo feu-duty on the eastern portion of the feu as soon as the building thereon was completed; but (2) that the letter was not to be regarded as creating an independent obligation by the superior, but merely as modifying one of the terms of the feu charter, and that to entitle the trustee to take advantage of this modification he must be prepared to implement the other stipulations of the feu charter.

Mitchell's Trustee v Galloway's Trustees, 1903, 5 F. 612; 40 S.L.R. 436; 10 S.L.T. 679.

Effect on right of vassals to obtain allocation.

A consent to allocation of feu-duty "on condition that there be built on each part or portion into which the said steading shall be divided to which such subdivided feu-duty shall be applicable a house or houses yielding a yearly rent equal to four times the annual amount of the subdivided feu-duty payable for each part or portion," held to mean that there was to be no allocation until all the subdivisions supported buildings of the specified value.

Kemp v Bain, (O.H.) 1895, 3 S.L.T. 127.

(64)

Allocation not made in implement of condition of original feu right—Effect on heritable creditors.

Opinion that no allocation of a feu-duty by a superior which is not made in implement and in terms of some stipulation expressed in and forming a condition of the original grant can possibly affect prior heritable creditors of the superior who are not parties to it.

British Linen Co. v Ogg, (O.H.) 1904, 11 S.L.T. 756.

(65)

Allocation by insolvent superior in favour of insolvent vassal—Effect on rights of heritable creditors.

A vassal, after insolvency, granted gratuitous dispositions of his feu and made allocations of the feu-duty. The allocations were confirmed by the superior, who was at the time also insolvent. Held that the allocations were invalid and ineffectual against a prior heritable creditor of the superior who was also a creditor of the vassal at the time when he made the allocation.

British Linen Co. v Ogg, (O.H.) 1904, 11 S.L.T. 756.

(66)

Power of bondholder in selling the security subjects to allocate the feu-duty—Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868, secs. 119 and 121—Titles to Land Consolidation Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1869, sec. 7.

A bondholder who sells the security subjects in lots has no power to allocate the feu-duty as in a question between the owners of the lots, or to create real burdens between the different portions he is selling.

Johnston v Irons, 1909 S.C. 305; 46 S.L.R. 259; 1909, 1 S.L.T. 23.

Allocation in favour of bondholder—Effect on singular successors in superiority.

Opinion that an allocation of feu-duty cannot be made in favour of a mere bondholder so as to affect the rights of a singular successor in the superiority.

British Linen Co. v Ogg, (O.H.) 1904, 11 S.L.T. 756.

(68)

Unallocated feu-duty—Right of vassal on payment to assignation of superior's rights.

Held that a vassal, in tendering payment of his feu-duty, is not entitled to require from his superior an assignation of his rights to enable him (the vassal) to recover the proportion of feu-duty applicable to part of the feu he had disposed, although the assignation was qualified with a declaration that it should not prejudice the rights of the superior.

Guthrie v Smith, 1880, 8 R. 107; 18 S.L.R. 75.

Subdivision of feu and allocation of feu-duty without consent of superior—Pounding of the ground—Liability of one sub-feuar for arrears of cumulo feu-duty—Actings of superior in prejudice of sub-vassal's right of relief.

The vassals under a feu contract, dated in 1827, divided the feu into four lots, and apportioned the cumulo feu-duty exigible in respect of the whole lands among the lots, but without the consent of the superior. In 1858 the superior granted a charter of confirmation in favour of Milne, the owner of one of the lots. The charter bore that the subjects were to be holden under the superiors as immediate lawful superiors for payment of a certain yearly feu-duty (being the amount previously apportioned), which was stated to be a proportional part of the cumulo feu-duty payable for the whole lands under the feu contract of 1827, "reserving always the bygone and current feu-duties, and our own right, and the right of all others concerned as accords of law." In 1902 the superior brought an action of poinding of the ground against the owner of another of the lots for recovery of arrears of the cumulo feu-duty. Held that the pursuer, by granting the charter of confirmation, had deprived the defender of the right of relief which would otherwise have been open to her against Milne and the portion of the feu possessed by him, and that the defender therefore fell to be assoltized.

Nelson's Trustees v Tod, 1904, 6 F. 475; 41 S.L.R. 332; 11 S.L.T. 692.

3. ACTION FOR FEU-DUTY.

(70)

Personal action — Action by over-superior against sub-vassal for proportion of Crown feu-duties of which mid-superior taken bound to relieve superior, and which made real burden in sub-vassal's disposition—Condition of tenure—Real burden.

In a personal action brought by A, an over-superior (a Crown vassal), against C, his sub-vassal, proprietor of part of the lands of W, for repayment of the proportion of Crown feu-duties effieiring thereto, due by the defender and predecessors whom he represented, it appeared that the sub-feu was held under, inter alia, the following titles:—(1) a disposition, a me vel de me, granted to B (the mid-superior) of the lands of W; (2) a feu disposition by B to the sub-vassal, conveying parts of the lands of W. At the date of the action the mid-superiority was in non-entry.

Held that the pursuer, as over-superior, was entitled to a personal decree against the defender for the proportion of Crown feu-duties sued for, on the ground that the obligation to relieve the disposer of feu-duties inserted in the tenendas of the disposition to the mid-superior (No. (1)) formed a condition of the tenure which the pursuer, as over-superior, was entitled to enforce by personal action against the sub-vassal.

Opinion (per Lord President Inglis and Lord Mure) that although, by the feu disposition in favour of the sub-vassal (No. (2)), a certain annual payment was effectually constituted a real burden on the lands, no personal obligation had been transmitted as against singular successors, arising either from the terms of the original contract or from the principles of tenure.

Opinion contra (per Lord Deas and Lord Shand).

Marquis of Tweeddale's Trustees v Earl of Haddington, 1880, 7 R. 620; 17 S.L.R. 392.

(71)

Liability of sub-vassal of part of feu to over-superior.

Held that an over-superior has not a direct personal action for the whole cumulo feu-duty against a sub-vassal holding part of the feu.

Opinion per curiam, that the over-superior is entitled to enforce for his own benefit the obligations come under by the sub-vassal to his own immediate superior.

Sandeman v Scottish Property Investment Company Building Society, 1881, 8 R. 790; 18 S.L.R. 559.

(72)

Delay in bringing action—Loss of evidence.

In an action by a superior against a vassal for arrears of feu-duty, it was admitted that the arrears had been paid to an agent of the pursuer, whose mandate, however, it was averred, had been withdrawn, and who at the date of the action was dead. Held that the pursuer by his delay in bringing the action had caused the defender to lose the agent's evidence, and action dismissed.

Jackson v Swan, 1895, 3 S.L.T. 149.

(73)

Maills and duties.

A superior has no title to pursue an action of maills and duties for recovery of feu-duty. Prudential Assurance Co. v Cheyne, &c., 1884, 11 R. 871; 21 S.L.R. 606.

(74)

Bond and disposition of superiority in security.

Held that the creditor in a bond and disposition in security of a superiority, with an assignation to feu-duties and casualties, has no title to sue an action of maills and duties against the vassal of his debtor for recovery of the feu-duties.

Nelson's Trustees v Tod, 1896, 23 R. 1000; 33 S.L.R. 727; 4 S.L.T. 80.

Poinding of the ground.

A superior who has divested himself of his superiority in favour of a third party has no title to sue an action of poinding of the ground for recovery of arrears of feu-duties due prior to his divestiture.

Scottish Heritages Co. v North British Property Investment Co., 1885, 12 R. 550; 22 S.L.R. 361.

Extent of superior's security—Arrears of feu-duty—Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, Amendment Act, 1879, sec. 3—Conveyancing (Scotland) Acts (1874 and 1879) Amendment Act, 1887, sec. 2.

Held that, under sec. 3 of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, Amendment Act, 1879, and sec. 2 of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Acts (1874 and 1879) Amendment Act, 1887, a superior can obtain a decree of poinding of the ground for arrears of feu-duty after the sequestration of his vassal, but that the poinding is, in competition with the trustee in the sequestration, available only for the current term's feu-duty and one year's arrears.

Campbell v Edinburgh Parish Council, 1911 S.C. 280; 48 S.L.R. 193; 1910, 2 S.L.T. 409.

Recovery of arrears — Sequestration of moveables — Vassal a company — Action by superior for sequestration for feu-duty after liquidation—Companies Act, 1862, sec. 163.

Held that an action by a superior against his vassal, a limited company in liquidation, for sequestration of the moveables on the feu for arrears of feu-duty, was not an "attachment, sequestration, distress, or execution" within the meaning of the Companies Act, 1862, sec. 163.

Anderson's Trustees v Liquidator of Donaldson & Co., 1908 S.C. 38; 45 S.L.R. 26; 15 S.L.T. 409.

1. ENTRY BEFORE THE CONVEYANCING ACT, 1874.

(78)

Corporation — "Managers and their successors in office."

An incorporation under royal letters patent, having purchased certain lands, the superior, by charter of resignation, disposed the lands "to and in favour of the managers of" the corporation "and their successors in office for the use and behoof of the said hospital and their disponees, heritably and irredeemably," and infeftment was taken in these terms. Held that the entry so given was an entry of the corporation, and was not an entry of individuals as trustees for the corporation.

Earl of Lauderdale v Hogg, 1897, 24 R. 914; 34 S.L.R. 689; 5 S.L.T. 43.

Right of adjudger to be entered—Jus tertii of superior to object to warrant of adjudication.

From 1774 to 1815 a feu was held under a series of base infeftments, although the dispositions throughout the progress contained both procuratory and alternative precept. From 1815, the date of the last infeftment, no title was made up until 1864, when a person who had been in possession from 1850 obtained decree of adjudication in implement, "in respect of no opposition," against the brother and alleged disponee of the person last infeft, and against his heir-at-law, he being then dead. In 1868 the superior raised an action to reduce the adjudger's title, concluding alternatively for declarator of non-entry. Held that the subject having been transferred to the defender by due process of law, it was jus tertii of the superior to object that the documents upon which the decree of adjudication had been obtained were ex facie invalid and ineffectual as warrant for adjudication, and that the superior was bound to enter the defender on payment of the arrears of feu-duty.

Monteith v Ingels, 1869, 7 M. 523; 41 J. 282.

Declarator of non-entry.

Where the personal right under a Crown charter had transmitted to several parties in succession, infeftment on the open precept in the Crown charter and on a corroborative disposition and assignation by the original disponee in the Crown charter, granted in consequence of the loss of some of the writs constituting the progress, held a sufficient title to sue a declarator of non-entry against a vassal in the lands.

Liability for non-entry duties while Crown charter is being adjusted.

Circumstances in which held that a Crown vassal obtaining a charter of confirmation was not liable in non-entry duties for the current half-year during which the draft charter was finally adjusted and the deed ready to be issued.

Observed that the period to which non-entry duties to the Crown are to be calculated is one of circumstances.

Declarator of non-entry—Competency—Act 1874, sec. 4.

A superior raised an action against his vassal, who had been entered in virtue of the implied entry given by the Conveyancing Act of 1874, concluding for declarator that the lands had been in non-entry from 1851 to 1874, and for decree against the vassal for payment of the non-entry duties for these years. Held (1) that by the law prior to the Act of 1874 the only competent mode of recovering non-entry duties was by a declarator of non-entry directed against the lands; (2) that the Act of 1874, by enacting that after 1st October, 1874, no lands should be deemed to be in non-entry, had deprived superiors of this remedy and had provided no other; and therefore (3) that the present action was incompetent.

Superiority and dominium utile held by same person—Discharge of casualty confusion—Act 1874, sec. 4.

In 1876 William Motherwell, the superior of certain lands, acquired the dominium utile of the lands by disposition from Greer, who had been entered with the superior prior to the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874. Greer died in 1885. William Motherwell, who had recorded the disposition of the dominium utile in his favour and had not consolidated the superiority and the dominium utile, died in 1892, and his trustees made up separate titles to the two estates. Thereafter the trustees, in 1892, conveyed the superiority to Gavin Motherwell, and in 1897 they conveyed the dominium utile to Manwell, who recorded the disposition thereof in his favour. Gavin Motherwell then, as superior, brought an action against Manwell for payment of composition, upon the ground that no casualty had been paid since the death of Greer, the last expressly entered vassal, in 1885. The defender maintained that as William Motherwell, and after his death his trustees, had been both superiors and vassals of the lands at a time when a casualty was exigible, the casualty so exigible must be held to have been discharged, or to have been extinguished confusion, and that no further casualty could be demanded until the death of the last survivor of William Motherwell's trustees. Held that the defender was liable to pay composition in respect of his own entry, as there was no former vassal in existence who had paid a casualty.

Infetment in liferent—Act 1874, secs. 3 and 4.

A vassal infet in fee in certain lands, being sued for a casualty in respect thereof, maintained that the action was premature in respect that another person was infet in liferent in the lands upon an a me vel de me conveyance, that the conveyance to himself was under burden thereof, and that the liferent was by implication confirmed under the Conveyancing Act of 1874. The Court repelled this defence, holding that the infetment which implies an entry must proceed upon a title which was capable of extinguishing the prior vassal's right, and that the liferent right was a mere burden on the vassal's right of fee.

Stuart v Jackson, 1889, 17 R. 85; 27 S.L.R. 178.

Singular successor of existing incorporation—Liability for composition—Act 1874, sec. 4.

A superior raised against his alleged vassals an action under the Conveyancing Act, 1874, sec. 4, sub-sec. (4), for declarator that he was entitled to composition in respect that an incorporation, the last entered vassal under the old law, had ceased to be proprietors of the subjects, and that the defenders, their singular successors, were liable therefor in respect of their implied entry under the Act of 1874. Held that as the superior would not have been in a position to bring a declarator of non-entry had the Act of 1874 not been passed, by reason of the incorporation remaining his vassal, the action was incompetent.

(93)

Singular successor of trustees—Act 1874, sec. 5.

In defence to an action, under sec. 5 of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, by a superior against a singular successor of a body of trustees for a composition, as due upon the expiry of twenty-five years from the last payment of composition by the trustees, the vassal maintained that no payment was due by him under sec. 5, in respect that no composition had ever been paid by the trustees "in terms of" that section, the only composition paid by them having been paid in respect of the death of the vassal last entered before their entry. Held that this defence was not well founded, and that a composition was due by the defender under sec. 5 in respect of the expiration of twenty-five years from the payment of composition by the trustees.

(94)

Effect of payment of casualty, where intermediate vassal, also impliedly entered, has not paid.

A vassal duly entered with his superior conveyed the subjects to A, and died in 1871. A, who, having recorded his disposition, had been impliedly entered by the passing of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, but had paid no composition in respect of his entry, conveyed the subjects to B, who recorded his disposition. In 1883 the superior obtained payment from B of a casualty, and granted receipt therefor in these terms: "In full of the casualty payable for the subjects on the death of the last entered vassal in 1871." On the death of A the superior demanded from B a casualty in respect of B's entry, alleging that the first payment had been made in respect of A's entry. Held that the payment made by B in 1883 was the casualty due in respect of his own entry, and that the superior had no further claim against him on the death of the intermediate vassal.

Opinions, that where a series of implied entries have been taken during the life of the vassal who last paid a casualty, on the death of the latter the superior's right to another casualty emerges against the vassal last impliedly entered, but that he has no claim against any intermediate vassal in respect of his implied entry.

Recording disposition in superior's chartulary—Act 1874, sec. 4.

Right of superior to grant receipt stating the date when casualty fell due.

Duplicand of feu-duty payable on entry of each singular successor—Last vassal entered still alive—Act 1874, sec. 4.

Under a feu contract, certain subjects were held for payment of specified feu-duties, with a duplicand at the entry of each heir and singular successor. Subinfeudation was prohibited, and it was provided that heirs and singular successors of the vassal should be bound to enter with the superior and be infeft within three months of the date of their purchasing or succeeding. These conditions were fenced by an irritancy. In an action for payment of a duplicand of the feu-duty by the superior against a singular successor in the feu who had bought it in 1887, and had taken infeftment, and had been impliedly entered, the defender pleaded that, the last vassal who had paid the casualty being still alive, the demand was contrary to the provisions of the 4th section of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, sub-secs. (2) and (3), and to the common law. The Court, in respect of the obligation on the defender to enter and pay the casualty within three months after the date of his purchase, and of the irritancy by which that obligation could be enforced, held that the pursuer was entitled to payment of the casualty on the expiration of three months from the date of the defender's purchase.

Dick Lauder v Thornton, 1890, 17 R. 320; 27 S.L.R. 455.

—Last entered vassal still alive—Act 1874, sec. 4.

By a feu contract entered into in 1781, the subjects feued were to be holden of the seller and his heirs and successors for payment of a specified feu-duty. The vassal was also taken bound to pay "one full year's rent of the subject, according to the value thereof, at the entry of every singular successor to the said subject, and that within one year and one day of the . . . singular successor . . . acquiring right thereto." A casualty of a year's rent was paid in 1884 on the entry of a body of trustees. The subjects were thereafter disposed to C by a disposition dated and recorded in 1900. In a special case presented in 1901, the superior contended that by the conditions of the feu right C was bound to enter and pay the casualty within one year of his acquiring right to the subjects. C contended that no casualty was due, on the ground that one of the trustees was still alive, and that by the law prior to 1874 the superior could not have compelled an entry. Held that no casualty was payable, in respect (1) that the superior could not by the law prior to 1874 have brought a declarator of non-entry, the fee being full; (2) that the feu contract did not require a singular successor to pay a casualty irrespective of his entry; and (3) that if the feu contract did make it a condition of the feu that a purchaser should enter within a year of his acquisition of the subjects, it did not contain machinery which the superior could use to compel an entry within that time.

—Last entered vassal still alive—Act 1874, sec. 4.

By the tenendas clause of a feu charter, dated in 1825, the vassal and his heirs and assignees whomsoever were taken bound to pay a certain feu-duty, "doubling the said feu-duty at the entry of each heir and singular successor." Subinfeudation and holding otherwise than of the granters and their successors were prohibited, and it was provided that all disponees of the vassals after the grantee taking infestment should be obliged to enter within six months of the dispositions in their favour, and to pay the duplicand for such entry although their author might be then in life, "and in case of their failing or refusing to enter as aforesaid, then the right of the said purchasers or disponees . . . shall be held and considered still to remain with the former vassals, and the said area . . . shall be subject and liable to his debts and deeds notwithstanding the dispositions . . . granted by him." Held that the superiors had a contractual right to recover a duplicand from a singular successor of the vassal holding under and in terms of the feu charter, and impliedly entered under a disposition recorded in 1903, although the last vassal who had paid a duplicand was still alive.

Church of Scotland v Watson, 1905, 7 F. 395; 42 S.L.R. 299; 12 S.L.T. 606.

(101)

—Last entered vassal still alive—Act 1874, sec. 4—Liability of trustees for composition due by deceased vassal and also for relief as holding for his heir.

A feu charter, dated in 1829, contained a prohibition against subinfeudation, fenced with an irritancy, and a clause providing that disponees of the vassal should be obliged to enter with the superior within a year and day of the disposition in their favour on pain of irritancy of their rights. The redendo clause contained no express stipulation for payment of casualties, or as to the amount payable, on entry. In 1901, A, the vassal who at that time was duly entered and infest in the feu, disposed the subjects to B, who recorded the disposition in the Register of Sasines. B died in 1903, leaving a trust disposition and settlement in favour of trustees, who expedite a notarial instrument in their own favour, which they recorded in 1904. The residuary legatee under B's settlement was B's heir-at-law. In 1905 the superior brought an action against B's trustees for payment of—(1) a casualty of a year's rent due by the deceased B and now due by his trustees as representing him, and (2) a casualty of relief for their own entry as holding for B's heir. Held (1) that as under the conditions of the feu the superior was entitled to compel an entry and payment of entry duty by each disponee within one year of the date of his disposition although the fee was full, B by recording his disposition became personally bound to pay composition, and the defenders as his executors were liable therefor. (2) That B's trustees, being bound to enter within one year by recording the disposition in their favour, became liable as disponees infest for the casualty of relief claimed from them.

Penalty on vassal for failure to enter — Payment of double feu-duty with personal obligation on vassals—Absence of compulsor to force an entry.

By a feu charter the entry both of heirs and of singular successors was taxed, and then followed this provision "and in case his heirs or successors shall fail to take out their charters and entries and grant the personal obligations aftermentioned within six months of their entry, they shall immediately, after expiry of the said six months, be liable and obliged to pay the double of the yearly feu-duty termly ay and until they take out the said charters and entries, and grant personal obligations as after specified." The personal obligations referred to were specified as follows:—"And sicklike declaring always that the said Gilbert More and all succeeding him, and singular successors to him, shall be obliged, within six months after their entry, to grant personal obligations for payment of the said feu and teind duties and all other public burdens." Held that these provisions laid no direct obligation on each heir and singular successor to enter with the superior, and gave the latter no direct compulsor by which he could force an entry, and accordingly that the charter did not exact a casualty upon each transfer or sale.

Singular successor—Statutory transference—Whether transferee singular successor—Poor Law Act, 1845, sec. 52.

In 1844 the magistrates of Glasgow held certain subjects, for behoof of the poor, under feu contracts, which stipulated for an additional year's feu-duty on the entry of singular successors. The Poor Law Amendment Act, 1845, enacted that thereafter the magistrates should either hold such subjects for behoof of the parochial board of the burgh, or convey the same to the board. In 1848 the magistrates of Glasgow conveyed the subjects to the parochial board of the City Parish of Glasgow for behoof of the poor, and they were infeft. The superior having in 1878 called upon the parochial board for the additional feu-duty payable by singular successors, held that the parochial board were singular successors, and as such were bound to pay the composition.

Death of last survivor of statutory trustees entered with superior—Change in constitution of trust—Clyde Navigation Consolidation Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. cxlix).

In 1839 lands were feued to a body of statutory trustees nominatim and their successors in office. In 1840 and in 1858 Acts were passed altering the constitution of the trust and the mode of election of trustees, and enlarging their duties, but making no alteration in the main purpose of the trust. Held, on the death of the last survivor of the trustees of 1839, that there had been no change in the investiture, and that the superiors were not entitled to a casualty.

Statutory provisions as to liability—Part of feu acquired by railway company—Casualty on part taken to be paid by "original proprietor" of such grounds—Proprietor for time being or representatives of proprietor when ground acquired.

The Slamannan Railway Act (5 & 6 Will. IV. c. lv.) provides that casualties effeiring to grounds acquired for the purposes of a railway "shall be paid by the original proprietors of such grounds." A portion of the lands belonging to a feu were acquired under the Act by a railway company. In an action by the superior against the proprietor for the time being of the feu for payment of a casualty of composition effeiring to the ground acquired by the company, the defender pleaded that the Act imposed liability for the casualty not on the proprietor of the feu for the time being, but on the heirs and representatives of the proprietor at the date when the company acquired the ground. Plea repelled.

Brown v Stirling, (O.H.) 1911, 2 S.L.T. 332.

(3) ACTION FOR CASUALTY.

(106)

Proof of superior's title—Identity of lands.

In 1821 A entered with B as his superior in the lands of S. A's predecessors had entered in the same way with B's predecessors in 1740 and 1795. The lands of S were subsequently sold, but no entry was asked by B or his successors from 1821 down to 1879, when B's successor brought an action for payment of a casualty against a singular successor of A. The defender maintained that there was no evidence to establish the identity of the lands of S possessed by him with the lands of which the pursuer held the superiority, and that his lands of S were really held of another subject superior. Held that as the defender had failed to prove that the superiority of his lands of S belonged to some one other than the representative of the superior with whom the previous entries had been made, he was liable in the casualty.

Macdougall v Earl of Breadalbane, 1881, 8 R. (H.L.) 92; 18 S.L.R. 748.

Onus of proof.

The Earl of L., as superior, brought an action for declarator and payment of a casualty against M in respect of certain lands in which M was infeft under a disposition, dated in 1905, in which the lands were described as being part of the lands "of Hillhead, some time possessed by William M'Kay." M's author had been in possession of the lands under an instrument of sasine dated in 1830, in which the lands were described as "the lands of Hillhead . . . some time possessed by William M'Kay," and a charter of confirmation of that sasine had been granted by the Earl of L.'s predecessor as superior in 1832. M defended the action and argued, from a criticism of the measurements and descriptions of the various parcels of land described in the titles, that the portion in dispute could not have formed part of "the lands of Hillhead," of which the Earl of L.'s predecessor had been the superior in 1832. Held that, as there was identity of description in the titles from 1830, the defender could only succeed in his defence by proving affirmatively that the lands in question were parts of other lands of Hillhead held by him from another superior, and that, as he had failed to discharge that onus, and had only raised a doubt whether the lands were in fact held from the pursuer, the pursuer was entitled to decree.

Earl of Loudoun v Morton, 1909 S.C. 880; 46 S.L.R. 519; 1909, 1 S.L.T. 462.

(108)

Onus.

In an action for payment of a casualty of composition, the defender objected to the pursuer's title on the ground that he was not the superior of the lands. Held that the last entry being with the pursuer's author, the defender could only succeed by showing that the superiority was in some one other than the pursuer.

Earl of Morton v Callander, (O.H.) 1914, 2 S.L.T. 383.

Title to sue — Superior succeeding to superiority after casualty fell due.

In an action by a superior against a vassal for payment of the casualty of composition, the defender maintained that the pursuer had no title to sue, because he had succeeded to the superiority after the implied entry of the defender, and if any composition was due it was payable to the executors of the superior's predecessor, and not to him. Held that the title to sue was in the pursuer as superior.

Stewart v Watt, (O.H.) 1899, 7 S.L.T. 253.

——— Bailies of burgh of barony — Title of bailies as themselves superiors or as commissioners for baron.

In an action of declarator by the bailies and clerk of court of a burgh of barony for behoof of the burgesses, and for payment of a casualty, where the only title from the superior which the defender produced was a charter of confirmation granted by the bailies in 1812, "as immediate lawful superiors of the lands after mentioned," in favour of the vassal last vest and seised, and bearing that the subjects confirmed were "to be holden of them and their successors in office for payment of the feu and teind duties and others specified in the original charter of said lands," and where the pursuers produced a charter of confirmation dated in 1670 granted by the baron of the burgh as superior thereof which contained a disposition of the burgh lands to the bailies and burgesses, and which gave power to the former to grant charters and writs by progress, and to infeft and seise the proprietors within the burgh, along with certain other powers and privileges, held, in answer to an objection taken to the title of the pursuers, that the defender's immediate lawful superiors were the bailies for behoof of the burgh, and that the casualty was payable to them as themselves the superiors, and not merely as commissioners for the baron of the burgh.

Bailies of Kirkintilloch v Marshall, 1882, 19 S.L.R. 801.

Effect of implied entry when fee empty—Statutory action for declarator and payment of casualty—Competency — Act 1874, sec. 4 (2), (3), (4).

A feu charter granted in 1835 stipulated for payment of a certain feu-duty, and for payment the first year of entry of each heir or singular successor of double the feu-duty "in name of entry," and subinfeudation was prohibited. These conditions were fenced with an irritant and a resolute clause. The original vassal A died infeft in 1842, and the lands remained in non-entry until 1903, when his heirs were impliedly entered by recording in the Register of Sasines an extract of a decree pronounced in their favour by the Sheriff of Chancery, but they did not pay a casualty. In the same year they disposed part of the subjects to B, a purchaser, who was impliedly entered by recording the disposition in his favour. In an action against B by the superior for declarator and payment of the casualty, raised in the statutory form provided by the Conveyancing Act of 1874, the defenders pleaded that the action was incompetent in this form, and that the only action that could be competently raised against him was an ordinary petitory action founded on the contractual obligations in the feu charter. Held that, as there was no vassal in life who had paid a casualty on entry, and as by the law prior to 1874 a declarator of non-entry could, in these circumstances, have been brought, the present action, as the statutory equivalent of a declarator of non-entry, was competent.

3. RELIEF OR COMPOSITION.

Disposnee tendering heir of last vassal—Extinction of mid-superiorities—Act 1874, sec. 4.

Held that the implied entry given by sec. 4 of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, to a person holding an infeftment on an me vel de me precept unconfirmed, had the feudal effect of extinguishing the mid-superiority, so that it was no longer competent for him to demand an entry in the character (which he possessed) of heir to the mid-superior, although this resulted in his being subjected to a higher casualty than if the Act had not been passed.

Ferrier's Trustees v Bayley, 1877, 4 R. 738; 14 S.L.R. 480.

Extinction of mid-superiorities.

Held that the implied entry given by sec. 4 of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, to a person infet on an a me vel de me precept unconfirmed, had the feudal effect of extinguishing the mid-superiority, so that it was no longer competent for him, on a casualty of composition being demanded, to tender the heir of the vassal last infet for an entry on payment of relief duty merely.

Implied entry of trustees.

A person succeeding by singular title to an estate in land was infet in 1850, and continued to hold the estate till her death in 1881. She was never called on to enter or pay a casualty. She conveyed her whole estates to trustees, who did not take infetment. After her death the superior raised action against her trustees for declarator and payment of one casualty due in respect of the implied entry of the truster on the passing of the Conveyancing Act of 1874, and of another in respect of their own right as trustees. Held that the former was due, but that the trustees being uninfet, and therefore unentered, were entitled to put forward the heir of the truster, and were liable in relief duty only.

Neill v Douglas's Trustees, (O.H.) 1882, 19 S.L.R. 827.

Entry of trustees.

Testamentary trustees took infetment in certain lands in March, 1874, by recording a notarial instrument on an a me vel de me disposition in their favour, their author being the vassal last infet in the lands. Held (1) that by the operation of the 4th section of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, the trustees were entered with the superior, and therefore that the heir of the last entered vassal could not be tendered for an entry; and (2) that the trustees by their implied entry were liable in a composition of a year's rent.

(118)

Entry of disponent from trustees.

A person died infet in certain lands, and duly entered with the superior. His trustees sold the lands, and the purchasers recorded the disposition in their favour in 1876. Held that the disponent, having obtained an entry, became liable for a casualty, and that the subsequent recording of a precept of clare constat, granted by the superior in 1873 in favour of the heir, was ineffectual.

Where implied entry not yet taken.

Held that where a stranger to an investiture having a personal right to lands, in place of making up a feudal title, tenders the heir as vassal, the superior cannot refuse to enter the heir on payment of relief duty.

Disponent heir of last entered vassal—Act 1874, sec. 4.

Effect of registration of marriage contract conveying husband's lands for spouses' conjunct fee and liferent, and wife's liferent alienarily, and for children in fee—Whether change of investiture—Whether husband's heir-at-law (there being no issue) entitled to entry on payment of relief.

By antenuptial marriage contract estates in which the husband was infet were conveyed to the spouses in conjunct fee and liferent, but for the liferent use alienarily of the wife, and to the children of the marriage in fee. The contract was registered in the Register of Sasines in 1878 on behalf of the spouses "for their respective rights of fee and liferent within mentioned." There was no issue of the marriage. The husband died in 1881, survived by his wife, and left a trust disposition conveying the estates to trustees, who conveyed them to his only sister, who was his heir-at-law. She served and was infet as heir-at-law in special to her brother in the estates, and thereafter raised an action to have it declared that she was duly entered with the superior, and that he was bound to accept one year's feu-duty as the casualty payable by her on her entry as an heir. The superior demanded a composition. Held that the heir-at-law was only liable in relief duty, by Lord President Inglis, Lord Deas, and Lord Mure on the grounds (1) that the registration of the marriage contract did not affect the previous infetment of the husband in the fee of the estate, and that his heir-at-law was duly entered as heir of the last vassal; and (2) that it was not relevant to inquire into any personal title she might have under her brother's trust disposition; by Lord Shand, on the ground that, whether the pursuer was to be regarded as an heir under the destination in the marriage contract or not, being heir of line of the last entered vassal she was only liable in relief duty.

Investiture changed.

In 1860 John Hamilton, a proprietor infeft in certain lands, and entered with the superior, disposed them a me vel de me to his brother James D. Hamilton, his heir-presumptive, who took infeftment but did not enter with the superior. On the passing of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, the mid-supremacy was extinguished, and he was impliedly entered with the superior. John Hamilton died in 1877, and James D. Hamilton died in 1886, without having been called upon by the superior to pay a casualty. He left a general disposition and settlement in favour of his brother and heir-at-law, William Hamilton, who was infeft thereon, and thus obtained an implied entry under the Conveyancing Act, 1874. The superior then raised an action against William Hamilton, concluding for declarator "that in consequence of the death of John Hamilton, who died upon the 27th day of February, 1877, and who was vassal last seised in" the lands, "a casualty, being one year's rent of the lands, has become due to" the superior, "and that the said casualty is still unpaid, and that the full rents" after the date of citation belonged to the superior till payment of the casualty. The defender pleaded that the superior was not entitled to a casualty of composition in respect that the defender was heir-at-law of James D. Hamilton and also of John Hamilton. Held by a majority of the whole Court (1) that by James D. Hamilton's statutory entry a new investiture was created, and the prior investiture evacuated; (2) that on the death of John Hamilton a casualty of composition became payable to the superior which could have been exacted from James; and (3) that this casualty not having been paid by James, a casualty of composition was payable by the defender.

Trust for heir.

A vassal infeft in certain lands, and entered with the superior, died in 1865, leaving a trust disposition and settlement, whereby he conveyed his heritable estate to trustees, directing them to hold the same until his youngest child should attain the age of twenty-one, and then to divide it equally among his children, but declaring that if any child died before receiving payment of his share, and without lawful issue, the survivor or survivors should be entitled thereto. He also directed that if all his children predeceased the term of payment without issue, the trustees should on his widow's death realise the estate, and pay the proceeds in such way and manner as he should direct, and failing such direction, to and among his nearest lawful heirs. Power was given to the trustees, "for the better enabling my trustees to carry the foresaid purposes into effect," to sell the estate "when they shall consider it necessary." The truster left only one child, a son, who at the date of his father's death was in pupillarity. In 1865 the trustees were infeft, and by the operation of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, were entered with the superior. In 1883, on the son attaining the age of twenty-one, they conveyed the estate to him in implement of the trust disposition and settlement, and he was infeft. The superior claimed payment of a composition. The heir maintained that he was only liable in relief duty, on the ground that he was his father's heir, and that the trustee had been holding for him. Held by a majority of the whole Court that the casualty to which the superior was entitled was relief and not composition; Lord President Inglis, Lord Justice-Clerk Macdonald, Lords Mure, Rutherford Clark, Lee, M'Laren, and Kinnear being of opinion that there was nothing in the trust settlement or in what followed upon it to affect the defender's right as heir to his father; Lords Adam, Lee, and Kinnear being of opinion that in determining the question of casualty the implied entry of the trustees by the operation of the Conveyancing Act of 1874 was to be disregarded, and that the defender's father was to be regarded as the vassal last seised in the lands, and the defender as his successor, and that accordingly, being his heir-at-law, the defender was only liable in relief.

S, a vassal infeft in certain lands, and entered with the superior, died in 1835. He left a trust disposition by which he conveyed the lands to trustees with alternative holding, directing them to convey and make over the lands, under burden of his widow's liferent, "to and in favour of my eldest son alive at the time of my death, and the heirs of his body; whom failing, my other sons in succession, and the heirs of their bodies respectively"; whom failing, to the testator's daughters in succession, and the heirs of their bodies respectively, the eldest heir female always excluding heirs portioners. The trustees were infeft base in 1837, and in 1852 they disposed the lands with alternative holding to the testator's eldest son alive at the date of his death, viz., "A D S, his heirs and assignees whomsoever," and before 1874 he was infeft on their disposition. By the Act of 1874 the infeftments of the trustees and of A D S were confirmed. In 1887 the superior sued A D S for composition. A D S tendered relief, maintaining that he was only liable in relief in respect that he was the heir-at-law of the truster, and as such heir of the investiture. Held that A D S was not liable for composition, because the trust was one for the continuance of the existing investiture, and did not affect the character and right of A D S as heir.

M, a vassal in certain lands, entered with the superior, died in 1870. He left a trust disposition and settlement by which he conveyed his whole heritable and moveable estates to trustees, directing them to convey them to his only son on his attaining majority, and failing him, to certain other persons specified in their order. Power was given to the trustees to make up titles, and also to sell, "and in general to do . . . everything necessary for the execution of the trust. . . ." The trustees were infeft on the disposition at the time of the passing of the Conveyancing Act, 1874. In 1880, the trustees disposed the estates to the testator's only son, who had attained majority, and he was infeft. In 1887, the superior raised an action against him, concluding for declarator that, in consequence of the death of the testator, "who was the vassal last vest and seised," a casualty of one year's rent of the lands became due at the date of his death, and for payment. The defender tendered a casualty of relief. Held that the trust was one for conveyance to the defender as heir, and not one affecting his radical right as heir, and that the defender, being the heir of the last entered vassal, was only liable for relief duty.

—Conveyancing (Scotland) Acts (1874 and 1879) Amendment Act, 1887, sec. 1.

The testamentary trustees of the last-entered vassal in certain lands were directed to retain the residue of his estate including these lands until his eldest child, if a male, should attain the age of twenty-one, or, if a female, should attain that age or be married, and on the arrival of that period, if the truster then had a son or sons surviving, to hold the lands for behoof of his eldest son, and failing him before attaining the age of twenty-one, for behoof of his next eldest son on his attaining that age, and so on for his sons in the order of seniority. By a codicil the truster gave his widow a liferent of the lands, and postponed until her death the conveyance of the lands to the son who should be entitled to take them. In the event of failure of all the truster's issue under age, there was a bequest of residue, including the lands, to the truster's sister, whom failing to her children equally among them. The truster was survived by his widow and by two sons, the elder of whom was over twenty-one at his father's death. The trustees having made up a title to the lands by notarial instrument, duly recorded in the Register of Sasines, the superior called upon them for payment of a composition of a year's rent in respect of their implied entry. In a special case the Court found that the trustees were liable in relief duty only, holding that under the terms of the trust they had no power to introduce a stranger to the investiture, and, accordingly, that the truster's heir (even assuming that vesting was postponed till the widow's death) had the ultimate beneficial interest in the lands, in the sense of sec. 1 of the Conveyancing Amendment Act, 1887.

—By a trust disposition inter vivos, executed in 1881 and duly recorded in the Register of Sasines, A, who was the entered vassal in certain lands, conveyed these lands to himself and B as trustees. The trustees were directed to hold for the truster's daughter in liferent, for her alimentary use only, and for such of her lawful children as she should appoint in fee. In the event of the daughter dying without issue, the trustees were directed to convey the subjects to the truster or to his heirs or assignees. A died in 1888, survived by his daughter, who was his only child and unmarried. In an action by the superiors against B, as the sole surviving trustee, claiming a composition in respect of the death of A and the implied entry of the trustees, B tendered relief duty only. Held that the superiors were entitled to a composition, in respect that the trustee was a singular successor impliedly entered with the superiors, and that as he did not hold under directions whereby the heir of the last entered vassal had necessarily the ultimate beneficial right to the estate, the right of the superiors to a composition was not excluded either by the law apart from sec. 1 of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Acts (1874 and 1879) Amendment Act, 1887, or by the provisions of that section.

—Moir primus was infeft and entered as vassal in certain lands by virtue of a charter of resignation, the destination in which was to himself and the heirs whatsoever of his body. Moir primus died in 1871 and was succeeded in the lands by Moir secundus, who took infeftment but did not enter. Moir secundus, who was never married, died in 1872, leaving a trust disposition and settlement whereby the lands were conveyed to trustees to hold for the liferent alimentary use of his brother James, and on his death to make them over to his heir in heritage being an heir of his body, whom failing to the testator's other brothers, called in their order, and their heirs in heritage being heirs of their bodies, whom all failing to the truster's heir in heritage whomsoever. The trustees had power to sell the whole or any part of the lands. James, who had a family of sons and daughters, was heir in heritage both of Moir primus and of Moir secundus. The trustees completed a title to the lands by notarial instrument, recorded in 1873, and became impliedly entered by operation of the Conveyancing Act, 1874. The superior claimed a composition from the trustees in respect of the death of Moir primus and of their implied entry. The trustees objected that relief duty only was due. Held that the superior was entitled to a composition, in respect that the infettment and entry of the trustees created a new investiture under which they presently held the fee of the estate for beneficiaries other than the heir of the testator, although by a change of circumstances he might come to have an interest in the fee as a beneficiary, and that the right of the superior to a composition was not excluded by sec. 1 of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Acts (1874 and 1879) Amendment Act, 1887.

—Trustees holding under charter by progress—Entry of trustees completed before 1874—Conveyancing (Scotland) Acts (1874 and 1879) Amendment Act, 1887, sec. 1.

Held that when the superior in a blench holding has not received payment or a tender of the (illusory) relief duty on an implied entry by an heir, he is not precluded by the implied entry from recovering during the heir's lifetime a casualty of composition from a disponee of the heir who has recorded his disposition and obtained an implied entry.

Sec. 1 of the Conveyancing Amendment Act, 1887, limits the liability of trustees holding for an heir in cases where they had entered with the superior before the Act, or should subsequently enter, to relief duty, and, relief duty being paid, allows the heir thereafter to obtain an entry without payment of relief duty. Held that the section did not apply to a transaction completed under the law in force before 1874 by the entry of trustees under a charter from the superior.

—Trust merely burden on fee.

In 1836 the heir then in possession of an estate under a fee simple destination, dated in 1783, in favour of a series of heirs varying in some respects from the legal order of succession, on the narrative that he had resolved to execute a new settlement of his lands and estate, conveyed, mortis causa, the estate to his children nominatim and to the survivors or survivor of them, in trust for the purpose of managing the estate and of dividing the rents among themselves so long as one or more of them existed, and at the termination of the trust "then to and in favour of my heir-at-law at that time in fee." It was further provided that, if it should happen that the last survivor of the children was also the truster's heir-at-law, then, or if that event should not happen, then on the death of that last survivor, the trust should come to an end, and the subjects fall and belong to the truster's heir-at-law at the time of that event. The trustees were further given ordinary powers of administration, but they were prohibited from burdening or selling the subjects. On the death of the granter in 1852, A, his eldest son, completed his title by precept of clare constat as heir of provision to his father under the deed of 1783. The trustees were also infeft under this trust disposition in terms of the precept contained in the deed, which directed sasine to be given to them "in trust as trustees for the ends and purposes, and under the declarations, burdens, conditions, and provisions before specified, and upon the termination of this trust . . . then to my heir-at-law at that time in fee." A having died in 1875, the superior brought an action against the sole surviving trustee under the deed of 1836, concluding for declarator that on A's death a casualty of a year's rent became due by the defender as a singular successor of the last vassal, and impliedly entered with the superior in virtue of the 4th section of the Conveyancing Act of 1874. Held that the trust which was created by the deed of 1836 was purely temporary in its nature, and a mere burden on the fee of the estate, which was vested in A, and on A's death passed into his hereditas jacens.

In another action by the superior founding upon a mortis causa disposition of other subjects granted by the vassal of even date with the former, where the trustees were empowered to sell the subjects conveyed for the benefit of creditors, with a direction, in the event of any of the lands remaining unsold, to convey them to the testamentary trustees in similar terms with the first, a similar judgment was pronounced.

Trust for entail on truster and other heirs of existing investiture—Propulsion of fee to heir apparent.

A, the heir under an existing investiture, who had made up title and paid a casualty of relief, created a trust for the purpose of, by means of an entail, (1) burdening with fettering clauses and certain ultimate destinations the radical right of fee vested in him as his uncle's heir; and (2) restoring the estate thus burdened to him and the other heirs of investiture, a proceeding which did not operate a displacement of the investiture already existing. Thereafter he executed a deed of propulsion of the lands in favour of his own heir-apparent and the other heirs specified in the deed of entail. Held that A was not liable to pay a casualty of composition.

Trust for payment of debts—Act 1874, sec. 4, sub-secs. (1) and (3).

Held (by Lord Kinnear, Ordinary) that the infettment of trustees under a trust disposition for payment of debts with power of sale does not divest the granter of the feudal fee, and that an implied entry obtained by the trustees by recording the disposition does not entitle the superior to a casualty.

—Trust not for the heir of investiture.

By an inter vivos trust disposition dated in 1810, a proprietor (not entered with the superior) of lands inherited from an ancestor who was a singular successor of the last entered vassal, and who held an a me infestment unconfirmed, disposed the lands to trustees for payment of debts and for payment of annuities to himself and his wife for implementing the provisions of any settlement left by him, and finally for reconveyance to himself or his heirs of the lands not sold. Power was given to the trustees to sell with the grantor's written consent. In 1815 the trustees, having obtained decree of adjudication in implement against the trustor's heir, and having been infest thereon, were entered with the superior as trustees, for the purposes of the trust deed only, by a charter of sale, adjudication, and confirmation, which, inter alia, expressly confirmed the infestment of the trustor's ancestor. The trustees paid composition to the superior. In 1860 they granted a disposition of the lands not sold in favour of the trustor's heir-at-law, who was infest thereon, and by the Conveyancing Act, 1874, obtained an entry with the superior. The last surviving trustee having died in 1863, the superior claimed composition. The vassal tendered relief duty. Held that the vassal was bound to pay composition, in respect (1) that if the charter of confirmation obtained by the trustees created a new investiture, it did not operate as an enfranchisement of the trustor's heirs, and that the heir to whom they conveyed was a singular successor to them; (2) that if the trust title did not create a new investiture, but was a mere burden upon the trustor's right, the vassal was not the heir of any investiture recognised by the superior, as his ancestor's infestment had not been confirmed prior to the charter of confirmation obtained by the trustees, and as the confirmation of it contained in that charter was to be regarded as confirming it only to the limited effect of validating the trustees' title.

Trust for distribution—Act 1887, sec. 1.

A conveyed his lands by mortis causa disposition to trustees, with directions to realise them and divide the proceeds. B, who was his heir in conquest, in 1869 obtained a writ of clare constat and disposed the lands to the trustees for the purposes of the trust. On B's death in 1888 the trustees denuded in favour of C, who was in point of fact B's heir. Held that the casualty due on B's death was a composition, the Act of 1887 not contemplating the case where the property was originally conveyed to trustees, not to be handed on to the disponent's heir, but for division among his beneficiaries.

Magistrates of Edinburgh v Melvin, (O.H.)

Inter vivos trust—Act 1887, sec. 1.

A vassal, entered in certain lands in 1881, disposed them to trustees by inter vivos deed for payment of the rents to his wife during her life and thereafter to his daughter during her life, and after her death to convey them to such of her children or their issue as she might appoint, and in the event of the daughter dying without issue to convey them to the trustor or his assignees. The deed was registered in the Register of Sasines. The trustor died in 1888. Held that the trustees were liable to pay a composition on the death of the trustor, the last entered vassal, the Act of 1887 having no application to the circumstances.

Magistrates of Edinburgh v Wright, (O.H.)

(137)

Enfranchisement of destination—Heir of entail.

An institute under a deed of entail obtained an implied entry with the superior by the Conveyancing Act, 1874, and not being an heir alioqui successurus became liable in composition. The superior discharged his claim on payment of relief duty. On the next heir of entail—who was not heir of line—obtaining an implied entry the superior claimed composition. Held that the vassal being the heir of investiture was only liable in relief duty.

Opinion (per Lord Kinnear) that an implied entry must be subject to all the conditions and reservations by which the superior would have been entitled to qualify an express entry by progress.

—Heir of entail.

In 1849 a vassal, on payment of a composition, obtained from his superior a charter of certain lands in favour of himself and his heirs and assignees whomsoever, under which he was duly entered. In 1851 he entailed the lands. The destination in the deed of entail was to himself and the heirs male of his body, whom failing, his younger brother and the heirs male of his body, whom failing, the heirs female of the body of the entailor's grandfather; and after various other substitutions there followed this clause, "The eldest heir female and the descendants of her body always excluding heirs portioners." The deed contained a double manner of holding, and the entailor took infestment de me under it, and held the lands base of himself as mid-superior. In 1860 he propelled the fee of the lands to his only son by disposition in favour of him and the other heirs of entail. The entailor died in 1861, survived by his son, who in 1872, on payment of a casualty of relief, obtained from the superior a writ of confirmation, which confirmed the deed of propulsiion, but also contained a clause of reservation by which the superior reserved to himself and his successors any claim which he or they might have to a composition "whenever the heir of entail to whom the succession shall open shall happen not to be the heir of line of the person who was last entered by me or my forebears." The son died in 1883 without issue, and was succeeded as heir of entail by his cousin, who would also have been the heir under the investiture of 1849, and who obtained an entry upon payment of relief. On the cousin's death in 1907 without issue, a variance for the first time arose between the line of succession under the deed of entail and that under the deed of 1849; the cousin's sister, Miss R., succeeding to the whole lands as heir of entail, while under the deed of 1849 she would have succeeded merely as an heir portioner along with her two sisters. The superior having claimed from Miss R. a composition on her entry to the pro indiviso two-thirds of the lands which, but for the entail, would have fallen to her sisters, held that the tailzied destination had not been enfranchised either by the writ of confirmation of 1872, with its clause of reservation, or by the entry of the cousin, and that as Miss R. was not the heir to two-thirds of the lands under the enfranchised investiture of 1849, she was liable in payment of a composition in respect of her entry thereto.

Partial insertion of destination contained in procuratory—Whether whole destination enfranchised.

By disposition and settlement A disposed his estate, after the heirs of his body, "to B, and the heirs whomsoever of his body; whom failing, to my own nearest heirs whomsoever." A having no heirs of his body, B succeeded to the estate, and made up his title by charter of resignation in 1856. Though the procuratory in A's deed was in accordance with the destination, the charter which B took was only in favour of himself and the heirs whomsoever of his body. Not being A's heir of line, B paid a composition on his entry. On B's death in 1881 without issue, C, as A's nearest heir whomsoever, made up a title to the estate by recording a decree of service as nearest lawful heir of provision in special of B under A's deed. The superior claimed from C, in respect of the implied entry thus obtained, a composition, on the ground that by his charter of resignation of 1856 he had enfranchised no more than the destination inserted in it, and therefore that C was not heir of investiture, but a singular successor, so far as he, the superior, was concerned. C maintained that he was liable in relief duty only, which he tendered. In a special case presented by C and the superior, in which the latter admitted that by recording the service as nearest heir of provision to B under A's deed and the titles following thereon C was duly entered, held that on that assumption relief duty only was due. Opinion (per Lord Shand) that acceptance of resignation on A's procuratory enfranchised the whole destination therein contained though a portion only of it was inserted in the charter of resignation.

Heriot's Hospital v Carnegie, 1884, 12 R. 30; 22 S.L.R. 29.

4. COMPOSITION.

(1) NATURE OF AND RIGHT TO COMPOSITION.

(140)

Whether composition a debitum fundi—Poining of the ground.

The reddendo clause in a feu contract concluded thus: "Doubling the said feu-duty at the entry of each heir or singular successor, exclusive of the current year's feu-duty . . . which sums of entry-money and interest thereupon shall be and are hereby declared to be real burdens on the said subjects . . . and may be sued for and recovered as debita fundi." Held that under the special terms of the contract the compositions payable upon the death of a vassal and entry of a singular successor, validly constituted, were debita fundi, and so might be recovered by a poining of the ground after the feu had passed to singular successors. Opinions reserved whether, apart from special stipulations, composition on the entry of a singular successor was truly a casualty of superiority so as to be a debitum fundi.

Morrison's Trustees v Webster, &c., 1878,
5 R. 800; 15 S.L.R. 559.

(141)

Held that a composition due to a superior on the death of a vassal, where the entry is taxed by the feu contract, is a debitum fundi, and not merely a personal debt of the succeeding vassal.

Casualty—"Casualty of superiority."

Opinion (per Lord Kinnear, Ordinary) that the expression "casualties of superiority" in a feu disposition dated in 1701 did not include composition, in respect composition is not in its origin and character a "casualty," and was not commonly so spoken of at that period.

Right to casualty in question between liferenter and fiar.

In a question between a fiar and a liferenter, held that the fiar had right to a sum paid under a feu contract every twenty-fifth year in lieu of casualties; and also to grassums falling due every twenty-fifth year from lands disposed under contracts of ground annual, as being of the nature of extraordinary profits.

Composition payable by corporation — Act 1874, sec. 5.

By disposition dated and recorded in 1868, a vassal, who was entered with his superior, disposed his feu to a corporation. The vassal died on 5th March, 1877. No composition was demanded from the corporation by the superior till 1900, when a composition was demanded from and paid by the corporation. In October, 1902, the superior brought an action against the corporation for payment of a second composition, pleading that the first composition was payable on 5th March, 1877, the date of the death of the last entered vassal, and, consequently, that a second composition was due twenty-five years thereafter, i.e., 5th March, 1902. Held (1) that the composition demanded and paid in 1900 was not "payable" within the meaning of sec. 5 of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, till it was demanded, and, consequently (2) that a second composition was not due till twenty-five years thereafter, i.e., till 1925.

(146)

Writ of confirmation—Declaration that subjects shall be in non-entry after twenty-five years—Act 1874, sec. 4 (4).

In 1871 the superior of certain lands granted to their vassal, the Carron Company, a writ of confirmation which contained a declaration "that, notwithstanding the granting hereof, the subjects . . . shall fall and be in non-entry at the end of twenty-five years thereafter, so long as the subjects shall be held by the said Carron Company." In an action for declarator and for payment of a casualty, the vassal maintained that the superior, according to the law prior to the Conveyancing Act of 1874, would not have been entitled to bring a declarator of non-entry, and so could not take advantage of the proviso contained in sec. 4 (4) of the Act, in respect that he still had the company as entered vassal, and that the clause in the writ of confirmation, by declaring what was feudally impossible, made no difference. The Lord Ordinary, holding that he was bound to give effect to the true intention and meaning of the parties in granting and accepting the writ of confirmation, which appeared to be to provide for a casualty of composition being payable every twenty-five years, allowed a proof as to the intention of the parties when the writ was granted.

(2) MEASURE OF COMPOSITION.

(147)

On which year's rent casualty to be calculated—Act 1874, sec. 4.

A proprietor of heritable subjects was infeft in them by registration of his disposition in 1873. At this date the last entered vassal had been dead for several years, although the fact was not then ascertained. In 1891 the superior raised an action against the proprietor in statutory form for payment of a casualty, it being by this time ascertained that the last entered vassal had died before 1873. Held that the measure of the casualty was the rent of the year from Whitsunday, 1874, to Whitsunday, 1875, the year in which the statute giving the vassal an implied entry was passed.

(148)

In an action by a superior against a singular successor of a body of trustees for payment of a composition, as due under sec. 5 of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, upon the expiration of twenty-five years after the last payment of a composition by the trustees, held that, in determining the year of which the rental was to be taken for ascertaining the amount of the composition, the twenty-five years fell to be reckoned from the date when the last composition was paid, and not from the date when it became exigible.

Trades Maiden Hospital v Mackersy, 1907 S.C. 73; 44 S.L.R. 45; 14 S.L.T. 400.

Date of death of last entered vassal unknown—Rental of year of implied entry as basis of casualty.

A purchaser of lands was infeft in 1877. The last expressly entered vassal paid a casualty and was entered in 1811. The exact date of his death was unknown, but it was prior to 1859, since when there had been no infeftment in the lands until that of 1877. Held that the casualty payable by the purchaser must be computed on the basis of the rent of the year 1877, and not the rent of the year in which the last entered vassal died.

Observed that had there been any implied entries interposed between the date of the death of the last vassal who paid a casualty, and the implied entry of the vassal from whom the casualty was demanded, the year to be taken would probably have been that of the first intermediate implied entry.

Steuart v Watt, (O.H.) 1899, 7 S.L.T. 253.

(150)

———Year of implied entry—Interest on unpaid composition.

The rent of the feu as at the date of the death of the last entered vassal, and not as at the date of the action of declarator and payment, is the measure of the casualty due by a vassal entered by virtue of the implied entry provided by the Conveyancing Act, 1874, but interest is due only from the date of the summons in the action.

Steuart v Murdoch & Rodger, (O.H.) 1882, 19 S.L.R. 649.

———Year of implied entry—Lands let on lease—Sublease at increased rentals.

Held that the year the rent of which is to be taken as the amount of the casualty due in respect of an implied entry under the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, is the year of the implied entry, and not the year in which the casualty may be demanded.

At the date at which the casualty due in respect of an entry fell to be estimated, the lands were under a lease and the tenant had sublet them at an increased rental. Held that the rent payable under the lease, and not that under the sublease, was to be taken as the measure of the casualty.

Campbell v Stuart, (O.H.) 1884, 22 S.L.R. 292.

———Year of implied entry.

In an action for payment of a casualty the only question was as to the year the rental of which should be taken as the measure of the casualty. The pursuer maintained that the vassal was impliedly entered subsequent to the death of the last vassal who paid a casualty. Held that the casualty fell to be reckoned on the rental of the year of implied entry of the vassal with the superior, and not of the year when the last-entered vassal died, or when the casualty was first demanded.

Campbell v Duncan, (O.H.) 1913, 1 S.L.T. 260.

———Year of implied entry.

In an action for payment of a casualty of composition, held that the rental of the year of the defender's infettment afforded the proper basis for estimating the casualty.

Earl of Morton v Callander, (O.H.) 1914, 2 S.L.T. 383.

“Year’s mail”—Valuation roll—Lands used for asylums.

The Barony Parish Parochial Board acquired, in 1871, the lands of Woodilee, on which they built a large pauper lunatic asylum, capable of accommodating 520 patients. They gave notice to the superior of the property of their intention to redeem the casualties of superiority under the 15th section of the Conveyancing Act, 1874. The

———Valuation roll not conclusive.

In an action by a superior for declarator and for payment of a casualty of composition, where the parties were at issue as to the amount payable, held that the valuation roll was not conclusive as to the annual value of the lands, and that the superior was entitled to a proof.

Duke of Argyll v Bullough, 1904, 6 F. 949; 41 S.L.R. 737; 12 S.L.T. 258.

Building or agricultural value—Act 1469, c. 36.

A vassal disposed a piece of pasture ground for building purposes in consideration of a ground annual. The purchaser before building tendered to the superior the redemption price of the casualties of superiority which were untaxed, calculated on the agricultural rent of the land. The superior maintained that the price ought to be calculated on the annual value of the land as building ground. Held that the yearly mail of the subjects at the date, as defined by the Act 1469, c. 36, was their agricultural value.

School Board of Neilston v Graham, 1887, 15 R. 44; 25 S.L.R. 51.

———Act 1469, c. 36—Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, sec. 15.

A co-operative society purchased a lot of ground with buildings thereon in a street in a town, and demolished the buildings with a view to the erection of new premises for themselves. When the ground was vacant, except for the foundations of the new buildings, the society brought an action against their superior under the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, for redemption of the casualties. They tendered as the redemption price £26 1s. 3d., which sum was reached on the basis of taking the rent which, as the pursuers averred, a builder or contractor would probably give as rent for the ground as vacant ground to be used as a store yard. Held that in calculating the “year’s mail” within the meaning of the Act 1469, c. 36, the ground was to be regarded as building ground, and that, as on the evidence £67 10s. would have been a fair subfeu-duty, that sum, together with 50 per cent. added in terms of sec. 15 of the Act of 1874, viz., £101 5s., was the amount payable for the redemption of the casualties.

(158)

Mineral rents—Whether to be included in valuing composition.

Held that in estimating the composition payable to a superior for an entry the annual value of the minerals in the course of being worked falls to be included in the rental.

Allan's Trustees v Duke of Hamilton, 1878, 5 R. 510; 15 S.L.R. 279.

Minerals let for term of years at fixed rent.

Where minerals were let for a term of years at a fixed rent, and were only being worked to a small extent, held that the actual rent was to be taken as the basis of the composition due to the superior, and the vassal was not entitled to have the value of the mineral rents capitalised and a percentage on that capital value taken.

Increased working.

The proprietor of lands died on 8th November, 1872, infest and duly entered with the superior. The trustee under his settlement made up his title by notarial instrument, recorded 9th July, 1873, and sold the lands by disposition, dated 10th, and recorded in the Register of Sasines 15th November, 1876. The entry being untaxed, the superior demanded a composition of a year's rent from the disponees, and on 8th May, 1877, raised an action to enforce his demand. The estate contained minerals, which were being worked to a much larger extent by the disponees than by the last vassal. The Court adopted as the basis for calculating the casualty a sum equal to the year's purchase of the average mineral rents payable for the three years ending Whitsunday, 1874, and took interest on this capital sum at 4 per cent. as the year's rent payable for the composition.

Approaching exhaustion of minerals —Acts 1469, c. 36, 1669, c. 18, and 20 Geo. II. c. 50.

Held (1) that the measure of the composition payable to a superior for the compulsory entry of an appriser fixed by the Act 1469 at "a zeirs mail, as the land is set for the time," remained the measure of the composition payable to a superior when the right to enforce an entry was given by statute to other singular successors; (2) that the year's rent included the money rent and royalties derived from minerals; (3) that the year's rent of minerals was the money rent and royalties actually due to the vassal for the year, without regard to the exhaustion of the minerals.

Earl of Home v Lord Belhaven and Stenton, 1903, 5 F. (H.L.) 13; [1903] A.C. 327; 40 S.L.R. 607; 11 S.L.T. 44.

(162)

Unlet shootings.

When shootings are of such value that they might bring a rent if let, their value must be taken into account in computing the "year's mail as the land is set for the time," payable as a composition on the entry of a vassal under the Act 1469, c. 36.

(163)

Machinery in chemical works—Heritable or moveable.

In estimating the amount of casualty due by a vassal to his superior the rule for determining what are fixtures is that applicable to cases between landlord and tenant, and not that which governs cases of heir and executor.

(164)

Composition payable by railway company
—Mode of ascertaining annual value of part of line.

Opinion that an equitable mode of ascertaining the annual value of a part of a line of railway, for the purpose of calculating the composition payable to the superior, would be to take 4 per cent. on the price paid for the land (excluding severance damages and the price paid in respect of compulsory sale) and in the amount expended on the land in the construction of that part of the line, and to deduct from the percentage so obtained feu-duty and public burdens, and such an amount for maintenance and repair as would naturally fall on the landlord if the subjects were let.

Hill v Caledonian Railway Co., 1877, 5 R. 386.

(165)

Composition payable in respect of land compulsorily acquired for waterworks—Method of computing annual value.

Held that in calculating the amount of composition payable in respect of lands which had been taken compulsorily as a site for waterworks the annual value should be ascertained by taking 4 per cent. on the price paid for the land (excluding severance damages and the extra price paid in respect of compulsory sale) and the amount expended on construction, and deducting from the percentage so obtained feu-duty and public burdens, and the cost of maintenance and repair so far as it would fall on the landlord if the subjects were let.

Campbell v Northern District Committee of Ayrshire County Council, (O.H.) 1904, 12 S.L.T. 160.

(166)

Mid-superiority—Part redemption of sub-feu-duty—Measure of composition due on entry to mid-superiority.

In 1817 a vassal sub-feued his lands for a feu-duty of £20, which was an adequate return on the value of the lands as at that date. The feu-duty was subsequently redeemed to the extent of £19 15s., in virtue of a proviso in the feu disposition, by payment at the rate of twenty years' purchase. On the entry of a singular successor to the mid-superiority in 1908 the superior, on the ground that the existing sub-feu-duty of 5s. was illusory, demanded payment of a composition of one year's rent of the lands, amounting to £936. The singular successor tendered £20, either as representing the original sub-feu-duty, or as representing the existing sub-feu-duty of 5s., plus 5 per cent. on the redemption price paid. Held (by a Court of seven judges) that the superior was not entitled to a composition of a year's rent, but was bound to accept the £20 tendered.

Governors of George Heriot's Trust v Paton's Trustees, 1912 S.C. 1123; 49 S.L.R. 852; 1912, 2 S.L.T. 116.

Nominal feu-duty—Measure of composition due on entry to mid-superiority.

In 1847 lands of the annual value of between £85 and £102 were subfeued for a feu-duty of £1. No grassum was taken. In 1915, when the annual value of the lands was £192 7s., the over-superiors, in terms of the Feudal Casualties (Scotland) Act, 1914, required their vassals, the mid-superiors, to redeem the casualties exigible in respect of their interest in the lands. In an action of declarator at the instance of the over-superiors against the mid-superiors the pursuers maintained that the measure of the composition payable to them was the annual value of the lands in 1915. The defenders maintained that the measure of the composition was the subfeu-duty. Neither party maintained that the composition should be measured by the annual value of the lands at the date of the subfeu. Held, by a majority of the whole Court, that in the special circumstances of the case the superiors were only entitled to the sum of £1, the amount of the subfeu-duty, in name of composition.

Mason v Ritchie's Trustees, 1918 S.C. 466; 55 S.L.R. 454; 1918, 1 S.L.T. 351.

Elusory feu-duty and grassum—Grassum representing value of two combined estates—Measure of composition due on entry to mid-superiority—Rate of interest on grassum.

A vassal, who held adjacent lands from different superiors, subfeued the lands (on which there was a quantity of mature growing timber) as one estate for an unapportioned grassum of £54,000 and an elusory feu-duty of 1s. per annum. An action was brought at the instance of one of the superiors against the vassal, under the Feudal Casualties (Scotland) Act, 1914, for redemption of the casualties affecting the portion of the estate of which the pursuer was the superior. The defender, who averred that, by combining the two portions of the estate, he had been able to obtain a grassum very much larger in amount than the cumulo grassum or price which could have been got by disposing of them separately, and that part of the grassum represented the value of the timber, maintained that the grassum which he had obtained fell to be ignored, and that the measure of the composition payable to the pursuer was the annual rental of the lands of which he was superior, considered as a separate subject. Held (1) that the composition fell to be calculated on the basis of a year's interest on so much of the grassum paid for the whole estate as effeired to the portion of which the pursuer was superior; (2) that, as the growing timber was part of the land for which the grassum had been paid, its value was not deductible for the purposes of the calculation; and (3) that, in the absence of any relevant averments that a different rate should be applied, the rate of interest to be taken was 5 per cent., in accordance with the rule in Campbell v Westera, 1832, 10 S. 734, although that rate brought out, in the result, a sum larger than the rental at the date of the subfeu.

Casualty stipulated in long lease—"One year's real rent."

Where under a lease for 999 years the landlord was entitled to a casualty of "one year's real rent" at the entry of an heir "in the same way as is used in feu-holdings," held that "one year's real rent" meant only a duplicand of the tack-duty.

Buchanan's Trustees v Pagan, 1868, 7 M. 1; 41 J. 4; 6 S.L.R. 1.

(170)

Crown vassal—Redemption of casualties—Feudal Casualties (Scotland) Act, 1914, sec. 5.

Held that the Crown, on entering a singular successor of the last entered vassal in a Crown holding, is not entitled to a composition of a year's rent of the lands, whether such successor takes the lands by legal diligence or by voluntary transfer. Held accordingly that, in calculating the compensation payable upon redemption of the casualties of a Crown holding in terms of the Feudal Casualties (Scotland) Act, 1914, where the "highest casualty," in the sense of sec. 5 (1) (a) was a composition, the composition did not fall to be taken as a year's rent of the lands, but was limited to one-sixth of the valued rent.

(171)

Non-entry—Practice of Barons of Exchequer to remit duties.

Held that it was not a relevant objection to a claim by the Crown for arrears of non-entry duties, that the Barons of Exchequer were in the practice of remitting the duties in similar cases.

Earl of Aberdeen v Lord Advocate, 1874, 18 S.L.R. 726.

5. TAXED ENTRY.

(172)

Entry untaxed in original charter—Entry taxed in charter by progress—Prescriptive possession on later charter.

In a charter of resignation granted in 1843, the entry of singular successors was taxed at double the feu-duty. In the original charter the entry of singular successors was untaxed. The vassal infeft and entered in 1843 having died, his trustees, who were singular successors, were called upon in 1890 to pay a year's rent as composition. They pleaded possession for the prescriptive period upon the charter of 1843. Held that there being disconformity between the original charter and the charter by progress, the former must rule, and that prescription did not apply, there having been no possession inconsistent with the superior's claim.

Rankine v Rollo's Trustees, (O.H.) 1890, 28 S.L.R. 594.

Stipulation for duplicand of feu-duty every twenty-five years—Whether in full of all casualties.

A feu-contract, dated before the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, contained in the dispositive clause a stipulation in the following terms—"Besides making payment of the said yearly feu-duty at the terms after mentioned, the said . . . shall be bound to pay a duplication of the said feu-duty at the expiry of every twenty-fifth year, commencing, &c." The reddendo clause contained a stipulation for the annual feu-duty only. Held that the duplication of the feu-duty was to be regarded as in full of all casualties payable ex lege, although there were no express words to that effect.

Magistrates of Dundee v Duncan, &c., 1883, 11 R. 145; 21 S.L.R. 107.

Whether taxation of entry of "assignees" applicable to disponees or only to assignees before infeftment.

A vassal who held lands under old charters in favour of disponees, "their heirs and assignees," and by which the duties payable at entry of "heirs and assignees" were taxed at double the feu-duty, obtained in 1858 a charter of confirmation and novodamus. The clauses of confirmation and novodamus were in favour of the vassal, "his heirs and assignees whomsoever, excluding assignees before infeftment." The duties payable at the entry of "heirs and assignees" were taxed at double the feu-duty. In an action of declarator of non-entry brought by the superior, held (1) that the taxing clause in the earlier charters must be read as applicable only to assignees before infeftment, and not as applicable to disponees; and (2) that the taxing clause must receive the same construction in the charter of novodamus, in respect that it did not appear that the terms of the entry were intended to be altered. Question, whether in the construction of a charter it is competent to refer to the previous negotiations of the parties when a reference to these negotiations is made in the charter.

(175)

By a feu-contract dated in 1631, a superior feued a certain parcel of lands to three of his kindly tenants and their "aires whatsoever (or assignayes, wha shall not exceed three chalders victuall in yeirlie standant rent)." The superior bound himself to receive the vassals and their heirs in and to the said lands, and also, "ony tenant that shall happen to buy the same frae the saids persons, or ony of them or yr forsd (the buyers yrof not exceeding the rank above wryttine) . . . for payment of tenn pounds money for yr entrie to ilk five shilling land forsaid, and accepting ane new conqueiser yrintill." In 1886, after the feu-right had been more than once sold, the superior demanded a year's rent of the subjects as composition from a singular successor in the feu, entered by implied entry under the Conveyancing Act, 1874. The vassal tendered £10 Scots, and maintained that he was entitled to the benefit of the taxed entry. The only other heritable property belonging to him was a subject in Glasgow, the agricultural value of which was trifling, although it was valuable in other ways. Held (1) that although the superior had no longer an interest to exclude vassals above the rank of three chalders men, a vassal of that rank was yet entitled to claim the benefit of the taxation; and (2) that the defender was entitled to the benefit of the taxed entry, (a) because "assignayes" was intended to include any disponees of the real right after infeftment, and (b) because the agricultural value of their property was the only measure by which the "three chalders victual in annual rent" could be determined.

(176)

Taxation at different amounts for entries of heirs and singular successors—Lands acquired by corporation—Act 1874, sec. 5.

A municipal corporation was infeft in a feu under a feu disposition in its favour in terms of which the superior had an effectual claim to a casualty on the occasion of each sale or transfer of the feu as well as on the occasion of the death of a vassal. The casualties were taxed, double the feu-duty being payable at the entry of an heir and treble the feu-duty at the entry of a singular successor. Held that sec. 5 of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, applied, and that the corporation was liable to pay composition at the end of every fifteen years from the date of the acquisition by it of the feu.

Sec. 5 of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, interpreted.

Taxed composition for "successors in office"—School board succeeding to body of school trustees—Singular successors.

In 1810 a feu of a piece of ground in Leith, with a school erected thereon, was granted to nineteen persons nominatim, "and to their successors in office, as trustees, managers, and patrons of the said school," the feu charter providing that so long as the subjects were held for the purpose of a school by the grantees "and their successors in office" the only composition payable should be a composition "of one pound sterling, and that at the end of every twenty-five years." Circumstances in which held on a composition becoming due in 1910, that the School Board of Leith were the "successors in office" of the original vassals within the meaning and intent of the charter, and that accordingly, whether they were or were not "singular successors," they were liable only in the taxed composition of £1.

Blench holding—"Successors."

The tenendas clause of a disposition of lands bore that the lands were to be held "in free blench farm for yearly payment of one penny Scots money . . . if the same be asked allenarly, in lieu of the entry of heirs and successors and other casualties of superiority." Held, on a construction of the whole deed, that the term "successors" in the above clause was to be read as including singular successors, and the term "other casualties of superiority" as including composition, and accordingly that singular successors were relieved from payment of composition.

Meaning of "duplicand"—"And further to pay" a duplicand every twenty years.

A feu-contract, by which certain areas of building ground were feued, took the vassals bound to pay a feu-duty of stated amount by equal portions at Whitsunday and Martinmas in each year, "And further to pay . . . a duplicand of the said . . . feu-duty at the termination of every period of twenty years." Held (1) that the term "duplicand" meant a sum of double the yearly feu-duty; (2) (per Lord Buck-master, L.C., and Lord Dunedin, diss. Viscount Finlay and Lord Atkinson) that, on a construction of the feu-contract, the vassal was bound every twentieth year to pay the duplicand in addition to the feu-duty for the year.

Commercial Union Assurance Co. v Waddell, 1919 S.C. (H.L.) 38; 56 S.L.R. 320; 1919, 1 S.L.T. 266.

—A few charter, besides providing for annual feu-duties of stated amount payable in equal portions at Whitsunday and Martinmas in each year, imposed this obligation on the vassal, "and paying a duplicand of the said feu-duties" at the term of Whitsunday in every nineteenth year "in lieu of casualties, with interest and penalties in case of failure if incurred all as provided with regard to said feu-duties." Held (by a majority of a Court of seven judges) that the sum payable by the vassal every nineteenth year as duplicand was a sum equal to twice the amount of the annual feu-duties in addition to the feu-duties for the year.

Adam v Finlay, 1917 S.C. 464; 54 S.L.R. 388; 1917, 1 S.L.T. 235.

"As also to pay the double of the yearly feu-duty every nineteenth year"—Whether twice or three times the feu-duty due—Discharge—Singular successor.

By a feu-disposition to certain lands with entry at Whitsunday, 1805, the vassal was taken bound to pay a feu-duty of £248 18s. 2d. "yearly at the said term of Whitsunday . . . As also to pay to me," the superior, "and my foresaids, at the term of Whitsunday, 1824, the sum of £497 16s. 4d. sterling, being the double of the said yearly feu-duty which will then be due for the said whole subjects, and also to pay to me," the superior, "and my foresaids, every nineteenth year (counting from the said term of Whitsunday, 1824) the said sum of £497 16s. 4d. sterling, being the double of the said yearly feu-duty which will then be due for the whole subjects above mentioned, and so forth, doubling the said yearly feu-duty every nineteenth year, counting from Whitsunday, 1824, but that only for each nineteenth year as the same comes round." The feu-disposition further bound the superior to enter as vassals the heirs, disponees, or singular successors of the vassal without demanding or being entitled to exact any composition whatever, "in regard that the foresaid feu-duty, together with the double thereof in every nineteenth year, . . . are the agreed and fixed consideration hereby accepted of in lieu of all compositions for the entries of heirs, disponees, and singular successors in the foresaid lands and others." Held that the sum of £497 16s. 4d. due every nineteenth year was not in addition to the yearly feu-duty for the year, but included that feu-duty.

In each of the first four nineteenth years, viz., 1824, 1843, 1862, 1881, the vassals paid £497 16s. 4d., being two feu-duties in all to the superiors. For 1881 the superiors granted a receipt which bore (1) that £248 18s. 2d. had been paid by the vassals as "money feu," and (2) that £248 18s. 2d. had been paid as "double feu." In 1900 the vassal (a singular successor of the vassals of 1881) paid £497 16s. 4d. in addition to the feu-duty of £248 18s. 2d. for the year. The receipt bore that the £497 16s. 4d. was in payment of "casualty" due at Whitsunday, 1900. Held (per Lord Stormonth-Darling, Ordinary) (on the assumption that three times the annual feu-duty was due every nineteenth year) that the receipts did not imply a discharge of arrears, and that the arrears might be exacted from a singular successor. Opinion (per Lord Moncreiff) that the receipt for 1881 imported a complete settlement of all sums then due to the superior.

Alexander's Trustees v Muir, 1903, 5 F. 406; 40 S.L.R. 316; 10 S.L.T. 563.

"Double" of feu-duty.

A feu-contract, by which certain building lots were conveyed, provided for an annual feu-duty of stated amount in respect of each lot, payable by equal portions at Whitsunday and Martinmas in each year. The feu-contract imposed this further obligation on the vassals—"as also paying to" the superior "a double of the said respective feu-duties before mentioned in name of composition at the expiry of every twenty-two years from the" term of Whitsunday from which the feu-duty in each case commenced to run. Held that the sum payable in name of composition was, in each case, a sum equivalent to double of the annual feu-duty, over and above the half-year's feu-duty due at the term at which the composition fell to be paid.

Governors of George Heriot's Trust v Lawrie's Trustees, 1912 S.C. 875; 49 S.L.R. 561; 1912, 1 S.L.T. 379.

Meaning of "duplication" — Ground annual.

A contract of ground annual, after stipulating for a ground rent or ground annual payable at two terms in each year by equal portions, proceeded thus—"And also under the real lien and burden of the payment of a duplication of the said ground rent or ground annual in respect of the said subjects in name of grassum therefor at the expiry of every nineteenth year from and after the term of Martinmas, 1877, over and above the ground rent or ground annual payable for the said subjects thereby disposed, and that for the year then current, but for that year only. . . ." Held that the sum payable every nineteenth year as grassum was a sum equal to one year's ground annual in addition to the ground annual for the year.

Murray v Bruce, 1917 S.C. 623; 54 S.L.R. 525; 1917, 2 S.L.T. 34.

Duplicands of Feu-Duties (Scotland) Act, 1920, secs. 4 and 5—Duplicand falling due before passing of Act.

A duplicand became due at Whitsunday, 1920, before the passing of the Duplicands of Feu-Duties (Scotland) Act, 1920. That Act provides that in a case where the superior shall have accepted payment of one year's feu-duty only over and above the feu-duty for the year, the amount of the casualty shall be deemed to be the amount of one year's feu-duty only. The superior had accepted one year's feu-duty as the casualty payable in 1899. Held that the superior was only entitled to demand as casualty one year's feu-duty over and above the feu-duty of the year.

Warrender's Trustees v Lauder's Trustees, (O.H.) 1921, 2 S.L.T. 136.

6. REDEMPTION OF CASUALTIES.

(1) CONVEYANCING ACT, 1874, sec. 15.

[For Redemption Price see V. 4 (2), supra.]

(185)

Disposnee of unentered vassal—Entered vassal still alive—Right of disposnee to redeem casualties.

An original feu-disposition granted in 1833, which did not stipulate for payment of any casualty on a sale or transfer of the property, contained a clause excluding subinfeudation, fenced by an irritancy. The vassal was duly infeft. After various conveyances of the feu-right to disponees who did not enter with the superior, a disponee, infeft on a disposition which did not express the manner of holding, raised an action against the superior concluding for declarator that the feu was not in non-entry, the original vassal being still alive, and that the pursuer was entitled to redeem the casualties on payment of a year's rent of the subjects and 50 per cent. additional, under sec. 15 of the Conveyancing Act of 1874. Held (1) that the pursuer had a title to sue, the Act of 1874 expressly operating as a confirmation of his infeftment, and giving an implied entry; and (2) that as the superior could not compel an entry except on the death of a vassal, the pursuer was entitled to redeem at the price stated by him.

Morris v Brisbane, 1877, 4 R. 515; 14 S.L.R. 369.

Disposnee impliedly entered in part of a feu—Right to redeem casualty applicable to his own part.

Held that a proprietor of part of a feu, who was entered with the superior by the operation of sec. 4 of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, was entitled, under sec. 15 of the Act, to redeem the casualty of composition in so far as applicable to his part of the feu, negating the superior's plea that he could only redeem the casualty applicable to the entire feu, as set forth in the last charter.

Magistrates of Edinburgh v Edinburgh Hoperie and Sailcloth Co., 1878, 6 R. (H.L.) 1; 4 App.Cas. 87; 16 S.L.R. 127.

(187)

Offer to redeem part of lands held of superior—Tender of specific sum or "such other sum as shall be found to be the true amount"—Competency of decree for amount due on all lands held of superior.

The vassals in part of an estate brought an action against the superiors for declarator that they were entitled to redeem the casualties on payment of a certain sum, "or in the event of the defenders establishing any valid objection to the said amount, then of such other sum as shall be found in the process to follow hereon to be the true amount." The superiors stated in defence that the pursuers were their vassals in other parts of the estate, and, accordingly, that the action was incompetent, a vassal not being entitled to redeem the casualties of a part only of the lands held by him of his superior. Held that in view of the conclusions of the summons it was competent to grant decree of redemption in respect of all the portions of the estate which the pursuers held of the defenders as superiors.

Aberdeen Land Association v Magistrates of Aberdeen, 1904, 6 F. 1067; 41 S.L.R. 647; 11 S.L.T. 640.

Two estates held together of one superior—Action by vassal to redeem casualties applicable to one estate.

By feu charter, dated 1730, a superior feued out to a vassal two subjects, consisting of the lands of Colsayseat, and a piece of muir ground, described as adjoining the said lands. The two subjects were separately described in the feu charter, but the muir ground was declared in the tenendas and other clauses of the charter as well as in the precept of sasine, to be part and pertinent of the said lands of Colsayseat. In the reddendo clause the vassal was taken bound to pay to the superiors "for the said lands of Colsayseat and pertinent thereof, and the said piece of muir ground now annexed thereto as part and pertinent thereof, the sum of £14 Scots money (viz., £6 for the said lands of Colsayseat and £8 for the said piece of muir ground annexed thereto) . . . doubling the said feu-duty at the entry of every heir to the said lands with the pertinents."

In an action raised for the redemption of casualties effeiring to the muir ground alone, by the successor to the original vassal in both subjects, held (1) that the two subjects did not form separate holdings; and (2) that the vassal was not entitled to redeem the casualties incident to one part of his feu only.

Payment of outstanding casualties.

The Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, sec. 15, which deals with the redemption of casualties by vassals, contains this proviso—"And provided always that before any such redemption, otherwise than by agreement, shall be allowed, any casualty which has become due shall be paid." Held (per Lord Dundas, Ordinary) that where agreement has failed and the vassal has brought an action against the superior for redemption of the casualties, the fact that a casualty is due and outstanding at the raising of the action does not make the action incompetent or premature, and that the casualty may be paid at any time before decree.

Pollokshaws Co-operative Society v Stirling-Maxwell, 1906, 8 F. 638; 43 S.L.R. 375; 13 S.L.T. 781.

(190)

Date of redemption.

Held (per Lord Dundas, Ordinary) that the "date of redemption" is the date of signeting the summons in an action for redemption of the casualties.

(191)

Lands sold—Sale not intimated to the superior.

In an action for redemption of casualties held by Lord Low, Ordinary, and acquiesced in, that a vassal was not bound to redeem the casualties applicable to portions of his feu which he had sold and in which he was no longer vassal, although he had not given notice of change of ownership in terms of sec. 4 (2) of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874.

(192)

Measure of amount—Progressive feu-duty—Feu-duty not yet exigible—Repayment of expenditure from sub-vassals.

A vassal brought an action for redemption of the casualty of non-entry which was untaxed. A portion of his feu had been sub-feued for a blench duty and a grassum. Held that the measure of the casualty applicable to this portion was the actual rent of the land at the date of the raising of the action.

The vassal had sub-feued another portion of the feu for a progressive feu-duty of £26 in the first year, £52 in the second year, £78 in the third year, and £104 a year thereafter. The action was raised in the first year. Held that £26 was the measure of the casualty applicable to this portion of the feu.

The vassal had sub-feued another portion of the feu for £50, but no feu-duty was to be exigible for two years after the date of the feu-disposition. The action was raised in the second year. Held that £50 was the measure of the casualty applicable to this portion of the feu.

In certain of his sub-feus the vassal had taken the sub-vassals bound to repay him a proportion of the expenses incurred by him in forming streets. Held that this payment did not fall to be taken into account in calculating the amount of the casualty.

(195)

Joint action by superiors—Vassal holding adjacent lands from different superiors—Lands subfeued as one estate—Plurality of pursuers—Community of interest—Competency of action—Amendment.

A vassal, who had acquired adjacent lands in feu from different superiors, subfeued the lands as one estate for a single unapportioned grassum with an elusory and unallocated feu-duty. The superiors of the two portions brought a joint action against the vassal for redemption of the casualties affecting each portion. The boundaries between the two portions of the estate were not easily ascertainable, but had been adjusted by the superiors for the purposes of the action. Held (1) that a joint action was incompetent, in respect that the pursuers had not a common interest in the redemption of each other's casualties; (2) that the action might be amended by striking out one set of pursuers.

Stipulations introduced in charter by progress—Minerals.

Bain v Duke of Hamilton, 1867, 6 M. 1; 40 J. 4; 5 S.L.R. 2. MINES AND MINERALS, No. 59.

(197)

Minerals.

A was infeft upon a feu contract by which certain lands were conveyed to him without reservation of mines and minerals. Upon A's death his son B was infeft in the lands upon a precept of clare constat, which contained an express exception and reservation of the mines and minerals to the superior. Upon B's death his son C, having been infeft in the said lands, sold them. Subsequently D, having served heir in special in the mines and minerals to A, brought an action of declarator of his right to them against the superior and the proprietors of the dominium utile of the lands, on the ground that they still remained in hæreditate jacente of A. Held that the exception and reservation of mines and minerals in the precept of clare constat was inept, and did not limit the precept as a warrant for infeftment in the fee of the lands, and therefore that there was nothing in hæreditate jacente of A which D by service to him could take up.

(198)

Novodamus—Terms of entry.

A vassal who held lands under old charters in favour of dispoones, "their heirs and assignees," and by which the duties payable at entry of "heirs and assignees" were taxed at double the feu-duty, obtained a charter of confirmation and novodamus in favour of "his heirs and assignees whomsoever, excluding assignees before infeftment," in which the duties payable at the entry of "heirs and assignees" were taxed at double the feu-duty. Held that the taxing clause must receive the same construction in the charter of novodamus as in the old charter, in respect that it did not appear that the terms of entry were intended to be altered.

Magistrates of Inverkeithing v Ross, 1874, 2 R. 48; 12 S.L.R. 21.

Obligation to accept feu charter containing clauses usual on the estate—Reservation of minerals to superior.

A person agreed to accept a feu contract containing "the usual clauses inserted in feu contracts in connection with the estates of X." Held that the person was bound to accept a feu contract containing a clause reserving to the proprietor the right to work minerals and exempting him from any liability for damage occasioned by sits or draw, or for injuries of any kind caused by working of the minerals to houses, buildings, walls, steam engines, plant or machinery.

Alexander v Ormiston, 1895, (O.H.) 3 S.L.T. 139.

(200)

Obligation to make road—Counter obligations—Superior disabling himself from fulfilling counter obligations—Discharge of obligation—Assignment of obligation.

B's trustees, the proprietors of the estate of B, laid it out for feuing according to a plan which showed continuous streets and sewers. In 1871 they feued part of the estate to Messrs. Hannay by a feu contract which embodied the plan and contained an obligation by the vassals to make, inter alia, a street and sewer to their eastern boundary, and to allow the superiors and the feuars on their remaining lands to use them; and on the other hand, B's trustees bound themselves to allow the Hannays and their successors to use the streets and sewers formed or to be formed on the remaining parts of the estate, and to insert clauses to secure this in any future conveyance of any parts of their remaining lands. In 1877 B's trustees conveyed to Stevenson the plenum dominium of part of the estate adjoining Hannays' feu on the east, by a disposition unqualified by any obligation or restriction in favour of Hannays' feu. In an action brought by Stevenson against Hannays' successors to compel them to form the street, held that the obligation in favour of B's trustees had been extinguished by their granting the unqualified disposition of 1877. Opinions, that if the right which B's trustees acquired as Hannays' superiors for the benefit of their remaining lands had not been lost, the conveyance to Stevenson would have carried with the lands conveyed to him a right to demand implement of the obligation from Hannays' successors.

Stevenson v Steel Co. of Scotland, 1899, 1 F. (H.L.) 91; 36 S.L.R. 946.

Obligation by superior to take subsequent feuars bound to relieve vassals of certain expenditure — Unfeued ground acquired by railway company under statutory powers—Disposition to railway company containing no clause of relief of vassals.

A superior feued part of his lands to a school board by feu charter, wherein he took them bound to form a road. After stipulating that the vassals should maintain this road until the ground on the opposite side was feued, the feu charter proceeded thus:—"Whereupon the feuars there shall be bound, and I shall take them bound, to pay . . . one-half of the cost of constructing said proposed new road . . . and I shall also take them bound to relieve my said disponees of one-half of the future maintenance thereof." The land on the opposite side of the road was not feued by the superior, but was acquired by a railway company under compulsory powers, and conveyed to them by a disposition in statutory form, in which no clause of relief in favour of the school board was inserted. Certain portions of this ground, having become superfluous, were afterwards sold by the railway company, and feued by their disponees, the feu charters containing no clauses of relief with regard to the road. The school board having brought an action against the superior for damages, held that the superior had committed a breach of contract and was liable in damages.

Leith School Board v Rattray's Trustees, 1918 S.C. 94; 55 S.L.R. 133; 1917, 2 S.L.T. 247.

Right of pre-emption—Condition fenced with irritancy—Enforcement against singular successor.

A feu disposition provided that it should not be lawful for the disponee or his heirs and assignees to set or dispose of the subjects until they had first offered to sell them at the same price to the disponer or his heirs and successors under the penalty of incurring an irritancy.

In an action by the superior against a singular successor of the disponee for declarator of the pursuer's right of pre-emption, held that though the irritancy was not valid against singular successors, the right had been validly created a real burden; and decree granted.

Christie v Jackson, (O.H.) 1898, 6 S.L.T. 245.

(203)

Use of plan to interpret obligations.

Opinion reserved as to whether a plan annexed to a feu contract might be used for the elucidation of obligations as well as for the identification of the feu.

Gibson Maitland v Kennedy, 1901, 9 S.L.T. 120.

2. TRANSMISSION OF OBLIGATION.

(204)

Obligation on vassal, his heirs, executors, and successors, conjunctly and severally.

A feu contract bore that the vassal "binds and obliges himself, his heirs, executors, and successors whomsoever, conjunctly and severally," to pay feu-duties and implement certain other obligations.

Held that the personal obligation remained effectual on him and his representatives in perpetuity, notwithstanding that he had disposed the feu to a singular successor, who was duly infeft and entered with superior.

Dundee Police Commissioners v Straton, 1884, 11 R. 586; 21 S.L.R. 410.

Obligation to build within a certain period—Liability of singular successor.

A, a vassal under a feu contract, conveyed part of his feu by contract of ground annual to B, with and under the burdens and conditions contained in the feu contract, and further under an obligation to erect certain buildings on the ground within one year from the term of entry, in order to secure payment of the ground annual and of the share of the feu-duty, &c., which had been allocated upon the ground disposed, and to maintain the buildings in good order and repair in all time. B bound himself and "his heirs, executors, and representatives whomsoever, and his assignees," to perform these conditions, and they were declared to be real burdens upon the subjects disposed, and appointed to be recorded in the Register of Sasines. B subsequently disposed the subjects to C, and six years after the date of the contract of ground-annual C disposed them to D, the disposition being in each case "with and under the real liens and burdens, conditions, provisions, and others specified and contained in said contract of ground-annual." The trustee upon A's sequestrated estate having raised an action against D, to have it found that he was bound to implement the obligations in the feu contract, and the obligation in the contract of ground-annual, as to the erection and subsequent maintenance of buildings, held (1) that as the pursuer was not a party to the feu-contract he had no title to sue upon it; and (2) that in so far as the contract of ground-annual was concerned, it imposed no personal obligation to erect buildings which was enforceable against a singular successor in the lands, and defender therefore assolvied.

Question, whether the obligation to erect buildings contained in the contract of ground-annual could be made effectual as a real burden.

Marshall's Trustee v Macneill & Co., 1889, 15 R. 762; 25 S.L.R. 581.

—Liability of personal representatives—Real burden.

A proprietor by feu contract feued certain ground to three partners of a company, "and the survivors or survivor, and the heir of the last survivor," as trustees for behoof of the company, "with and under the burden of the whole conditions, reservations, burdens . . . which are declared to be real burdens affecting the lands conveyed," viz., that dwelling-houses of a certain value should be erected by the above-named vassals within two years upon the lands, and be upheld by them in good order, and insured and rebuilt if burnt down, "and failing such houses being erected . . . then and in that event these presents . . . shall, in the option of the superior, become null and void." After the lapse of the two years the last surviving partner of the company died in possession of the subjects without having implemented the obligation to build, and his widow, who had been appointed sole trustee under her husband's settlement, did not take up the feu. The superior raised an action against her as her husband's sole trustee, concluding to have her ordained to implement the obligation, and failing implement to pay damages. The Court assolvied her from the conclusions of the action, holding (1) that as the obligation was by the express terms of the feu contract imposed solely upon the vassals holding the lands under the contract it did not transmit against the last vassal's personal representative; and (2) that as the conclusion of the summons was for implement of a personal obligation attaching to the defender herself, and no such obligation was prestable, she was not liable in damages.

Opinions that under the terms of the feu contract there was a personal obligation to build imposed upon the vassal in possession of the subjects, and that it might have been enforced by the superior by the ordinary remedies available to him at common law, notwithstanding the option expressly given him by the deed to irritate the feu in the event of the vassal's failure to build.

Opinions that the obligation to build would transmit and be enforceable against any one taking up the feu.

Macrae v Mackenzie's Trustee, 1891, 19 R. 138; 29 S.L.R. 127.

(207)

Obligation to erect building destroyed by fire—Disposition of feu after obligation has become prestable—Liability of old and of new vassal.

An obligation by a vassal under a feu contract, which has once become prestable, cannot be discharged without the superior's consent, even although a new vassal has subjected himself to the same liability by entering with the superior while the obligation is still unperformed.

A proprietor by feu contract disposed certain subjects to a company "and its successors and assignees whomsoever," and under the provision, inter alia, "that the company and its foresaids" should be bound to erect buildings of not less value than £15,000, and to uphold buildings of that value in all time coming, and to keep the same insured against fire to the extent of not less than that sum, and in case the said buildings should be destroyed by fire, or part thereof, to rebuild the same or the part destroyed so as to maintain the total value of £15,000. Buildings were erected of the stipulated value, and insured. On 7th November, 1893, they were destroyed by fire, and on the 27th November the superior raised an action against the company for performance of the obligation to rebuild. Before defences were lodged the company, by a duly recorded disposition, conveyed the subjects to a third person, who was thereafter made a party to the action. The company then pleaded that, as they were no longer vassals in the feu, they were not liable in performance of the obligation. Held (1) that the obligation, having become prestable during the company's tenure, continued to be binding on them; and (2) that the company's disponee was also liable, in respect that the obligation was a condition of the grant remaining unfulfilled during his possession of the subjects.

Marshall v Callander and Trossachs Hydropathic Co., 1895, 22 R. 954; 32 S.L.R. 693; 3 S.L.T. 94. Affirmed, 1896, 23 R. (H.L.) 55; [1896] A.C. 223.

(208)

Obligation to erect buildings—Disposition in security by vassal—Disposition qualified by back-letter—Recording of disposition but not of back-letter—Liability of security-holder to implement obligation.

A feu charter contained an obligation upon the vassal to erect certain buildings within a specified time. Before the obligation was implemented the vassal granted a disposition in security for a loan, the disposition being qualified by a back-letter. The disposition was recorded, but not the back-letter.

In an action by the superior against the security-holder to enforce the obligation, held that the defender's right, being in security only, did not render him liable to implement the obligation imposed upon the vassal; and defender assolizied.

Patterson v Robertson, (O.H.) 1912, 2 S.L.T. 494.

Personal liability for damages for non-implementation—Plurality of defenders.

In 1874 a proprietor granted a feu disposition of a piece of ground, subject to the condition that the donee, his heirs and assignees, should be bound within eighteen months to erect buildings of a certain value. It was declared that the condition should be a real burden and be personally binding upon those afterwards deriving or acquiring right to the subjects. Held that so long as the condition was not implemented, the disposition imposed a personal obligation on each successive vassal to erect the buildings and liability to pay damages to the superior for non-implementation, and (2) that this liability for damages for non-implementation continued to attach to the person in default and his executors after the property had passed to a new vassal.

Held further, that an action brought by the superior in 1900, when no buildings had been erected, against (1) the vassal in possession, and (2) the executrix of a prior vassal, concluding against the vassal in possession for a decree ordaining him to erect the buildings within a certain time, and failing his doing so, for decree against both defenders, conjunctly and severally, or severally, for the damage sustained by the pursuer through non-implementation, was competent; and (2) that the pursuer was not barred from insisting in the conclusion for damages against the second defender by taking a decree against the first defender ad factum præstandum.

4. ROADS AND SEWERS.

Feuar bound to make road in front of feu whenever road made through adjoining ground belonging to different superior—Whether obligation prestable on feuar himself becoming proprietor of a necessary portion of the adjoining ground.

In 1863 a proprietor feued a piece of ground (part of the estate of D), bounded on the north by a proposed road, and on the east by the adjoining estate of K, belonging to a different proprietor, subject to the condition that, in the event (which was then improbable) of a street being formed through K in connection with the proposed road, the feuar should be bound to form and maintain one-half of the said road in front of his feu. In 1864 the feuar, to take advantage of a wall which had been built by the proprietor of K four and a half feet within his boundary, bought from him the strip of ground lying between his feu and the wall, extending northwards from the south-east corner of the feu the whole length of the feu and twice that distance beyond. In 1872 the proprietor of D bought a part of the estate of K, which would have enabled him to form a street through K in connection with the proposed road, had it not been for the intervening strip acquired by the feuar. In an action brought by the proprietor of D against the feuar, concluding, inter alia, for declarator that the defender was bound to form a road forty feet wide over the strip, upon payment of such compensation as the Court should fix, held (by seven judges) that the defender was under no obligation, express or implied, to make, or allow to be made, a road over the part of K acquired by him.

Paterson v McEwan's Trustees, 1881, 8 R. 646; 18 S.L.R. 475.

Obligation to form street through ground not part of feu and not belonging to superior.

A vassal was taken bound to form part of a street opposite his feu and continue it through a narrow strip of ground belonging to a third party. The obligation was practically inexecutable, owing to refusal of consent except at an exorbitant price by a third party, owner of the strip of ground. In an action by assignees of the right, in which it was held that the pursuers had no title to sue, opinions (per Lord President Inglis and Lord Shand) that if the pursuers had had a title, their claim would have been for damages and not for specific implement.

(214)

Obligation to pay share of cost of making road—Personal or real.

A feu charter contained a stipulation that the feuar should be bound, on the superior completing a roadway, to pay a proportion of the expense. The roadway was completed on 1st October, 1878. In a petitory action brought by the superior in 1883 against a singular successor of the feuar who had acquired the property in 1881, held that the claim could not be enforced against the defender.

(215)

Road in fact made by adjoining proprietor—Vassal's obligation limited to repayment and indemnity.

A superior feued certain steadings of ground under an obligation to pay to the superior one-half of the expense of forming and constructing such common sewers or drains as the superior might have already formed, or which he might thereafter form, in a street ex adverso of his feu; and to repay to the superior one-half of the price of the formation of said street so far as already formed. The sewer had been constructed and the street formed many years before by an adjoining proprietor at his own expense, in consideration of a right of access thereby secured to him. The vassal was sued by the superior under the obligation in the feu-contract for one-half of the expense of forming the sewer and street. Held that the clauses in the feu contract were clauses of repayment and indemnity, and did not entitle the superior to receive a sum which he had not expended.

McClelland v Robertson, 1876, 13 S.L.R. 570.

Obligation to maintain roads converted into a money-payment.

By indentures entered into in 1859 a vassal was bound, as the condition of his right to certain lands, to maintain and repair certain causeways. The obligation was repeated in the titles, and was implemented till a period shortly anterior to 1865. The roads were materially changed in their character and in their line, especially by changes effected by the construction of railways, and the amount of traffic upon them had enormously increased. In 1865 the successor of the vassal in the said lands refused any longer to maintain the causeways, and the superior brought an action of declarator and for implement against him. Held that the obligation was not extinguished, but that in consequence of the change of circumstances it could no longer be specifically enforced, but must be converted into a money payment.

Magistrates of Perth v Earl of Kinnoull, 1872, 10 M. 874; 44 J. 491; 9 S.L.R. 555.

(217)

Obligation to form pavement—Existence and extent of obligation quoad ground unoccupied by stipulated buildings.

A feu charter provided that the vassal should within three years from the term of entry "erect and constantly maintain on the said piece of ground buildings of the value of £12,000 at least, which buildings shall consist of a range of four-storey tenements similar to those already built" in the street. The vassal was further taken bound to form and constantly maintain a foot-pavement "in front of the houses to be built on the said piece of ground . . . the foot-pavement being formed within the area of the said piece of ground to the extent of eight feet." After he had erected houses of the character and value specified, the vassal proposed to erect on a part of the ground as yet unbuild on stables of one storey in height. He also proposed that these stables should come to the edge of his ground, without leaving eight feet for a foot-pavement. Held that he was within his right in both respects, the Court being of opinion (1) that the feu charter could not be construed to import any restriction on building on the ground feued (except in regard to those buildings the erection of which was stipulated for), and (2) that the buildings which the vassal proposed to erect were not of a character to require him to form a foot-pavement in terms of the second of the clauses above quoted, although if he came to erect buildings of another class his obligation to form the foot-pavement might come into operation.

(218)

Whether feuar, taken bound to maintain existing sewer, was liable for cost of original construction.

A bank holding a title to a piece of building-ground, ex facie absolutely, but really only in security, feued a portion thereof, taking the vassal bound to pay half the cost of maintaining the portion of the street sewer opposite his feu, which had been constructed by the bank at the real owner's expense. Held that the owner, to whom the lands so far as not feued were afterwards reconveyed, had no claim against the feuar for any part of the cost of the original construction of the sewer.

Reservation of right to all deer found on subjects—Whether it imported right of stalking.

A proprietor in 1737 granted a feu charter of certain lands, shealings, and grassings, inserting in the obligation to infest a reservation to himself and his heirs and successors of "all the deer that may be found at any time hereafter within the bounds of the said shealings." The precept of sasine in the charter bore that the lands were "to be holden of us for yearly payment, &c., and under the reservation of the deer, mines, and minerals as above mentioned." This reservation was embodied in the titles of all subsequent vassals. In 1882 a singular successor of the original vassal raised an action of declarator that the superior was not entitled "to go on the lands in pursuit or for the purpose of hunting or stalking deer," and for interdict against him, or others having authority from him, so going on the lands. There had been no usage of hunting or stalking deer upon the lands on the part of the superior since the feu right was granted. The Court granted the declarator and interdict, holding that, while the reservation might confer a right to deer captured or killed on the lands, it could not be construed as conferring a right of hunting or stalking deer on them.

Feu to railway company for station—Obligation to stop all passenger trains—Trains subsidised by Government departments—Excursion trains.

The proprietor of land through which a railway had been formed feued to the railway company two acres of ground at C for a feu-duty of 5s., the feu charter containing a declaration that the railway company "shall be bound within twelve months to erect at their own expense on the said piece of ground . . . a station for passengers and goods, at which all passenger trains shall regularly stop, to be called the C station." There followed a clause of irritancy, to take effect in the event of the company discontinuing the use of the station "as a regular goods or passenger station."

A station was erected at C in terms of this contract, at which at first all the trains on the line stopped regularly, but some years after the date of the contract certain new trains were established and subsidised in the public service, under agreements with the Home Office and the Post Office, and these trains stopped at C station only if required. There was also established a summer excursion train on Saturdays at low fares, open to the public at the terminal station only, and stopping at certain places of interest on the line. This train was not advertised in the regular time-tables, and it never stopped at C station. In an action by the proprietor of C as superior, to have it declared that the company were bound to stop both classes of trains at C station regularly, and for implement, held (1) that the feu contract imposed a valid obligation on the railway company to stop all passenger trains at C station; (2) that the trains subsidised by the Home Office and the Post Office were passenger trains, which the railway company were bound to stop at the C station; and (3) that special excursion trains not advertised in the time-tables as running regularly were not passenger trains within the meaning of the feu contract.

Privilege conferred on vassal to use vacant ground adjoining feu—Reservation of right to curtail vacant ground by building thereon—Extent of reserved right.

A feued a building stance to B, with the privilege of using a piece of vacant ground behind it, which was bounded on one side by certain brick buildings facing C street belonging to A. The feu contract contained a declaration that, "as the brick buildings are more narrow from back to front than the permanent buildings in C street to be built upon the site of the said brick houses will be when C street is feued, the said back ground will thus be curtailed," and that B should have no claim against A for this restriction. A subsequently feued the back ground and the ground on which the brick buildings stood to C, who applied to the Dean of Guild for warrant to pull down the existing buildings and erect in their place permanent buildings of considerably greater depth than the original buildings. The plans shewed that the proposed new buildings would materially injure the lights and ventilation of the buildings on B's feu. B opposed the application on the plea that the proposed buildings would be an unreasonable encroachment on his rights in the back ground. The Court repelled the plea, on the ground that B's title imposed no limitation on the depth of the permanent buildings, the erection of which it contemplated.

(222)

Feu for special purpose—Superior's right of pre-emption—Clause prohibiting alienation—Tenures Abolition Act, 1746, sec. 10—Redemption at fixed sum.

In 1850 a proprietor feued a piece of ground on the shore of Loch Long for the purpose of the disponent erecting a pier at a cost of £650, and for no other purpose, with power to the disponent to levy tolls at certain specified rates. It was provided that the disponent should not make any other erections than those specified in a relative plan. The feu contract contained a provision that the disponent should be entitled "to repurchase and reacquire" the ground and pier at the term of Martinmas, 1851, or at any term of Whitsunday or Martinmas thereafter, at a price to be fixed by arbiters, but not to exceed £650. In 1897, by which time large extensions had been made to the pier by the vassals which greatly increased its value, the superior gave notice that at Whitsunday, 1902, he was to reacquire the ground in terms of the clause in the feu contract. The vassals, who were singular successors of the original vassals, thereupon raised an action to have it declared that the clause in question was not binding on them, or at least not binding in so far as it restricted the price to be paid, and that the superior was not entitled to enforce it, in respect that indirectly it was a clause prohibiting alienation, and so struck at by sec. 10 of the Tenures Abolition Act, 1746, or otherwise that it was illegal, in that it did not stipulate for redemption at the price which the subjects would fetch in open market at the date of redemption. Held (1) that the clause was legal, and (2) that as it was a condition of the feu it must receive effect against singular successors according to its terms.

Prohibition of subinfeudation—Disposition a me vel de me not a contravention.

A feu contract dated in 1862 prohibited the vassals from subfeuing the ground or disposing the same "so as in any case to be holden of themselves but allenarly to be holden of" the superior, and declared that all deeds in contravention of the prohibition should be null. It was stipulated that each successor of the vassals should be bound to enter with the superior and complete his title within three months of his acquiring right to the subjects, under pain of nullity of all deeds not recorded within three months; and that in case of failure so to enter, a duplicand should be payable for each year during which there was delay to enter. The original vassal in 1862 (with the view of giving security for a loan) disposed the subjects to a company by an ex facie absolute disposition a me vel de me. The disposition was at once recorded by the company, and the company was in possession when the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, creating implied entries came into force. The original vassal died in 1882, and the loan having been repaid, his heir obtained a reconveyance of the subjects by a disposition from the company, which he duly recorded. In 1908 the superior brought an action against the heir for payment of duplicands from 1882 onwards, on the ground that the disposition to the company was null, as falling within the prohibition in the feu contract, that consequently his entry following on a conveyance from the company was of no effect, and that the lands, therefore, had been in non-entry since the original vassal's death. Held (1) that the a me vel de me disposition of 1862 to the company did not fall within the prohibition in the feu charter against subinfeudation, and, therefore, that the defender had acquired a valid title in 1882 by the disposition from the company, and having recorded it was duly entered with the superior, and was not liable in duplicands for the period subsequent to that date.

Observed that the prohibition and irritancy had the effect, not of rendering any deed or infetment in contravention null ab initio, but merely of enabling the superior to set aside the deed and infetment if he so chose.

Feu for a distillery—Right of superior to complain of it polluting a river—Bar.

In 1886 a proprietor entered into a feu contract, whereby she disposed in feu farm to the vassal "All and whole the distillery of M., with the right to take water for the use thereof from the burn of R. by pipes." It was also declared "that it shall not be lawful to nor in the power of the said" vassal "to erect or carry on upon the piece of ground hereby disposed any manufactures or operations which may legally be deemed a nuisance or be dangerous or injurious to the amenity of the neighbourhood, but which declaration shall not apply to the carrying on of the said distillery." In an action raised in 1897 by the superior along with other riparian proprietors to have it declared that the vassal had no right to pollute the burn and a river into which it flowed, by discharges from the distillery, held, after a proof, by which the pollution was established, (1) that although the first clause above quoted conferred upon the vassal every right to use the water which the superior had, as the latter was not entitled in a question with lower riparian proprietors to pollute the water, the clause could not be read as meaning that the vassal was to be entitled to do so; (2) that the second clause did no more than disable the superior from objecting to the distillery, as such, as a nuisance; and (3) that the superior was not barred by the terms of either clause of the feu contract from complaining of the pollution of the burn unless the vassal was able to show that it was impossible in the ordinary course of business to carry on the distillery without polluting the burn, and that he had failed to do so.

Question, whether the construction of a feu contract may be affected by the circumstances in which it is granted.

Construction of titles.

In 1530 a proprietor granted in feu farm part of his estate, "necnon tantos carbones in carbonariis" in the remaining portion of the estate as were necessary for the domestic use of the vassal, his heirs and assignees. A charter of confirmation, resignation, and novodamus in 1605 showed that the vassal's right to coal had been extended, the superior granting and confirming to the vassal the lands feued, "necnon tantos carbones" in the superior's other lands as should satisfy the vassal, his heirs and assignees, for necessary uses, and to sell or give away at their pleasure. In 1622 the superior feued another part of his estate, reserving to the feuar of 1530 and his successors their right to the coal "secundum formam ac tenorem eorum originalis infeofamenti." With the exception of the lands feued in 1622, the dominium utile of the whole estate, including the original feu of 1530, was acquired by an appriser, whose successor in 1708 executed a procuratory of resignation ad remanentiam, reserving, however, the lands feued in 1530, but without any mention of the right of taking coal contained in the original feu right, and he was infeft on a charter of novodamus granted in these terms. One of his successors in 1866 obtained from the vassal in possession of the lands feued in 1622 a disposition of the coal therein, and commenced to work the same, when the superior applied for interdict as superior, and as being in right of the vassal to whom the right of taking coal was conveyed by the feu charter of 1530, and in whose favour it was reserved in that of 1622. It appeared that in 1794 the superior had granted a charter of confirmation of the feu of 1622, containing a clause reserving to the superior, as in right of the feuar of 1530, the coal of the lands feued in 1622 and in 1530, "as mentioned in the original infeftments of the same," and that in an action by one of the vassals of 1622 against the superior to set aside this charter it was decided by the Court in 1810 that the vassal was not entitled to object to the insertion of this clause. There had been no active possession of the coal by either party. In a suspension and interdict brought by the superior, held (1) that the decision of the Court in 1810 was not res judicata so as to preclude the vassal in the feu of 1622 from maintaining that the superior had no right to the coal therein; (2) that the reservation in the charters by progress subsequent to 1794 being in favour of the superior as in right of a third party, it was competent to refer to the original titles in order to interpret the nature and extent of the right; and (3) that the superior was not entitled to interdict, in respect either that he had failed to establish by the titles that he was in right of the feuar to whom the right to coal was originally granted in 1530, or that the right conferred was not a right of property in the coal entitling him to interdict as in a question with the proprietor of the lands feued in 1622.

Reservation of coal and limestone strata—Right to use reserved strata for conveyance of minerals from other mines.

A superior feued certain lands reserving "the coal and limestone within the bounds of the lands, so as it shall be lawful to [him] to set down coal pits, shanks and sinks, and win coal and limestone within the bounds of the lands or any part thereof."

Held (1) that the strata of coal and limestone were excepted from the conveyance to the vassal, and therefore (2) as there were no averments that the coal and limestone were worked out, the superior, as absolute owner of these strata, was entitled to form in them roads for the underground carriage of minerals from other properties.

Right to convey minerals through strata other than those expressly reserved.

A proprietor granted a feu in the middle of a coalfield reserving right to the minerals, and thereafter leased the whole coalfield, including the coal under the feu, to a coal company, who drove underground levels through the feu for the purpose of conveying coal from the proprietor's lands beyond.

Held that in terms of the reservation of minerals the proprietor and his tenants had right only to the strata of coal and other reserved minerals, and were not entitled to mine in other strata of the feu, and that they were not entitled to use these strata for the purpose of conveying coal from other lands.

Charter of novodamus—Glebe—Foreshore.

In exchange for an old glebe, a new glebe bounded by the sea was acquired by exchange in 1817. The new glebe had originally formed part of a portion of the barony of Grange, known as the 24 acres. In 1613 the 24 acres bounded by the sea had been feued by the proprietor of Grange to Bruce, the coal being reserved by the granter. In 1643 the granter obtained a Crown charter of resignation which contained a grant of the coal in the foreshore as a separate estate. In 1673 the proprietor of Grange, in consideration of a money payment, granted a charter of novodamus conveying the 24 acres (without reservation of the coal) to Bruce's successor, who in the same year took infeftment upon a precept contained in the charter. In 1904 the right of the minister to the coal in the foreshore ex adverso of the glebe was challenged by the proprietor of Grange in a process of interdict brought by him against the minister's mineral tenants. The complainer founded on the Crown charter of resignation of 1643, which contained a grant of the minerals in the 24 acres as a separate tenement, and contended that the charter of novodamus of 1673 merely gave of new what was given in the feu contract of 1613. The mineral tenants in answer founded on the novodamus of 1673 as conveying the coal in the 24 acres from the proprietor of Grange to Bruce's successor. Held that the charter of novodamus of 1673 included the coal, and contained a valid grant by the proprietor of Grange of the 24 acres, without reservation, and that therefore the proprietor of Grange had no title to challenge the minister's right to the coal in the foreshore ex adverso of the glebe.

Charter of novodamus reserving coal—Vassal's claim to work coal founded on earlier titles.

By charter of novodamus, in 1708, the superior reserved the coal in certain lands; and in all the titles following upon that charter the coal was in like manner reserved. The coal was not worked until 1875 when the vassal attempted to do so, and the superior brought a note of suspension and interdict against him. Held that the vassal could not plead in defence titles prior to 1708, as he was not able to connect himself with these titles.

Lord Belhaven and Stenton's Trustee v Harvie, (H.L.) 1876, 14 S.L.R. 198.

Effect of sale of superiority to vassal where minerals had been reserved in the feu-charter.

In 1753 the trustees of an entail granted a feu-charter reserving to the entailor and his heirs the mines and minerals, &c. The heir in possession in 1811 appointed commissioners, and gave them authority to sell the superiorities of his lands under the Sales to the Crown Act, 1746. They accordingly sold the superiority of the feu to the vassal by a disposition which narrated their authority to sell the superiorities and disposed the lands themselves, with all right, title, and interest competent to them or the heir in possession. Held that this deed did not convey the minerals, which had been created a separate tenement. Opinions that if the disposition had conveyed the minerals, the heir of entail's right to challenge would not have been cut off by the negative prescription, and that the vassal would not have acquired right to the minerals by the positive prescription, the nullity of the conveyance as a conveyance of anything but the bare superiority appearing ex facie of the deed.

Fleeming v Howden, 1868, 6 M. 782; 40 J. 401; 5 S.L.R. 511.

Construction of disposition—Whether dispositive proprietor of coals on the feu.

In 1796 the Duke of Argyll, who held the plenum dominium of the lands of Campbell of the Crown, disposed in feu the lands of Hillfoot, part of Campbell, to Drysdale, but reserved the coals and coalheughs. Tait acquired the Campbell estate remaining in the Duke. In 1837 Tait's trustee in bankruptcy—on the narrative that he had exposed to sale "the superiority and feu-duty of the lands" of Hillfoot, and that Moir, Drysdale's successor in the feu, had been preferred to the purchase—conveyed to Moir "all and whole the town and lands of Hillfoot . . . all as at present possessed" by Moir and his tenants. No coal had at this time been worked in Hillfoot. The feu-rights and infeftments granted by the disposer's predecessors to feuars were excepted from the warrandice clause. The disposition contained an assignation to an unexecuted precept of sasine in a Crown charter of resignation and confirmation, which Tait had obtained, "in so far as applicable to the lands of Hillfoot thereby disposed, to the end that" Moir "may be more readily infeft and seased in the premises, and also in and to the whole feuduties and other services and casualties payable from the said lands and others above disposed," "surrogating hereby" Moir "in my full right and place of the premises for ever." On the precept assigned Moir was infeft. In 1890 Orr, who had acquired from Tait's trustee in 1860 the lands of Campbell, with a description which included the lands of Hillfoot, and the "coals and coalheughs," raised an action against Moir's testamentary trustees to have it declared that the pursuer was proprietor of the coal in Hillfoot (which still remained unworked), in virtue of the conveyance of 1860. The defenders pleaded the conveyance of 1837. Held that the dispositive clause in the deed of 1837 might be read either as a conveyance of the whole lands of Hillfoot or as a conveyance of the superiority merely, and that the narrative on which it proceeded showed that the superiority of the estate feued to the vassal was alone conveyed. (Per Lord Watson)—"When a disposition in implement of sale has been delivered to and accepted by the purchaser it becomes the sole measure of the contracting parties' rights, and supersedes all previous communings and contracts however formal."

Whether feu-charter gave full right of property including minerals, or right of servitude only.

The feuars in a burgh of barony acquired their respective steadings of twenty falls of land under feu-charters, which also disposed in feu farm "ane proportional pairt of our lands of Barrwood, with the rest of the inhabitants of the sd. burgh, as sd. is, gress, moss, meadow, and arable land yrof, effeirand to ane burgess-steading, of the sd. burgh and toune of Kilsyth, presentlie possessed be the inhabitants yrof." There was a separate reddendo applicable to the twenty falls, and to the proportional part of Barrwood. There was a precept for giving sasine in "the forsd. twentie falls of land or yrbys, tenements of land, houses, yards, priviledge of burgesshipe, pairt of Barrwood, with all uyr liberties, and priviledges, pairts, pendicles, and pertinents yrof qtsomever in mainer abune mentioned." The feuars had possessed the lands of Barrwood for more than 100 years. Held that the charters gave the feuars the full right of common property in Barrwood, including the minerals.

(236)

Power to "search for and work out" coal—"Shank or open the ground"—"Close or garden."

A feu-charter, dated in 1728, contained a reservation in the granter's favour of the coal under the subjects feued, with power "to search for, work out, and dispose of the said coal, . . . and provided that, in searching for or working said coal, we doe not shank or open the ground within the house, office-houses, closs, or gardens to be built or made upon the said lands." In 1895 a successor of the granter commenced boring operations at a spot which was within thirteen yards of one of the main entrances of the mansion-house built upon the feu, and which was situated in an artificially made and enclosed piece of ground laid out partly in grass and partly in flower beds. The bore was sunk in the part laid out in grass. In a note of suspension and interdict presented by the feuar to have the boring operations interdicted, held (1) that "boring" was covered by the expression "opening the ground"; and (2) that the place where the operations were being carried on was a "closs or garden" in the sense of the charter, and was therefore within the prohibited area.

Macdonald v Welsh, 1896, 23 R. 995; 33 S.L.R. 719; 4 S.L.T. 78.

Reservation of freestone with right to feuar to dig freestone for building on feu—Whether railway bridges and other works within right.

A feu-charter, which reserved the freestone to the superior, gave power to the feuar, notwithstanding the reservation, to dig or work the freestone for erecting "houses and offices, or walls or other buildings" upon the feu, or for making or repairing the roads thereon. A railway company having taken over the feu by compulsory purchase, held that it was within the powers of the feuar to dig freestone for the construction of bridges and other railway works on the feu.

(238)

Vassal's right to use ground as burying ground—Superior's right to have bodies removed.

Where a feu disposition reserved the coal, held that the vassal was entitled to use part of the surface of his feu as a private burying ground, but the owners of the coal would be entitled to have bodies removed if necessary to enable them to use the surface for the purpose of boring.

Welsh v Macdonald, (O.H.) 1896, 3 S.L.T. 304.

Damage caused to feu by working of minerals—Action by feuar against granter—"All parties not called."

A granted a feu of certain subjects, reserving the minerals, and afterwards leased the minerals. Injury having subsequently been occasioned to the surface of the feu by the workings of the mineral tenants, the feuar raised an action of damages against A. The defender, averring that the injury was due solely to the fault of the mineral tenants, pleaded, "all parties not called." Held that the pursuer was entitled to proceed with his action without calling the mineral tenants.

Highgate & Co. v Magistrates of Paisley, 1896, 23 R. 992; 33 S.L.R. 722; 4 S.L.T. 78.

VIII. CLAUSES OF RELIEF.

1. OF PUBLIC BURDENS.

[See also HERITABLE PROPERTY II. 10 (1).]

(240)

Nature of obligation—Construction.

A feu-contract conveyed certain lands to be holden of the superior in feu farm fee and heritage for ever for payment of a feu-duty "in full of all casualties upon the entry of heirs and singular successors, cess, minister's stipend, school salary, and all other burdens whatsoever affecting or which may affect said lands." Held that the clause could not be construed as imposing any obligation on the superior to relieve the vassal, but only as limiting the superior's claims against the vassal.

Magistrates of Lanark v Honyman, 1890, 17 R. 1226; 27 S.L.R. 993.

(241)

Right of vassal to relief—Rates levied on subfeuars—Poor rates.

In a feu-charter granted in 1752 the superior came under the following obligation, to "warrant, acquit, and defend this present charter, and infeftment to follow hereon, together with the lands feued . . . and particularly to free and relieve the said" vassal and his heirs and assignees "of all feu, teind, and blench duties, ministers' and schoolmasters' stipends and salaries . . . and for all cesses, taxations, highway money, and other public burdens whatever, due and payable furth of, or that may anyways be imposed upon the lands and others above mentioned in all time coming, at all hands, and against all deadly, as law will." The vassal subfeued the lands, but did not assign the obligation of relief, and did not bind himself to relieve the subvassals of public burdens. In an action brought by the vassal against his superior for payment of the poor rates paid by the subvassals, held that the obligation of relief in the feu-charter was not a warranty, but a contract of indemnity, forming a term of the feudal contract, which could not be separated from the title of the subaltern estate, and that as the vassal had not been and could not be assessed for poor rate on the land subfeued he had no claim against the superior under the obligation of relief.

Latto v Magistrates of Aberdeen, 1903, 5 F. 740; 40 S.L.R. 488; 10 S.L.T. 277.

———Contract to grant feu-charter with clause of relief in favour of vassal — No original feu-charter ever granted—Charters by progress without clause of relief.

In 1764 C and D entered into a contract and agreement whereby C undertook to grant a feu-right to the said D, his heirs and successors, of sixty acres of land, "for yearly payment of £3 sterling . . . and to assign the rents from and after Martinmas 1765, and to free and relieve the said ground of all minister's stipend, schoolmaster's salary, cess, and all other public burdens in all time coming, except the said feu-duty, and to make the said public a real burden upon his other lands . . . for the which causes and on the other part the said D, on the said C performing his part of the premises—that is, granting the said feu-contract in the terms above narrated, binds and obliges him, his heirs and successors, to content and pay to the said C, his heirs, executors, and successors whatsoever, the sum of £600 sterling at Martinmas 1765 . . . and to pay £3 of feu at Martinmas, beginning the first year's payment at Martinmas 1765." The deed contained a precept of sasine, on which D took infeftment in May 1776. In 1888 a singular successor of D, who was duly entered with the superior under a charter of confirmation, which did not set forth an obligation by the superior to relieve the vassal of public burdens, raised an action against the superior, who was a singular successor of C, concluding for declarator that the defender as superior was bound to relieve the pursuer of public burdens. The pursuer founded on the deed of 1764 as showing that the obligation to relieve of public burdens was a condition of the feu. It did not appear that a feu-contract was ever granted, or that the £600 was ever paid. Held that the contract of 1764 was not a feu-contract, but merely a personal obligation to grant a feu-contract, and that the obligation to relieve of public burdens was merely a personal obligation, which could not be enforced against a singular successor in the superiority.

Obligation in favour of Crown—Whether right personal to Crown or transmissible.

A Crown vassal conveyed certain lands to His Majesty King George III., "ad perpetuam remanentiam to the effect that the property . . . may be consolidated with the superiority of the same in the person of His Majesty and his royal successors." The disposition contained an obligation on the granter to relieve "His Majesty, and his royal heirs and successors" of certain specified burdens, and of "every other parish or public burden which may be demanded of or from them for or in respect of the lands disposed," and a disposition of lands in warrandice of this obligation. The Officers of Ordnance, who had by statute become vested in the lands, disposed part of them in feu to a subject, providing that the disponee should be similarly relieved of public burdens by the granter of the original disposition, his heirs and successors, and disposed the warrandice lands as in the original obligation. Held that the obligation was in favour of the Crown alone, and was not assignable to a vassal.

Orr Ewing v Earl Cawdor, 1884, 12 R. (H.L.) 12; 22 S.L.R. 105.

Creation of mid-superiority for voting purposes—Liability of mid-superior.

In 1752 the Magistrates of Aberdeen, who held of the Crown, granted a feu-charter of certain subjects to Dingwall, with a clause of relief from public burdens. In 1900 Dingwall's successor in the subjects raised an action against the magistrates founded on the obligation of relief. The magistrates pleaded that the superiority was no longer vested in them, and that accordingly they were not liable in the obligation. It appeared that in 1806 the magistrates had disposed the superiority to Brebner with procuratory of resignation, and that Brebner, having obtained a charter of resignation from the Crown, had then granted to the magistrates a feu-charter whereby he disposed the subjects to the magistrates, to be holden of him for a feu-duty of £1 5s. The feu-duty payable by Dingwall's successor had been redeemed in 1804. Under this charter the magistrates took over all the superior's obligations to feuars. It further appeared that in 1863 the magistrates had granted to Dingwall's then successor in the subjects a writ of confirmation "as his lawful superiors." Held that the magistrates alone had the substantial interest in the superiority, and that the action was properly laid against them.

Latto v Magistrates of Aberdeen, 1903, 5 F. 740; 40 S.L.R. 488; 10 S.L.T. 277.

Liability of successor in superiority — Stipend.

In a feu-contract the superior conveyed certain lands and the teinds thereof to the vassal, and bound himself, his heirs and successors, to warrant the teinds to be free to the vassal from augmentations of stipend. After the dominium utile of the estate had passed through the hands of several successive owners, the successor and personal representative of the original superior refused to relieve the vassal of augmentations, on the ground that no right to enforce the obligation had been transmitted to the latter. The vassal afterwards sold his estate under articles of roup, which provided that £1500 of the price should be consigned and disposed of as follows: — (1) The exposor to take all necessary proceedings for effectuating the claims of relief under the original feu-disposition; (2) in the event of the exposor obtaining total or partial relief, the consigned money to be payable to him wholly or in proportion. The exposor raised an action against the superior, concluding for relief, and obtained a judgment of the House of Lords affirming his liability "as superior." In an action of declarator subsequently brought by the exposor, held that the exposor was entitled to demand payment of the £1500 consigned. Opinions that an obligation in a feu-charter by the superior binding himself, his heirs and successors, to relieve the vassal of future augmentations of stipend, is binding only on the superior's successors in the superiority, and not on his general representative.

McCallum v Stewart, 1870, 8 M. (H.L.) 1; 42 J. 266; 7 S.L.R. 308.

———Teind duties and minister's stipend — Whether augmentations of stipend included in obligation of relief — Lands feued with the teinds — Lands feued without the teinds — Teinds — "Teind duties."

By a feu-contract entered into in 1737 the proprietor of a heritable estate disposed part of the lands, together with the teinds thereof, and bound himself to relieve the vassal of "all feu and teind duties minister stipend schoolmaster fees payable forth of the said lands in time coming." In 1738, by another feu-contract, containing an obligation of relief in similar terms, he disposed a further portion of the lands, but without the teinds, to a second vassal. Down to 1864 the superior was localised upon direct for the whole stipend; and the whole stipend, including several augmentations granted at different dates from 1753 onwards, was paid by him. In 1864, in the course of proceedings for a further augmentation, the vassals were, for the first time, localised upon direct for the share of stipend exigible from their lands. Thereupon a dispute arose between the superior and the vassals as to whether the superior's obligation of relief included augmentations of stipend. In a special case presented by the superior and the vassals in 1920 for the determination of the dispute, held that the obligations of relief contained in each of the feu-contracts imposed on the superior the duty of relieving the vassals, not only of the stipends payable at the date of the feu-contracts, but also of all subsequent augmentations. Opinion (per Lord President Clyde) that "teind duties," as used in the feu-contracts, was synonymous with "teinds."

———Poor rates on buildings subsequently erected on feu.

A feu-contract, dated in 1805, provided that the feu-duty should be "in full of cess, minister's stipend, and all other public burdens whatsoever, payable or which may be claimed or demanded furth of the said forty-seven falls of land hereby feued." From the terms of the contract and the amount of the feu-duty it was evidently within the contemplation of the parties that buildings should be erected on the feu. Held that the superior was bound to relieve the vassal of the poor rates imposed on him as the owner of the building as well as of the ground. Observed that the liability might be limited to the amount of the feu-duty.

Nisbet v Lees, 1869, 7 M. 881; 41 J. 502; 6 S.L.R. 569.

———What burdens embraced — Supervenient legislation.

In 1857 the Magistrates of Edinburgh feued a piece of ground in the vicinity of the city to be holden of them as superiors, "with the houses and planting built and planted or to be built or planted thereupon," and undertook to free and relieve the vassals and their successors "of all teinds, minister's stipend, king's cess, supply, and other public burdens which do or may affect the same now and in all time coming." Held that the obligation of relief embraced (1) augmented stipend localised upon the lands; (2) poor rates payable in respect of houses recently erected thereon; and (3) cess, land-tax, and other public burdens, but not burgh cess, to which the lands were for the first time subjected by statute subsequent to the date of the feu-charter. Question, whether the superior's liability was limited to the amount of the feu-duty.

Preston v Magistrates of Edinburgh, 1870, 8 M. 502; 42 J. 232; 7 S.L.R. 291.

———Supervenient legislation — Poor rates — Property and occupancy.

A feu-contract in 1765 contained a provision that the feu-duty should be in full of all public burdens payable or which might be claimed furth of the lands, and an obligation by the superiors to relieve the vassals thereof "now and in all time coming." Held (1) that the clause imported relief only from burdens payable by virtue of laws then in existence; (2) that it imported relief from poor rates imposed on the vassal in respect of property, but not in respect of occupancy.

Wilson v Magistrates of Musselburgh, 1868, 6 M. 483; 40 J. 250; 5 S.L.R. 312.

—Supervenant legislation—" . . . and other public burdens " due and to become due—Poor rates—Road assessments—Burdens coming to exceed feu-duty.

Lands were feued in 1823 for the erection of a harbour, &c., the superior binding himself by the feu-contract to free and relieve the vassals "of the whole cess or land-tax, . . . ministers' stipends, schoolmasters' salaries, and other public burdens due and exigible out of the whole lands and subjects hereby feued, or that may become due and payable for or from the same in all time coming." Upon the lands feued the vassals built extensive harbour works and a large village. Held (1) that the superior was bound to relieve the vassals of the whole poor rates imposed on them under the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1845, as owners of the lands and buildings thereon; (2) that this obligation of relief was not limited to the amount of the feu-duty; but (3) that the clause of relief did not cover road assessments imposed by subsequent local Acts, as being a burden imposed by supervenant legislation, although at the date of the feu-contract a Statute Labour Commutation Act was in force in the county.

Dunbar's Trustees v British Fisheries Society, 1878, 5 R. (H.L.) 221; 3 App.Cas. 1298; 15 S.L.R. 772.

—Supervenant legislation—Property-tax—39 Geo. III. c. 13—Property and Income-tax Act, 1842—Income-tax Act, 1853, Schedule A.

In 1803 a proprietor feued out lands, binding himself and his successors in the superiority "to pay the teind duties, ministers' stipends, schoolmasters' salaries, cess or land-tax, and all other burthens, duties, services, and casualties whatsoever, public and parochial, as well as all others of every description now due and payable, and that shall hereafter become due and payable or be imposed by any authority whatever for or furth of the said portion of land or teinds thereof for ever, it having been pactioned betwixt us that he was to pay no more than the said feu-duty and duplication when it shall occur." In a question raised in 1898, held (1) that the clause covered and gave the vassal relief from those burdens and assessments that affected the land in 1803, including assessments which merely took the place of and were the same in incidence and object as assessments which had ceased to be imposed, but did not cover assessments imposed by supervenant legislation; and (2) that the clause did not bind the superior to relieve the vassal of property-tax, that being a personal tax on income derived from the land, and not a tax payable "for or furth" of the lands.

Lindsay v Bett, 1898, 25 R. 1155; 35 S.L.R. 881.

—Supervenant legislation—Usage following on feu-charter—Rates and assessments—Rates levied on tenants.

Where a superior binds himself in a feu-charter to relieve his vassal of all public burdens imposed or thereafter to be imposed on the subjects feued, the subsequent actings of the parties may be founded upon to show that the superior's obligation is not limited to burdens imposed under laws in existence at the date of the charter, but extends to burdens imposed by supervenant legislation. Terms of feu-charters granted by the Magistrates of Edinburgh in 1769 and 1770 which, as explained by the actings of the parties, were held to bind the magistrates to relieve their vassals of public burdens imposed on the subjects by supervenant legislation, including not only the rates and assessments levied on the vassals as owners but also those levied on the occupiers of the subjects feued, although the leases on which these subjects were let did not bind the vassals to relieve their tenants of rates and assessments payable by occupiers.

North British Railway Co. v Magistrates of Edinburgh, 1920 S.C. 409; 57 S.L.R. 344; 1920, 1 S.L.T. 246.

—Agricultural lands built upon.

In 1752 the Magistrates of Aberdeen granted a feu of ten acres adjoining the burgh. The lands were wholly agricultural, yielding a rent of £1 per acre. The feu-duty payable was at the rate of £1 18s per acre. The feu-charter contained an obligation by the superior to relieve the vassal of public burdens. From about 1860 onwards the vassal granted subfeus, on which buildings were erected. In 1900, when the subjects had come to be covered with buildings and the municipal boundaries of Aberdeen had been extended so as to include them, the assessed rental being about £3750, the vassal raised an action against the Magistrates of Aberdeen, the superiors, for payment of £1361, being the amount of the sums imposed as poor-rates upon, and paid by, the subfeuars to the rating authority. The magistrates maintained, inter alia, that the obligation of relief was granted in the view of the lands being used as agricultural subjects, and was not to be extended to buildings. After a proof as to the circumstances existent at the date of the feu-charter, held that it was not proved that the only use of the ground feued which the parties had in view in 1752 was for agricultural purposes, and therefore that the superiors' obligation of relief was not limited to such a sum as would have been assessed on the subjects if they had continued to be agricultural. Held further that as the clause of relief was expressed as an independent obligation and not as part of the reddendo clause, the extent of the obligation was not limited to the amount of the feu-duty.

Latto v Magistrates of Aberdeen, 1903, 5 F. 740; 40 S.L.R. 488; 10 S.L.T. 277.

(254)

Stipulation that burdens should be paid as by landlord and tenant—Construction in light of prior documents.

A feu-charter dated in 1814 contained the following clause:—"During the existence of the present feu-right all public and parochial burdens or taxes imposed or to be imposed shall be paid by the superior and vassal as if the former was proprietor and landlord and as if the latter was tenant under him."

Held, in an action by the vassal for relief of all poor-rates payable in respect of property, that the superior was only bound to relieve the vassal of poor-rates on the annual value of the feu-duty. Observations (per Lord President Inglis and Lord Deas) as to the competency of looking behind a feu-charter at other and prior documents with a view to construing the charter.

Smith, Laing & Co. v Maitland, 1876, 3 R. 281; 13 S.L.R. 177.

(255)

Construction—Evidence of actings of parties—Long lease.

Where the parties to a long lease had for a long period of years acted on a particular construction of a clause of relief from public burdens, held that such construction must be regarded as the true meaning of the clause and receive effect accordingly.

Retention of poor-rates from arrears of feu-duty.

Held, in the construction of a feu-charter in which the vassal was taken bound in the first instance to pay the public burdens, "he always having allowance thereof in the first end of the foresaid feu-duties yearly at clearing," that the vassal was entitled to retain from arrears of feu-duties the poor-rates not only for the same years but also for previous years the feu-duties of which had been paid, but was not entitled to interest on these poor-rates, in respect that he had not sooner made his right effectual. Observed that the clause quoted was to be read as an ordinary clause of relief in favour of the vassal, but with an additional privilege enabling him to operate his own relief.

Hope v Lumsdaine, 1871, 9 M. 865; 43 J. 466; 8 S.L.R. 574.

Provision for redemption of obligation of relief—Whether option in superior or in vassal only—Prescription.

Certain lands and teinds were disposed in feu farm in 1673, the superior undertaking to relieve the vassal of bypast burdens, "and yearly and tearmly in all time coming, of all teynd-duty, minister's stipends, and annuity of teynd's allenarly." The superior further bound himself "that in case the teind sheaves of the said lands, with the crofts and pertinents thereof, or any part or portion of the said teinds, should be evicted from them, or that the same lands and teinds be burdened and affected with any minister's stipend in time coming, whether present or supervenient, then and in that case, and immediately after the said eviction or burdening of the said lands and teind, as said is, to content and pay to the said Andrew Ross and his foresaids, in liferent and fee respective, the sum of £1200 Scots money for each chaldre that should be so evicted, whether of stock or teind, with the annual rent of the said sums, yearly and termly during the not-payment thereof after the said eviction." Held that by the terms of these clauses the option of fixing the mode of relief by redemption or by an annual payment was conferred on the vassal and not on the superior.

Observed that a right of redemption is res mere facultatis, which no prescription can take away.

Reid's Trustees v Duchess of Sutherland, 1881, 8 R. 509; 18 S.L.R. 326.

I. TITULARS.

(1)

Right of titular to exact cumulo teind-duty where lands divided without allocation—Interest on arrears.

Subsequent to a decree of valuation of teinds the lands were divided and sold to different persons. No process of division or allocation of the valued teind was brought. Payment of the valued teind to the titular was not made for several years. Held that until the valuation was apportioned by regular process the titular was entitled, under the decree of valuation, to recover the valued teind from any parties intromitters with the fruits of the lands, to the amount of their intromissions. Circumstances in which interest was not allowed on a claim by a titular for arrears of teind-duty.

(2)

Claim by Crown to teinds, founded on (1) decree proceeding on concealment of a material fact by the Crown officers, (2) decree in subsequent locality not directly determining property of teinds—Res judicata—Prescription—Jus coronæ as a prescriptive title to teinds.

In a declarator of the right to the teinds of certain lands brought by the proprietor of the lands against the Crown, the pursuer founded on a progress of titles dating from a disposition of the teinds by the Lord of Erection in 1629, while the defender pleaded (1) res judicata, founding on a decree against the then proprietor of the lands in an action in 1776 by the Solicitor of Tithes, in which the disposition of 1629, though known to the Crown, was not produced, and the Court held that the teinds were bishops' teinds in the hands of the Crown; and founding also on a decree of locality in 1794, in which they were also treated as bishops' teinds, and (2) prescrip- tion, founding on a tack granted by the Crown to the proprietor of the lands in 1798, on which tack-duty had been paid for more than forty years. Held (1) that neither the decree in that action, which proceeded on an erroneous assumption in point of fact, nor the decree in the subsequent locality, which did not directly determine any question as to the property of the teinds, could be effectually founded on by the Crown as supporting a plea of res judicata; and (2) that the Crown, having produced no title to the teinds in question, could not plead the positive prescription under the tack of 1798; and that the pursuer was entitled to decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons. Observed that even if the teinds in question had fallen to the Crown jure coronæ as bishops' teinds, the Crown's right to teinds, being derived from the Church, was "limited, circumscribed, and qualified" by the title of its author, and that the jus coronæ could not constitute a title to teinds on which prescription could run in favour of the Crown.

Cheape v Lord Advocate, 1871, 9 M. 377; 43 J. 182; 8 S.L.R. 286.

Claim to surplus teinds—Teinds paid to Crown in error—Claim by true titular for repetition—Interest.

For many years surplus teinds were paid to the Crown, all parties interested being in the belief that the Crown was titular. It was eventually discovered that the teinds belonged not to the Crown but to a private person as patron of the parish. In an action brought by the heritor for repetition, decree for the principal sum was granted of consent, but held that the Crown was not liable for interest prior to a formal demand for repetition, the error being attributable to the negligence of the patron in not having ascertained the true state of the title.

Countess of Cromartie, &c. v Lord Advocate, 1871, 9 M. 988; 43 J. 547; 8 S.L.R. 640.

Teinds paid to Crown in error—Bona fide perception and consumption by Crown.

A titular raised an action for surplus teind against certain heritors, who pleaded that they had paid to the Crown upon a demand made to that effect by Crown officials. The titular having raised a supplementary action in which he called the Crown, and concluded for repayment to him of the sums of surplus teind so received, the Court held that he was entitled to decree against the Crown, repelling a plea of bona fide perception and consumption. Question, whether the plea of bona fide perception and consumption is available to the Crown.

Earl Cawdor v Lord Advocate, 1878, 5 R. 710; 15 S.L.R. 407.

Claim by Crown for arrears of surplus teinds—Bona fide perception.

The Crown granted a lease of the teinds and feu-duties of the lordship of Dunfermline to certain vassals, for themselves and in trust for the other vassals, which expired on 23rd March, 1799. The lease was continued by tacit relocation till 1838. In that year the Crown executed an inhibition of teinds, and brought an action of removing from the subjects other than teinds, in which decree of removing was obtained as from 23rd March, 1839. Thereafter the vassals paid feu-duties to the Crown, but no teinds were paid or claimed till 1868. In an action brought by the Crown against one of the vassals not named in the lease for arrears of teinds, the defender pleaded bona fide perception. It was admitted that the defender had consumed the teinds in ignorance of any claim by the Crown, and that the inhibition was inept. Held that the plea must be sustained.

Claim against heritor—Bona fide perception.

Opinion that a plea of bona fide perception and consumption would be relevant if stated by a heritor against a titular.

Haldane v Ogilvy, 1871, 10 M. 62; 44 J. 32; 9 S.L.R. 44.

(7)

Bona fide perception and consumption—Belief that teinds exhausted.

In an action at the instance of a proprietor of teinds against the proprietor of the lands for arrears of surplus teinds, the defender pleaded bona fide consumption, averring that he had regularly paid his proportion of the minister's stipend in the belief that the teind was thereby exhausted. Held that the defender's statements were not relevant to support the plea of bona fide consumption.

Macrae v Assets Co., 1894, 21 R. 1080; 31 S.L.R. 870; 2 S.L.T. 185.

Arrears — Tack — Tacit relocation—Inhibition—Error in terms and execution.

The proprietor of the two estates of Pitdornie and Dalcroy, lying in the same parish but not contiguous, in 1791 obtained from the Crown, the titular, a tack of the teinds thereof for nineteen years from the Lammas term, at a cumulo tack-duty of 5s. 3d. After the expiry of the tack, the tacksman continued to possess the teinds on tacit relocation. In September, 1839, the titular executed inhibition against the tacksman removing "this instant crop" in respect it was liable in payment of teinds. Following on this inhibition, arrears of surplus teinds of the lands of Pitdornie were demanded in 1859 by the titular, and payment was then made for the crops of the years 1841 to 1859. No surplus teinds were ever demanded from the lands of Dalcroy. In 1882 the titular demanded payment of arrears of surplus teinds from the lands of Pitdornie for the crops from 1861-1881, and from the lands of Dalcroy for the crops from 1844-1881. In an action at his instance to enforce these payments, held (1) that the inhibition was inoperative in respect (a) it was executed after the term of Lammas, 1839, at which time tacit relocation had taken place for that year, (b) that from its terms it applied only to the "instant crop," and not to the crop of succeeding years; (2) that as regarded the arrears of surplus teinds of the lands of Pitdornie the effect of the payment made in 1859 was to negative the theory of the tacit relocation subsequent to 1839, and that, therefore, the titular was entitled to the arrears claimed in respect of those lands; but (3) that quoad the teinds of Dalcroy, as the inhibition was inoperative, and as the tacksman had been allowed to continue in possession of the surplus teinds without objection, tacit relocation must be held to have continued, and that, therefore, the titular was not entitled to the arrears claimed.

Lord Advocate v Duke of Atholl, 1885, 12 R. 882; 22 S.L.R. 573.

Lands unvalued—Principle of valuation.

Held (per Lord McLaren) in a claim by a titular against a tacksman for arrears of surplus teinds where the teinds were unvalued, that the value of the teind fell to be estimated at one-fifth of the rental of the estate from year to year. Opinions on this question in the Inner House reserved.

Lord Advocate v Duke of Atholl, 1885, 12 R. 882; 22 S.L.R. 573.

Cumulo valuation—Disjunction quoad omnia of part of lands.

The teinds of the lands of K, in the parish of X, comprehending the lands of A, B, C, D, and E, with the pertinents, were valued in cumulo. D and E were afterwards disjoined, and erected into the parish of Y.

quoad omnia. In the locality of Y the teinds of D and E, as ascertained for the purposes of the locality, from data contained in the extract of the old decree of valuation, without process of division of the cumulo valuation, were exhausted. In consequence of the stipend having been modified in a year when the fiars prices were abnormally low, the heritor's subsequent payments from these teinds to the minister of Y considerably exceeded the valued teind on which the locality proceeded. He continued, however, to pay without surrendering to the minister of Y. In the parish of X, on the assumption that the teinds of the lands of A, B, and C were severally ascertained on the same basis, there was surplus teind. Held that the valuation of the teinds of the lands of K being a cumulo valuation, and no formal process of division having been brought, the titular was only entitled to claim surplus teind from the whole lands of K, after deducting the stipend paid in both the parishes of X and Y, and was not entitled to claim the surplus teind of the lands of A, B, and C (parts of the lands of K remaining in the parish of X), after deducting only the stipend paid to the minister of the parish of X.

Lord Advocate v Stirling, 1888, 15 R. 424; 25 S.L.R. 254.

Whether over-paying heritor has a claim against titular to whom under-paying heritors have paid surplus teinds.

(12)

Under-paying heritor's surplus paid to titular—Subsequent claim by over-paying heritor—Relief against titular.

Opinion that a heritor who, under an interim scheme of locality, has paid too little stipend, and has paid the whole of his surplus teind to the titular, and afterwards is made to reimburse an over-paying heritor, has a claim of relief against the titular.

Mackenzie v Lord Advocate, 1878, 5 R. 589; 15 S.L.R. 321.

Two titulars in same parish—Adjustment of liabilities for stipend.

When in the same parish there are two distinct titularities, held (1) that augmentations fall to be allotted on both in the proportion to the teindable rentals; but (2) that where heritors had for a long time paid stipend in terms of interim decrees of locality proceeding on an erroneous principle, the titular has no claim for repetition of the sums so paid, the new locality having, in so far as he is concerned, only a prospective effect.

Lord Advocate v Landale, (O.H.) 1867, 40 J. 363.

(14)

Locality—Titularity not recognised in interim locality—Title of recognised titular to object.

II. HERITABLE RIGHTS TO TEINDS.

(15)

Prescriptive title claimed in respect of a conveyance dated 1766 a non domino.

A proprietor of lands, who had no title to the teinds, conveyed in 1766 several parcels of land to trustees for family purposes, "with the several manor-places, milns, teinds, &c., belonging to and on the said respective lands above disposed, and contained in the particular characters and indentments thereof." The trustees, as directed by the truster, executed a conveyance in 1772 to a beneficiary in the same terms. The subsequent titles contained no mention of teinds. The proprietors did not pay teind to any titular, but they submitted to localities in 1837 and 1862 made on the footing that they had no heritable right to the teinds. In an action raised by the heritor in 1875, for reduction of the decrees of locality, and declarator of his heritable right to the teinds, held (1) that it was competent to ascertain by examination of the previous titles, though beyond the prescriptive period, whether the truster had a right to his teinds in 1766; (2) that as he had no such right, the trust deed conveyed none. Observations on the possession necessary to establish a heritable right to teinds.

Mackintosh v Lord Abinger, 1877, 4 R. 1069; 14 S.L.R. 632.

Valuation as title to prescribe.

Held that a decree of valuation of teinds was not a title under which a proprietor could by prescriptive possession acquire a right to teinds of lands not originally included in the valuation.

(19)

Res judicata—Judgment in former action with Crown that teinds were bishops' teinds—Concealment of material fact by Crown.

In an action by a heritor against the Crown to establish his right to the teinds of his lands, held that neither a judgment in favour of the Crown in a former litigation with the heritor by which the latter was decreed to pay to the Crown a certain sum as the annual value of his teinds, nor a decree in a subsequent locality, in which the whole teinds of the parish were dealt with as bishops' teinds belonging to the Crown, constituted res judicata in favour of the Crown, the first decree having proceeded on concealment of a material fact by the Crown officers, and the second not having directly determined any question as to the property in the teinds.

III. VALUATIONS AND SUB-VALUATIONS.

1. RULES FOR FIXING "CONSTANT RENT."

(23)

Lands permanently diverted from agriculture.

Held (by a majority of the whole Court) that by the operation of the Teinds Valuation Statutes of 1633, as construed by decisions, all lands not enjoying special immunity were made liable in payment of teinds, whether producing teindable fruits or not, and that until a valuation was led the teinds were to be taken as one-fifth part of the rent which the lands might be expected to produce as an agricultural subject.

In accordance with the above, held that lands included in the city of Glasgow, and for the most part densely covered with buildings, the teinds of which had never been valued, and which, so far as it appeared, had never paid stipend, though they were included in old tacks of teinds, were liable to be localised on for stipend, and the teindable rental fixed at £4 per acre, being an estimate of the probable agricultural rent which would be obtained if the buildings were swept away.

Burt v Common Agent for Calton, 1878, 5 R. 445; 15 S.L.R. 472.

(24)

Land forming part of park and policies.

Held in valuing the teinds of lands which formed part of the park and policies attached to a mansion-house, and which were kept in permanent pasture interspersed with plantations, that the teinds should be valued as at a fifth of the rent which would be got for the subjects in their actual condition.

Grass parks of which grazing let for season—Deductions from grazing rent in respect of charges borne by proprietor—Grass parks forming part of policies of mansion—Diminished grazing value—C.A.S., 1913, H. iii. 1.

In valuing the teinds of grass parks, the grazing of which was let year by year for the season, held (1) that the constant rent at which the grass parks might be presumed to be lettable as pasture lands was the rent paid for the seasonal grazing under deduction of such charges presently borne by the proprietor as, under an ordinary pastoral lease, would have fallen on the tenant. Held, accordingly (2) that deductions must be made for (a) upkeep of fences, (b) cost of shepherding and cutting weeds, (c) occupier's rates, and (d) occupier's income tax, which the Court, in the circumstances, fixed at 2s. in the £; but that the auctioneer's commission, paid by the lessor on letting the grazings, did not fall to be deducted. Held, further, as regarded certain of the parks forming part of policies of suitable extent for the mansion-house, that no addition to the rent actually obtained for the grazing fell to be made in respect of diminished grazing value caused by overhanging trees, intersecting roads, and restrictions imposed to secure amenity and for the convenience of the proprietor.

M'Ewen v Watt, 1922 S.C. 203; 59 S.L.R. 175; 1922 S.L.T. 125.

Farms let on lease—Consideration other than the rent—Tenant taken bound to insure farm buildings.

Held that, in valuing the teinds of farm lands let on lease where the tenant was taken bound to keep the buildings insured against fire, the premiums of insurance fell to be added to the rent payable under the lease in order to arrive at the constant rent.

M'Ewen v Watt, 1922 S.C. 203; 59 S.L.R. 175; 1922 S.L.T. 125.

(27)

Where rent reduced during currency of lease.

Lands unvalued for teind were let on a nineteen years' lease at a rent of £370 per annum, which, being found to be too high, was afterwards reduced to £300, by an agreement declaring that in other respects the lease should remain effectual. While the lease was still current the landlord raised an action of valuation of the stock and teind. Held that the reduced rent formed the criterion for valuation under the Act 1633, c. 17, the effect of the agreement being the same as if the tenant had renounced his lease and obtained another at a lower rent.

Observed that the rule by which in practice lands under lease are valued according to the current rent may admit of exception where the rent payable under the current lease does not truly represent the constant yearly value.

Fotheringham v Elder, 1870, 9 M. 172; 43 J. 90; 8 S.L.R. 138.

(28)

Alleged diminution of rental since former locality.

In a process of locality a heritor whose teinds were not valued was localled upon an admitted rental of £409. In a subsequent locality he alleged that the rental was now less, and that the teinds were exhausted. The Court held that the heritor was entitled to lead a valuation of his teinds.

Magistrates of Edinburgh v Montgomery, 1872, 11 M. 14; 45 J. 10; 10 S.L.R. 4.

2. CUMULO OR SEVERAL VALUATION.

(29)

Subsequent division of lands.

In a decree of valuation of, inter alia, the teinds of the lands and barony of K, comprehending the lands of A, B, C, D, and E, with the pertinents, the rent, stock, and teind of these lands was declared to be £157 6s. 0³/₄d. sterling, the fifth part whereof, being £31 9s. 2¹/₂d., was declared to be teind, and the usual decerniture followed. In the extract of the decree, which was in the old form, it was set forth that the decerniture proceeded upon a report by the Lord Ordinary, and conform to a particular scheme showing the rental, stock, and teind of each separate parcel of land making up the barony. In a question arising as to the surplus teinds of D and E—two of these several parcels—which had been disjoined and erected into a new parish quoad omnia, held that, as regarded the lands and barony of K, the valuation was a cumulo valuation, and that it was not competent to look beyond the decerniture for the purpose of ascertaining the several valuations of the teinds of D and E.

Lord Advocate v Stirling, 1888, 15 R. 424; 25 S.L.R. 254.

3. OBJECTIONS TO VALUATION.

(1) AS TO NATURE OF DECREE.

(30)

Whether document was truly a valuation.
Terms of a document which, after proof, was held (by a majority of seven judges) to be a valid extract of valuation.

Lord Advocate v Viscount Arbuthnott, &c., 1868, 6 M. 999; 40 J. 571; 5 S.L.R. 641.

(31)

An extract valuation, recorded under the authority of the Court in terms of 1707, c. 9, in the following terms:—"At Edinburgh, the third day of Februar Jajvjc and threttie sixt. The landis of W pertaining to J D are worth and may pay in stock and teynd, personage and viccarage, aucht chalders victuall. This is the just extract of the valuation of the fords. landis, as is contained in the principall register yrof. Extracted by me, T M, clerk-deput to Sir Archibald Johnston of Wariestone, Knight, Clerk Register and Keiper of the saids registers"—held to be a valid decree of valuation.

Lord Advocate v Governors of Donaldson's Hospital, 1870, 8 M. (H.L.) 136; 42 J. 435; 7 S.L.R. 676.

(32)

Terms of a decree of the commissioners which was held to be a valuation by the commissioners, and not a mere approval of a private arrangement of parties.

Observed that the commissioners in valuations of teinds were entitled to consider the consent of parties along with other evidence of value.

Heritors of Old Machar v The Ministers, 1870, 8 M. (H.L.) 168; 42 J. 604; L.R. 2 Sc.App. 89; 7 S.L.R. 726.

Decree of valuation combined with decree of augmentation and locality — Acts Rescissory, 1662, c. 1, 1662, c. 9, 1663, c. 28.

After the abolition of Episcopacy in Scotland, King Charles I., in 1641, made a gift under the Privy Seal of a tack of the titularity of the teinds of the parish of Cargill, which had formerly belonged to the Bishop of Dunkeld, in favour of James Livingstone. The tack was originally for nineteen years, but was afterwards extended to Livingstone's lifetime and three nineteen years thereafter. Power was given to the tenant to sub-let and to sell the teinds to the heritors. The teinds had never been drawn by the bishop, or enjoyed in the form of rental bolls, but had been let by the bishop for a tack-duty to the heritors as kindly tenants. Livingstone conveyed his right to the Earl of Crawford. In an action subsequently raised by the minister of the parish before the High Commission for augmentation, modification, and locality, and also for valuation of the teinds, in which the Earl of Crawford was called and appeared as titular along with the heritors, a decree of augmentation and valuation was pronounced in 1647. In a process of locality of the parish depending in 1884, the Lord Advocate, on the part of the Crown, objected to the decree of 1647 receiving effect as a valuation of teinds, on the grounds (1) that it was a mere decree of locality, and that the valuation was merely for the purpose of the locality; (2) that in the process of 1647 there was no proper titular; (3) that the decree was cut down by the Rescissory Acts. Held (1) that it was no valid objection to the decree of valuation that it was combined with a decree of locality; (2) that the titularity was well represented in the process; (3) that the Act 1662, c. 1, did not strike at valuations; (4) that the Act of 1662, c. 9, distinguished between bishops' teinds which had been drawn or enjoyed in the form of rental bolls and those teinds which had been set in tack, making valuations of the former since 1637 invalid, but not affecting valuations of the latter; (5) that the Act 1663, c. 28, expressly saved from the operation of the Rescissory Acts valuations of teinds, except decreets of valuation, modifications of stipends, or augmentations, whereby the bishops were deprived of any part of the rents which they had in 1637; and that while the decree of 1647 fell under this exception in so far as it granted an augmentation of stipend, it did not do so in so far as it was a decree of valuation.

Valuation in absence of titular—Subsequent Order by High Commissioners to desist from valuation of titular's teinds—Dereliction of sub-valuation.

Objection was taken to an interim scheme of locality which gave effect to a valuation by sub-commissioners of teinds made in 1630, and to the approving of that valuation, on the grounds (1) that the valuation was obtained by the tacksman of the teinds in the absence of the titular, Lord Maitland; (2) that an order of the High Commissioners had been obtained by the Earl of Lauderdale, Lord Maitland's father, on 28th January, 1629, which was produced to the sub-commissioners in 1632, ordering the sub-commissioners to desist from valuing the teinds of any men's lands of which the titular had the teinds; and (3) that the valuation of the sub-commissioners must be held to have been dereliquished, in respect that there was evidence that certain persons had, in a valuation proceeding in 1714, produced a decret of valuation by the High Commission, dated 1633, of lands which prima facie included the lands valued by the sub-commissioners in 1630. Held (1) that the absence of the titular did not in itself render the sub-valuation invalid; (2) that the order of the High Commission intimated to the sub-commissioners in 1632 could have no effect upon the report of the sub-commissioners valuing specified teinds, completed in 1630; and (3) that the onus of showing dereliction lay on the objector and that he had not discharged that onus; and accordingly (4) that the objection fell to be repelled. Observed (per Lord President Dunedin) that the Court must affirm the valuation of the sub-commissioners, provided that no intrinsic objection can be shown to their report, that it can be shown that the identity of the lands is made out, and that dereliction of the sub-report cannot be proved against the party seeking approbation.

Disconformity to sub-commissioners' report—Reduction of decree of approbation in absence by party who obtained it.

Held that a heritor who had obtained decree in absence in a process of approbation of a sub-valuation of the teinds of his lands could competently bring a reduction of the same, on the ground that owing to his mistake in framing the summons the decree was disconform to the sub-commissioners' report, on which it bore to proceed.

M'Neill's Trustees v Campbell, 1872, 11 M. 211; 45 J. 131; 10 S.L.R. 138.

Cumulo rent of lands in different parishes.

Held that it is not a valid objection to a decree of valuation that lands in different parishes are therein valued in cumulo.

Hay v Minister of Peebles, (O.H.) 1886, 13 R. 585.

(2) ALL PARTIES NOT REPRESENTED.

(37)

Titular not cited.

Held that it is not a good objection to a valuation at the instance of A B, "parson and minister," to allege that the titular was not called, without any averment that A B was not parson, and that some other person was titular—the presumption being that A B was (as designed) parson, and in that capacity titular.

Elder v Fotheringham, 1869, 7 M. 341; 41 J. 199; 6 S.L.R. 220.

(38)

In a process of valuation of teinds, at the instance of a heritor against the minister and B, the High Commission in 1647 pronounced a decree interponing "their decret and authority" to an agreement therein narrated, whereby B, "as tacksman and titular, and having right to the teinds," and the heritor, agreed that the teinds "shall be in all time coming £210 Scots." This valuation was given effect to in subsequent processes of modification and locality, and in a process of disjunction and erection. The teinds were held by B's representatives under successive tacks down to 1848. In 1859 the arrears of surplus teind from 1848 to 1858 were paid to and accepted by the donatories of the titular, on the basis of the decree of valuation. In an action raised in 1863 by the Crown, as titular, and by its donatories, concluding for reduction of the decree, in so far as bearing to be a permanent valuation of the teinds, on the ground, inter alia, that the titular had not been called, and for declarator that the valuation was merely of the tacksman's interest, held that the decret was ex facie a permanent valuation of the teinds to which B appeared to have been a party in the capacity of titular; and (2) that the decree must be presumed to have been valid, nothing having been relevantly averred inconsistent with its validity.

Deans of the Chapel Royal v Johnstone, 1869, 7 M. (H.L.) 19; 41 J. 348; L.R., 1 H.L. Sc. 426.
